Dr. S. K. KAPOOR

INTERNATIONAL LAW & HUMAN RIGHTS

22nd Edition

CLA

CENTRAL LAW AGENCY

4603
24/5/24

INTERNATIONAL LAW
AND
HUMAN RIGHTS

LIBRARY
4603
Acc. No.

By
Dr. S. K. KAPOOR
M.A., LL.M., LL.D.
Ex-Lecturer in Law, Punjab University, Chandigarh
Ex-Reader in Law, Lucknow University, Lucknow

BESTSELLER FOR OVER 46 YEARS

Foreword by
DR. NAGENDRA SINGH
M.A., LL.D. (CANTAB) : D.SC. (LAW : MOSCOW) ; D.C.L. (DELHI) ; M.A., B.LITT., LL.D. (DUBLIN) ; D.LITT. (BIHAR) ; D. PHIL. (CAL.) ; BAR-AT-LAW ; I.C.S. ; I.D.C. MEMBER, CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY OF INDIA (1947-48) ; MEMBER, PERMANENT COURT OF ARBITRATION, (THE HAGUE) ; VICE-CHAIRMAN, INTERNATIONAL LAW COMMISSION, (1969) ; ASSOCIATE, INSTITUTE DE DROIT INTERNATIONAL ; MEMBER COUNCIL UNIDROIT (ROME) ; PRESIDENT OF THE IMCO ASSEMBLY (1963-65) ; VICE-CHAIRMAN, UNCITRAL (1969) ; PROFESSOR OF MARITIME LAW, MADRAS UNIVERSITY AND VISITING PROFESSOR AT THE UNIVERSITIES OF BOMBAY, DELHI AND BANARAS AND EX-PRESIDENT, INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE, PEACE PALACE, 2517 K.J., THE HAGUE, NETHERLANDS.

TWENTY SECOND EDITION

CENTRAL LAW AGENCY
30D/1 MOTILAL NEHRU ROAD
PRAYAGRAJ

Published by :

CENTRAL LAW AGENCY
30-D/1, Moti Lal Nehru Road,
Prayagraj - 211002

FIRST	EDITION	...	1974
SECOND	EDITION	...	1976
THIRD	EDITION	...	1978
FOURTH	EDITION	...	1980
FIFTH	EDITION	...	1982
SIXTH	EDITION	...	1985
SEVENTH	EDITION	...	1987
EIGHTH	EDITION	...	1990
NINTH	EDITION	...	1992
TENTH	EDITION	...	1994
ELEVENTH	EDITION	...	1996
TWELFTH	EDITION	...	1998
THIRTEENTH	EDITION	...	2000
FOURTEENTH	EDITION	...	2002
FIFTEENTH	EDITION	...	2004
SIXTEENTH	EDITION	...	2007
SEVENTEENTH	EDITION	...	2009
EIGHTEENTH	EDITION	...	2011
NINETEENTH	EDITION	...	2014
TWENTIETH	EDITION	...	2016
TWENTY FIRST	EDITION	...	2017
TWENTY SECOND	EDITION	...	2021

© Publisher

ISBN : 978-81-948330-6-2

Price : Rs. 850.00
(Rs. Eight hundred fifty only)

Due care has been taken to avoid errors or omissions in the book. However, inspite of our best care and caution, errors or omissions may have crept in inadvertently. The publisher shall be obliged if any such error or omission is brought to his knowledge for possible corrections in future editions. This book is being sold, subject to the condition that the author, publisher and printer are neither liable nor responsible, in any manner, whatsoever, to any one, whether purchaser of this book or not, for any error or omission in this publication. In case of binding mistake or missing pages, the publisher's liability extends to replacement of the book by a similar edition. All disputes are subject to Allahabad jurisdiction only.

Printed at :

Sri Maruti Printers
Prayagraj

COURT INTERNATIONALE DE JUSTICE
Palais De La Paix 2517 KJ LA HAYE
PAYS-BAS
TELE. ; (070) 924441 Telex : 32323
Telegr : Intercourt Lahaye
Telefax : (070) 649928
LE PRESIDENT

INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE
Peace Palace 2517 KJ The Hague
NETHERLANDS
Tele : (070) 924441 Telex : 32323
Cables : Intercourt The Hague
Telefax : (070) 649928
THE PRESIDENT

November, 1986

FOREWORD

The author has always been keen to enlarge and improve the book at the time of its revised edition. He has added a new chapter on International Criminal Law and the Proposal for the establishment of an International Criminal Court. He has made a sincere endeavour to bring the subject-matter of the volume up-to-date. I notice that the latest pronouncements of the International Court of Justice concerning the case of Military and Para-military activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States) 26th November, 1984, Case concerning Delimitation of Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine Area (Canada v. United States) 12th October, 1984 and Case concerning the Continental Shelf (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v. Malta) 3 June, 1985 have been incorporated in the volume. I also notice that the author has dropped Appendix III on "Leading Cases" and the relevant matter of this Appendix has been incorporated in the text. Chapters on Law of the Sea, the International Court of Justice, Intervention, State Jurisdiction, Outer Space, Nationality etc., have been further elaborated and improved. The author has also made legal scrutiny of international events such as Star War, Accident at Soviet Nuclear Plant at Chernobyl, American Attack on Libya, Financial Crisis faced by the U.N., Nuclear Terrorism, Star Peace Plan, South Africa and Apartheid and Disarmament Summit between the U.S. and U.S.S.R. Despite these additions in this volume, the bulk of the book has been kept under check ; rather it has been slightly reduced. I do hope that the book will meet the needs of Indian students.

I wish him all success.

NAGENDRA SINGH

PREFACE TO THE TWENTY SECOND EDITION

In the twenty-second edition, the book has been thoroughly revised, improved and brought up-to-date.

In this edition, current national and international events have been critically discussed and analysed. These events include cases relating to Kulbhushan Jadhav—decision of International Court of Justice, response of Pakistan thereon, and India again going to International Court of Justice—China's expansionist policy in South China Sea, conflict between America and Iran, especially in relation to killing of General Sulemani of Iran, Covid-19, India and China conflict in Ladakh and China's expansionist policy in Sikkim, Arunachal Pradesh and Uttarakhand, and abrogation of Article 370 and Article 35A of the Constitution.

Twenty Second Edition of the book will immensely benefit the students of Law (LL.B. and LL.M.), students pursuing International Studies, International Relations, Defence studies International Organisations, and Human Rights. It also seeks to benefit candidates appearing for competitive examinations such as Central Civil Services and Provincial Civil Services Examination.

Throughout the revision work, my wife and children have been the constant source of inspiration. My publishers also deserve credit for publishing and releasing the book in an elegant manner.

Dated : 16 December, 2020 Dr. S. K. Kapoor
3/44, Prag Narain Road,
Lucknow - 226001

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

(1974)

This book has been written to serve the needs of the students of Law of Indian Universities and the candidates appearing at the different competitive examinations. An endeavour has been made to present the subject-matter in a systematic manner and in a lucid and simple language. An attempt has also been made to explain the different topics of International Law with the help of illustrations, problems and leading cases on the points. A critical discussion has been made of the current international problems involving questions of International Law, such as Indo-Pak War (1971), Emergence of Bangladesh, Banning of Pakistani Air flights through Indian territory, Problem of Bangladesh's Admission to the United Nations, Problem of Release of Pakistani Prisoners of War and Trial of War Criminals, Sending of Indian Forces to Sikkim in April, 1973, Problem of Succession in respect of public debts by Bangladesh, Legality or illegality of American action in Vietnam and Cambodia, Legality or illegality of nuclear warfare and nuclear tests including the recent Injunction granted by the International Court of Justice forbidding France to conduct its planned nuclear tests, Indo-Pakistan Agreement on Prisoners of War, 1973 (Delhi Agreement) and International treaties and agreement recently concluded. For the benefit of the students, some leading cases on International Law have been discussed briefly in a separate Chapter.

In the end, I thank the publishers for having spared no pains in getting the book printed and published in an elegant manner in a short time.

S. K. KAPOOR

ABBREVIATIONS

A.I.R.	All India Reporter
A.J.I.L.	American Journal of International Law
American Rep.	American Reporter
American Rev.	American Review
Annual Rev. of U.N. Affairs	Annual Review of the U.N. Affairs
B.Y.B.I.L.	British Year Book of International Law
California L.R.	California Law Review
Col. J. Transnat'l Law	Columbia Journal of Transnational Law
Col. L.R.	Columbia Law Review
C.L.P.	Current Legal Problems
F.A.R.	Foreign Affairs Reports
Harv. Int. L.J.	Harvard International Law Journal
Harv. L. Rev.	Harvard Law Review
Harvard J. Trans. L.	Harvard Journal of Transnational Law
I.C.L.Q.	International and Comparative Law Quarterly
I.J.I.L.	Indian Journal of International Law
I.J. Pol. Sc.	Indian Journal of Political Science
Ind. Q.	India Quarterly
I.C.J. Review	Review of the International Committee of Jurists
Illions L.R.	Illions Law Review
I.L.M.	International Legal Materials
I.L.R.	The International Law Reporter
Int. Lawyer	International Lawyer
Int. Affairs	International Affairs
Int. Orgn.	International Organisation
Int. Studies	International Studies
J.I.L.I.	Journal of the Indian Law Institute
J. of Law and Economics	Journal of Law and Economics
J. of Int. Law and Economics	Journal of International Law and Economics
Law.	Lawyer
Law. & Cont. Prob.	Law and Contemporary Problems
McGill L.J.	McGill Law Jcurnal
Ocean Dev. & Int. L.	Ocean Development and International Law
Proc. A.S.I.L.	Proceedings of Amercian Society of International Law
S.C.J.	Supreme Court Journal
Soviet Year Book of Int. Law	Soviet Year Book of International Law
U.N.C.	United Nations Chronicle
U.N. Monthly Chronicle	United Nations Monthly Chronicle
University of Toronto L.J.	University of Toronto Law Journal
Virginia L.R.	Virginia Law Review
Yale L.J.	Yale Law Journal
Yojna	Yojna

CONTENTS

Foreword iii
Preface to the Twenty Second Edition v
Preface to the First Edition..................vii
Abbreviations.................................. ix
Table of Cases.................................xli
International Conventions...................liii

PART I
INTRODUCTORY

CHAPTER 1
INTRODUCTION

Dynamism in Law................................1
Dynamism in International Law...............2
Dynamism in Environmental Law.............3
Crisis in International Law 4
Problems of adaptability and change.......5
Traditional International Law and New International Law 6
Communist challenge...........................8
Challenge of Nuclear Weapons............. 11
Scientific and Technological Revolution. 13
Challenge posed by Depletion of Ozone Layer as a result of Green-house effect 13
Challenge Posed by Terrorism............. 13
Emergence of a large number of New States 14
Breaking up of Soviet Union................. 16
Need for Universal International Law 16
Development of International Law by International Organizations......... 20
Rethinking about new International Law making processes.................... 23
Brief Review of International Law in the Second Millennium.................... 23
Challenges before International Law in the Third Millennium 24
Recent Developments......................... 26
Conclusion....................................... 26

CHAPTER 2
DEFINITION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Definition... 29
L. Oppenheim.................................. 29
New Definition of International law in ninth edition of Oppenheim's Book... 32
Some other Definitions 33
J. L. Brierly 33
Torsten Gihl 33
Hackworth 33
Queen v. Keyn................................. 33
West Rand Central Gold Mining Co. Ltd. v. King 33
S.S. Lotus case............................... 33
Philip C. Jessup................................ 33
Gray... 34
Hall... 34
Kelsen 34
Soviet definition and approach to International Law.......................... 34
Chinese Definition and approach to International Law.......................... 35
C. G. Fenwick.................................. 37
Whiteman 37
J. G. Starke 37
Conclusion...................................... 37

CHAPTER 3
NATURE AND BASIS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Whether International Law is a law in the true sense of the term or not ?.. 39
International Law is Really Law............ 41
International Law and Municipal Law 44

Theory and Reality in International Law 45
Distinction between Public International Law and Private International Law 46
Is International Law a mere Positive morality ? 47
Whether International Law is the Vanishing Point of Jurisprudence ? 49
Does International Law comprise of the Rules of International Comity? 51
Weaknesses of International Law 51
Suggestions for improving International Law 52
Sanctions in International Law 53
Basis of International Law 57
  Theories as to Law of Nature 57
  Positivism 57
  True basis of International Law 59
  Some other Theories regarding the basis of International Law 60
   Theory of Consent 60
   Auto-limitation Theory 61
   Pacta sunt Servanda 62
   Theory of fundamental Rights 62
New trends regarding basis of obligation in International Law 63
Influence of Natural Law 65

CHAPTER 4

SOURCES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Formal and Material Sources 67
International Conventions 67
Law-making treaties 68
Treaty contracts 69
International Customs 69
  Generation by Treaty of Customary Rules of International Law 70
Ingredients or Elements of Custom 71
  Long Duration 71
  Uniformity and consistency 71
  Generality of Practice 72
  Opinio juris et necessitatis 72
  West Rand Central Gold Mining Company Ltd. v. R 72
  Right of passage over Indian territory case [Portugal v. India] 72
  Situation when same principle is found in customary law and is also codified in a treaty 73
  Importance of Custom as a source of law and Evaluation 73
General Principles of Law recognized by Civilized States 74
Decisions of Judicial or Arbitral Tribunals 77
  International Judicial Decisions 77
  State Judicial Decisions 78
  Decisions of International Arbitral Tribunals 78
  Juristic Works 78
Decisions or Determinations of the organs of International Institutions 79
Ex aequo et bono 81
Some other sources of International Law 81
  International Comity 81
  State Paper 81
  State Guidance for their officers 82
  Reason 82
  Equity and Justice 82
  Resolutions and Declarations of General Assembly of the U.N. as the source of Universal International Law 84
  Order of use of sources of International Law 85

CHAPTER 5

HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW INCLUDING SCHOOLS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Origin 86
Contribution of Jews, Greeks, Romans, Hindus and Muslims 87
Development of International Law during 16th and 17th Centuries 88
Grotius, the Father of Modern Law of Nations 89
Development of International Law during 18th Century 91
Contribution of Naturalists and Positivists 91

Grotians 91
Distinctions among the Naturalists, Positivists and Grotians 91
Transformation of 'European International Law' into Law of Nations or International Law 92
Development of International Law during 19th and 20th Centuries 92
Review of International Law during the Second Millennium 95
Challenges before International Law during the Third Millennium 95
Schools of International Law 95
  Natural Law School 95
  Grotian School 95
  Positivist School of law 97
  The so-called Anglo-American and Continental Schools of thought in International Law 97

CHAPTER 6

CODIFICATION AND PROGRESSIVE DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Meaning and definition 99
History of Codification 100
  Declaration of Paris, 1856 100
  Codification by individual writers 100
  The two Hague Conferences 100
  Declaration of London 100
  Codification under the League of Nations 100
  The Hague Codification Conference of 1930 101
  Codification under the U.N. 101
  Work of the International Law Commission 101
  Recent Conventions and Treaties 103
Merits and Demerits of Codification 104
Conclusion 105

CHAPTER 7

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN INTERNATIONAL LAW AND MUNICIPAL LAW

Main Theories 106
Monism 106
Dualism 106
Whether Monism or Dualism is the correct theory 107
Specific Adoption Theory 108
Transformation Theory 108
Delegation Theory 108
Question of Primacy 109
  State Practices 110
  British Practice 110
  American Practice 112
  Israeli Practice 113
  Greek Practice 113
  French Practice 113
  Soviet Practice 113
  Chinese Practice 115
  Austrian Practice and Practice in Netherlands and Switzerland 115
  Indian Practice 115
  Present Legal Position 120
  Concept of opposability 123

PART II

THE LAW OF PEACE

CHAPTER 8

SUBJECTS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW AND THE PLACE OF INDIVIDUAL IN INTERNATIONAL LAW

Subjects of International Law 125
Various theories regarding subjects of International Law 125
  Only States are subjects 125
  Individuals are the subjects 126
  States, individual and certain non-State Entities are Subjects 127
Place of Individuals in International Law 129

CHAPTER 9
NATURE OF STATE AND DIFFERENT KINDS OF STATES AND NON-STATE ENTITIES

Essential Elements of a State............132
Functions of States..........................132
Concept of Sovereignty......................133
Principle of the Equality of States........135
Rights and Duties of States................136
Different kinds of 'States' and 'Non-State entities'..............................138
  Confederation..........................138
  Federal State..........................138
  Condominium..........................138
  Vassal State............................138
  Protectorate State....................138
Difference between Protectorate and Vassal State..........................139
International Position of :—
  Tibet..140
  Holy See or Vatican City................140
  Commonwealth of Nations..............140
Neutral State and Neutralized State and Distinction between them.........141

CHAPTER 10
STATE RESPONSIBILITY

Meaning of the term 'State Responsibility'............................142
Kinds of State Responsibility..............143
Original and Vicarious responsibility.....143
State responsibilities in different fields...143
  International Delinquency..............143
Notion of Imputability.......................144
  State responsibility for injury to aliens.....................................145
  State responsibility for acts of private individuals.....................146
  State responsibility for acts of mob-violence..........................146
  State responsibility in respect of Injuries suffered by Persons Serving the U.N.......................147
  State responsibility for acts of insurgents..............................148
  Calvo doctrine............................148
  State responsibility for acts of Government Organs.................149
  State responsibility for contracts with foreigners........................149
  State responsibility for Breach of Treaty or Contractual Obligations..............................150
  State responsibility in respect of Expropriation of Foreign Property...............................151
  Liability for acts of Multinational Corporations : Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster..........................153
  Legal Controls on the Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes...............155
  State Responsibility for Environment...........................156
  Defences to State Liability.............156
  Consent......................................156
  Counter measure in respect of an internationally wrongful act.........156
  Force majeure and fortuitous event..156
  Distress......................................156
  State of necessity........................157
  Self-defence...............................157
  Reservation as to compensation for damage.............................157

CHAPTER 11
RECOGNITION

Meaning and Definition......................158
Theories of Recognition.....................158
  Constitutive Theory......................158
  Declaratory Theory.......................159
Conclusion....................................160
Modes of Recognition.......................161
  De-facto Recognition....................161
  De-jure Recognition......................161
  Distinction between De-facto and De-jure Recognition............162
Recognition of Insurgency.................164
  Essential conditions......................164

Recognition of belligerency 164
  Essential conditions 164
  Effects of recognition of belligerents..............................165
Distinction between recognition of States and Government.................165
Is there a duty to recognize ?.............166
Facultative Theory of Recognition or is recognition a political or discretionary act ?........................166
Suggestions....................................167
Legal Effects of recognition................168
Consequence of Non-recognition.........169
Implied Recognition 170
Recognition subject to a condition 170
Collective Recognition........................170
Is withdrawal of Recognition Possible? 171
Retroactive Effects of Recognition 171
Estrada Doctrine...............................172
Stimson Doctrine...............................172
Hallestein Doctrine 172
India's Practice and Policy of Recognition of States and Governments 173
China...173
Israel...173
Spain...174
Bangladesh.......................................174
Cambodia 174
Vietnam and Germany........................174
Provisional Revolutionary Government of Vietnam.................174
Recognition of the new Government of Afghan Republic under the New President 174

CHAPTER 12

STATE SUCCESSION

Definition and Meaning 176
Term 'State Succession' misnomer 176
Kinds of State Succession.................177
  Universal Succession 177
  Partial Succession 177
Principle of the Continuity of States...177
Theories of State Succession.............178
  Theories of Continuity 179
  Negative Theories 179
  Theories Importing International Law 180
  Communist Theory........................180
Rights and Duties arising out of State Succession.........................180
  Political Rights and Duties.............180
  Local Rights and Duties.................181
  Fiscal Property Debts....................181
  Public Debts...............................181
  Contracts 182
  Concessionary contracts...............183
  Laws..183
  Unliquidated damages for torts........183
  Nationality 184
  Succession to Property in Foreign State...........................184
  Succession in State Archives.........184
  Succession of States in Respect of Treaties 184
Succession regarding membership of the United Nations.....................187
Succession in respect of International Organisations............187
Status of South-West Africa...............187
Question of Application of the Rules of State succession in respect of division of India into two independent States (India and Pakistan).............................188

CHAPTER 13

INTERVENTION

Meaning and Definition 189
Article 2(4) and the Limits of the use of force...............................191
Grounds of intervention.....................193
  Self-defence 193
Distinction between self-defence and self-preservation...........................197
Distinction between self-defence and self-help............ ...197

  - Intervention on humanitarian grounds....198
  - To enforce treaty rights....198
  - Intervention to prevent illegal intervention....198
  - Balance of Power....198
  - For protection of persons and property....198
  - Collective intervention or collective measures....198
  - Intervention to maintain International Law....199
  - Intervention in Civil Wars....199
  - Conclusion....199
- Intervention under League of Nations and United Nations and the Concept of Domestic Jurisdiction....199
- Comparison with League of Nations....200
- Legitimacy of use of force against economic coercion : Example of Bangladesh....201
- Monroe Doctrine....202
- Drago Doctrine....202
- Historical Precedents of Interventions....203
  - The Caroline, 1841....203
  - Corfu Channel Case, 1949....203
  - Case of Korea, 1950....203
- Russian intervention in Hungary, 1956....203
- Intervention by U.K., France and Israel in Egypt (1956)....204
- The case of Goa....204
- American intervention in Cuba....205
- Vietnam....205
- American Intervention in Cambodia....206
- The Afghan issue....206
- Argentine Intervention in Falkland Islands....207
- American Intervention in Grenada....207
- U.S. Intervention in Nicaragua....208
- U.S. Attack on Libya (1986)....209
- Dropping of Supplies by Indian aircraft in Sri Lanka despite opposition....209
- Question of Withdrawal of IPKF....209
- American Intervention in Panama....210
- Iraqi Invasion and Annexation of Kuwait....210
- Kurd's Problem....211
- Crisis in Somalia....212
- Russia-Chechnya conflict....214
- Dagestan War....214
- Pakistan's Fresh Intrusion in Kargil Area of Kashmir....215
- Attack on World Trade Centre (WTC) of America (11th September, 2001)....215
- U.S.-North Korea Issue (2006)....215

CHAPTER 14
STATE JURISDICTION

- Distinction between exercise of jurisdiction and basis of jurisdiction....216
- Territorial Sovereignty....218
- Subjective and Objective Territorial Principles....218
  - Subjective Territorial Principles....218
  - Objective Territorial Principle....219
  - Extra-territorial operation of State Laws and Protective Jurisdiction of State over Foreigners....219
- Some exceptions of the exercise of Jurisdiction....222
  - Diplomatic agents....222
  - Foreign Embassies....222
  - Foreign sovereigns....222
  - Immunity in respect of public property of Foreign Sovereign State....224
- Exceptions of the above rule....226
  - Express consent to exercise jurisdiction....226
  - Effect of Participation in a Proceeding before a Court....226
  - Commercial Transactions....226
  - Contracts of employment....227
  - Personal injuries and damage to property....227
  - Ownership, possession and use of property....227
  - Intellectual and Industrial Property....228
  - Participation in Companies or other collective bodies....228

- Ships owned or operated by a State 228
- State Immunity from measures of constraint in connection with proceeding before a court....228
- International Organizations....229
- Extradition Treaties 229
- Foreign Troops....230
- Immunity of Warships and their crew 230
- Exercise of Jurisdiction in case of Collision of Ships on High Sea....230
- Criminal Jurisdiction in International Law 230
  - S.S. Lotus case....231
- Criminal jurisdiction of the Coastal State in the Territorial Sea....233
- U.N. Crime Commission 234
- State Jurisdiction according to Universal Principles....234
- International Servitudes 235
  - Positive....235
  - Negative....235
  - Military....235
  - Economic 236

CHAPTER 15
STATE TERRITORY

- The concept of State Territory....237
- Maritime Territory 238
- Modes of Acquiring Territory....238
  - Occupation....238
  - Arctic and Antarctic....240
  - The Antarctic Treaty 240
  - Distinction between occupation and subjugation 241
  - Prescription 241
  - Distinction between Occupation and Prescription....242
  - Accretion....243
  - Cession....243
  - Annexation 245
  - Lease 245
  - Pledge 246
  - Plebiscite 246
  - Acquisition of territorial sovereignty by newly emerged States 246
  - Modes of Loss of Territory....247
  - Cession....247
  - Operation of Nature 247
  - Subjugation....247
  - Prescription 247
  - Revolt....247
  - Dereliction 247
  - Granting of Independence to a Colony by the Imperialist State 247
- International Rivers 247
  - The Farakka Issue....249
- Inter-Oceanic Canals....250
  - Suez Canal 250
  - Keil Canal 251
  - Panama Canal 251
- Straits....252
- Bays....252
- Historic Waters....253
- Indian position....254
- Air-space—Various Theories....254

CHAPTER 16
THE LAW OF THE SEA

- I. Introduction 255
- II. Maritime Belt or Territorial Waters....259
  - Problem of Breadth of Territorial Waters....259
  - Rights and Duties of Coastral State 260
  - Delimitation of Territorial Sea between States with opposite or adjacent coasts 261
  - Indian Position....265
  - Innocent Passage....265
  - Indian Position....267
- III. Contiguous Zone....267
  - Indian Position....267
  - Distinction between Maritime Belt and Contiguous Zone....267
- IV. Straits used for International Navigation 267

V. Archipelagic Waters of an Archipelagic State....................269
  Nature of Archipelagic Waters and Distinction with Territorial waters and Inland waters......................269
VI. Continental Shelf......................270
  Criticism of the definition of Continental Shelf adopted under Geneva Convention of 1958..............................271
  Impact of North Continental Shelf cases (1969) 272
  Outer Limits of Continental Shelf.................................273
  Commission on the limits of the continental shelf 274
  Payments and Contributions for exploitation of Continental Shelf beyond 200 nautical miles................274
  Delimitation of continental shelf between two or more States...............................275
  North Sea Continental Shelf cases (1969)......................275
  Case concerning Continental Shelf (Tunisia v. Libya)..........277
  Case concerning Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Marine Area (Canada v. U.S.) 278
  Case concerning continental shelf (Libya/Malta)................279
  Indian position on continental shelf.................................282
VII. Exclusive Economic Zone..........282
  Distinction between Exclusive Economic Zone and Contiguous Zone 284
  Continental Shelf and Exclusive Economic Zone distinguished......................284
VIII. The High Seas..........................285
  Definition...............................285
  Development of law..................286
  Freedoms of the High Seas.........287
  Criticism of traditional doctrine.............................288
  Jurisdiction on the High Seas.....289
  Right of Visit...........................289
  Right of hot pursuit 290
  Conservation and Management of the Living Resources of the High Seas.................................290
IX. Regime of Islands.....................290
X. Enclosed or Semi-Enclosed Seas....................................291
XI. Right of Access of Land-Locked States to and from the Sea and Freedom of Transit 291
XII. International Sea-bed Area.........292
  Definition and Delimitation..........292
  Development of law..................292
  Declaration of the "Area" and its resources as Common Heritage of Mankind 293
  Significance of 1970 Declaration of Principles........294
  Resources of the International Seabed Area and U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982........295
  System of Exploration and Exploitation.........................295
  Production Policies...................296
  International Sea-bed Authority 297
  Nature and Fundamental Principles of the Authority......297
  Principal organs of the Authority 297
    The Assembly 297
    The Council.........................298
    Subsidiary organs of the Council 298
    The Secretariat....................299
  Other organs of the Authority......299
    Enterprise 299
    Sea-bed Disputes Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Law.....................299
    International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea...........299
  Financial Arrangements.............300
  Descision of U.S. and certain other Western Countries not to sign the Law of the Sea Convention and its implications.........................300

Obstacles to universal Participation Removed 301
Pioneer Investors..................... 302
Preparatory commission............303
Provisional Understanding Regarding Sea-Bed Matters 304
Agreement Relating to the Implementation of Part XI of the convention 305
XIII. Protection and Preservation of Marine Environment..............305
XIV. Marine Scientific Research........306
XV. Settlement of Disputes..............306
Prompt Release of Vessels and Crews..........................308

CHAPTER 17

THE INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL FOR THE LAW OF THE SEA AND SEA, BED DISPUTES CHAMBER

Introduction 311
Composition....................................311
Access to the Tribunal......................312
Applicable Law................................312
Jurisprudence 312

SEA-BED DISPUTES CHAMBER

Composition....................................312
Special Chambers 313
Advisory Opinion.............................313
Finality and Binding Force of Decisions 314
Cases decided by the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea 314
Agreement on Cooperation and Relationship between the U.N. and the International Tribunal for the Law of the sea 314
Conclusion.....................................315

CHAPTER 18

PIRACY

Definition..316
Essential elements..........................317
Piracy by a war ship, Government air craft whose crew has mutinied 317
Piracy committed by unrecognized insurgents 317
Concept of Universal jurisdiction in respect of crime of piracy..............318
Piracy under Municipal law 319

CHAPTER 19

AIR LAW (INCLUDING AIRCRAFT-HIJACKING)

Air Space : Various theories regarding air space.......................320
Aerial Navigation..............................320
  Paris Convention, 1919 320
  Havana Convention 321
  Warsaw Convention, 1929.............321
  Chicago Convention, 1944 321
  Five Freedoms of Air 322
Aircraft—Hijacking 323
  Meaning and definition..................323
  Development of Law.....................324
Hague Convention, 1970................324
Montreal Convention, 1971.............325
Montreal Convention, 1991.............325
Hijacking of an Indian Aircraft and I.C.A.O..............................326
Hijacking of an Indian Airlines' Plane (IC 814).........................327
Principle of Universal Jurisdiction.............................328
Evaluation 328
Conclusion.................................330

CHAPTER 20
OUTER SPACE

Development of law.............................332
Legal Status of Outer Space...............334
Outer Space Treaty 334
Agreement on the Rescue of Astronauts, the Return of Astronauts and the Return of Objects Launched into Outer Space (1967)..............................336
Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by Space Objects (1971)...................337
Convention on Registration of Objects Launched into Outer Space (1974)..............................337
Agreement Governing the activities of States on the Moon and other Celestial Bodies (1979)..................338
Vienna Conference on the Exploration and Peaceful Uses of Outer Space (UNISPACE-82 or UNISPACE-II) 339
UNISPACE III.................................340
International Space Year (1992)..........341
India's Mission to the Moon 341
Indian Space Research Organisation's (ISRO) grand Performance 341

CHAPTER 21
NATIONALITY

Definition and meaning......................342
Development of the Law of Nationality and its importance.........342
International Importance of Nationality.................................343
Distinction between Nationality and Domicile 343
Distinction between Nationality and Citizenship.................................344
Modes of Acquisition of Nationality :................................344
- By birth 344
- Naturalization...............................344
- Nottebohm's case 344
- By Resumption 345
- By Subjugation 346
- Cession.......................................346

Loss of Nationality...........................346
- By Release 346
- By Deprivation..............................346
- Long Residence Abroad................346
- By Renunciation...........................346
- Substitution 346

Double Nationality and Nationality of Married Women 346
Statelessness...............................347
Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness (1961)....................348

CHAPTER 22
EXTRADITION

Basis of the principle of extradition 350
Meaning and definition......................350
Is there a general duty of States in respect of extradition ?.................350
Purpose of Extradition......................351
European Convention on Extradition.................................352
Distinction between 'expulsion' (under Foreigners Act, 1946) and 'extradition' 352
Restrictions on surrender...................353
- Non-extradition of political criminal 353
- The Attentat clause 354
- The Russian Project of 1881...........355
- The Swiss Solution to the Problem in 1892 355

Military criminals 355
Religious crimes..............................355
Rule of Speciality 355
Double criminality............................355
Sufficient evidence..........................355
Certain formalities 355
Extradition treaty 355
Accused need not be present 356
A matter of bilateral treaty..................357
Own citizens 357
Restrictions on Surrender under Indian Law 357

Unfettered power or discretion of Central Government to discharge any fugitive criminal........358
Case relating to Refusal to grant extradition of two Burmese students....................................359
Some Indian Cases on extradition :
- Savarkar's case..........................359
- Ram Babu Saxena v. State............359
- State of Madras v. C. G. Menon.......359
- Hans Muller of Nurenburg v. Supdt., Presidency Jail, Calcutta................................360
- Mobarak Ali Ahmad v. State of Bombay................................360
- Tarasov Extradition case...............360
- Sucha Singh's case.......................360
- Dharam Teja's case......................360
- Naval Officer Extradition case........360
- Narang Brothers Extradition case.....................................360
- SAARC Accord on Extradition.........361
- India-UK Pact on Extradition...........361

Extradition Treaty between India and Canada................................362
India, Hongkong Pact on Extradition....362
Indo-U.S. Treaty on Extradition...........362
Extradition Treaty Between India and Germany..............................363
Case of Extradition of Famous Music Director, Nadeem.................363
- Case of Extradition of Pinto............363
- Extradition Treaty Between India and Russia.............................364
- Extradition Treaty Between India and Spain...............................364
- Extradition Treaty Between India and France.............................364
- Extradition Treaty Between India and Bulgaria...........................364
- Case Relating to Extradition of Quattroechi.............................364
  - Extradition of Abu Salem............365
- Case of Mallaya's Extradition..........365

CHAPTER 23
ASYLUM

Meaning and Definition 366
Right to Asylum..............................366
Types of Asylum and Distinction between Territorial and Extra-territorial Asylum.........................366
Territorial Asylum 367
The International Protection of Refugees..................................368
- Example of Dalai Lama 369
- Example of Influx of Bangladesh refugees................................369

Extra-territorial or Diplomatic Asylum.................................369
- Asylum in Foreign Embassies 370
- Asylum in Consular Premises..........371
- Asylum in the Premises of International Institutions...........371
- Asylum in Warships 371
- Asylum in Merchant Vessels...........371

Asylum and Extradition are mutually exclusive........................372

CHAPTER 24
TREATMENT OF ALIENS

Admission of Aliens 373
Position of Aliens after admission........373
Protective Jurisdiction of a State over Foreigners..........................374
Exhaustion of Local Remedies' Rule...374
Expropriation of property of Aliens.......378
Protection of Human Rights to Aliens 378
Departure of Aliens from the Foreign Country 378
Expulsion of Aliens...........................378
Mass expulsion of Aliens 379
Human Rights.................................379

CHAPTER 25
INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW AND THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

Meaning of International Criminal Law 380
Proposal for the Establishment of an International Criminal Court 383

U.N. Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice 384

World Conference on organized crime 385

Convention Against Transnational Organised Crimes......386

Adoption of the Statute of international Criminal Court 386

International Criminal Court 387

Establishment of the Court......387

Jurisdiction......387

American Request for exemption from Jurisdiction of International Criminal Court for its personnel of Armed Forces allegedly guilty of War Crimes in Iraq......388

Applicable Law......388

General Principles of Criminal Law 389

- Nullum crimen sine lege......389
- Nulla Poena Sine lege 389
- Non-retroactively ratione personal....389
- Individual Criminal responsibility 389

Composition......389

Place of Trial 390

Penalties......390

Appeal and Revision 390

Compensation to an arrested or convicted person 390

General obligation to co-operate..........390

Enforcement 390

Assembly of State Parties......391

Settlement of Disputes......391

Reservations......391

Review of the statute 391

Withdrawal......392

Conclusion......392

Entry into Force of Amendments to the Regulations of the International Criminal Court 392

Latest position of the cases before the Court 392

U.N. War Crimes Commission to investigate war crimes in former Yugoslavia......393

Establishment of an International Tribunal for Prosecution of violators of International Humanitarian Law in former Yugoslavia......393

Establishment of the International Tribunal for Rwanda 394

United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime 395

Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking Persons, Especially Women and Children.......396

Protocol Against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air.........396

CHAPTER 26

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION AND THE EVOLUTION OF A NEW INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC ORDER

Introduction 397

U. N. Charter Provisions 397

Evolution of a New International Economic Order......398

Background to the proposed New International Economic Order 398

- U. N. Declaration on the establishment of a New International Economic Order......399

Programme of Action on the establishment of A New International Economic Order.........402

The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties 402

Structure of the Charter......403

Fundamental Principles 404

Economic Rights and Duties of States......405

Permanent Sovereignty over Wealth and Natural Resources......405

Foreign Investment......405

Transnational Corporations 405

Nationalization and Expropriation of Foreign Property......406

Organization of Primary Commodity Procedures 407

Transfer of Technology......407

Promotion, Expansion and Liberalization of World Trade......408

Utilization of Resources Freed by Effective Disarmament Measures 408

Elimination of Colonialism, Apartheid etc. and Restitution and Full Compensation for Exploitation of the Natural and other Resources of the Territories Affected 409
  Extension of Tariff Preferences.......409
  Most-Favoured-Nation Treatment 409
  Indexation of Prices.....................409
Common Responsibilities towards the International Community...........410
Final Provisions 410
Significance of the Declaration, Programme of Action and the Economic Charter........................410
Eleventh Special Session of the General Assembly 412
Implications of the New International Economic Order 412
Conclusion.....................................412
Cancun Summit etc..........................413
UNCTAD VII 413
Brady Plan 413
Paris Summit Conference of seven Developed Countries.....................414
Ninth replishment of I.D.A.................414
UNCTAD - VIII.................................414
UNCTAD - IX...................................414
UNCTAD - X....................................416
UNCTAD - XI...................................416
UNCTAD - XII..................................416
UNCTAD - XIII.................................416
UNCTAD - XIV.................................416
G-20 Leaders Meet 416
World Trade Organization..................417
India and U.S. agree on Trade Pact framework.................................417

CHAPTER 27

DEVELOPMENT AND ENVIRONMENT

Development...................................418
Corona virus...................................421
Relevance of General International Law to Environment.....................422
International Co-operation for the Regulation of Environmental Conservation..............................423
Stockholm Conference of 1972 on the Human Environment................424
  Declaration on Human Environment..........................424
  The Action Plan for the Human Environment..........................425
  Resolution on Institutional and Financial Arrangements.............425
  Resolution on Designation of World Environment Day 426
  Resolution on Nuclear Weapon Tests 426
  Resolution on the convening of a Second Conference on Environment..........................426
  Decision to refer to Governments recommendations for action at the national level......................426
Work of UNEP & other Developments in the field of Environment..............................426
Habitat II 427
Nairobi Declaration (1982).................428
Environment and Charter of Economic Rights and Duties, 1974 428
Environment and the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.................................428
The System-wide Medium Term Environmental Programme 428
Environmental Perspective to the year 2000 and Beyond..................429
1994 World Conference on Natural Disaster Reduction.......................429
Nuclear Safety and Environment 429
Legality of the use by a state of Nuclear weapons in armed conflict and its effects on health and environment 431
Global Warming, Depletion of Ozone layer etc. 432
Copenhagen Summit Conference on Climate Change (Dec. 2009) 437
Durban Conference on Climate Change 437
Lima Conference on Climate Change 438
1994 World Conference on Natural Disaster Reduction.......................439
1994 Desertification Convention Adopted 440
Earth Summit (1992) 440

Commission on Sustainable Development 446
Johannesburg Declaration on Sustainable Development 446
First Ministerial Conference of the Forestry Forum for Developing Countries (FFDC) 446
Landmark International Agreement on Forest 447
Conference to Review the implementation of the decisions taken at Rio Earth Summit (1992) 447
Kyoto Environment Summit on Global Warming (Dec. 1997) 447
Conclusion 447

PART III
INTERNATIONAL TRANSACTIONS

CHAPTER 28
DIPLOMATIC AGENTS

Introduction 449
Classification of Diplomatic Agents 450
Functions of Diplomatic Agents 450
The Basis of Immunities and Privileges 450
Immunities and Privileges 451
  Inviolability of Persons of Envoys 452
  Torture of Indian Diplomat in Pakistan 453
  Immunity from criminal jurisdiction of the Courts 454
  Immunity from civil jurisdiction 455
  Immunity regarding residence 458
  Immunity from being presented as witness 458
  Immunity from taxes, dues etc. 459
  Immunity from police rules 459
  Right to worship 459
  Right to exercise control and jurisdiction over their officers and families 459
  Right to travel freely in territory of the receiving State 459
  Freedom of communication for official purpose 460
  Immunity from Local and Military obligations 460
  Immunity from Inspection of Personal baggage 460
  Immunity from Social Security Provisions 460
Duties of Diplomatic Agents etc. 460
Immunities of the Servants of Diplomatic Agents 460
Can Diplomatic Agent waive or lose his immunity ? 461
Consuls 462
Classification of Consuls 462
Functions of Consuls 462
Rights and immunities of Consuls 462
Slashing of Strength of Indian Consulate-General at Karachi from 62 to 20 465
Closure of Pakistani Consulate Office in Bombay 465
Termination of Diplomatic Mission 465
Can a State refuse to accept a Diplomatic Agent? 466
Special Missions of permanent nature 467
Representatives appointed in International Organisations 467
International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons including Diplomatic Agents 1973 468

CHAPTER 29
TREATIES

Definition and meaning of the term "International Treaties" 470
Basis of the binding force 471
Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969 472
Classification of Treaties 473
Parties competent to make a treaty 473
Requirement of Free Consent 473
Various Modes by which a State may express its consent to be bound by a treaty 474
By signature 474

By an Exchange of Instruments constituting a treaty.................474
By ratification, acceptance or approval.................................474
By accession.............................475
By any other means if so agreed......475
Invalidity of Treaties : Can provisions of international law regarding competence to conclude treaties be invoked ?........475
Formation of Treaties........................475
Ratification : Principles of Ratification of Treaty.....................477
Is there a duty to ratify ?...............477
Consequences of non-ratification of a treaty..................................478
Reservation...................................478
Interpretation of Treaties..................481
Amendment and Modification of Treaties...................................482
Termination of Treaties......................483
Consequences of the Invalidity, Termination or suspension of the operation of a Treaty.....................484
Important Maxims—.........................485
Pacta tertles nec nocent nec prosunt.................................485
Rebus sic Stantibus......................486
Pacta sunt Servanda....................488
Unequal Treaties.............................488
Jus Cogens...................................489

PART IV
INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

CHAPTER 30
DEFINITION, FUNCTIONS AND EVOLUTION OF INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

Definition and Essentials of International Organisation..............491
Chief functions of International Organisation...............................491
Evolution of International Organisation..............................491
The concert of Europe..................492
The Hague System.......................492
Private International Unions...........493
Public International Unions............493
Nature and Legal character of International organization.............494
Privileges and Immunities of International organizations............494
Legislative and Regulatory Functions of International organizations.............................497
International Administrative Law..........497
Capacity or Power of International organisations to enter into International Treaties.....................497
Dissolution of International Institutions................................498
Succession of Rights and Duties of International Institutions................498
Convention on Safety of U.N. Personnel (1994)..........................498

CHAPTER 31
THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Origin..499
Principal Organs of the League of Nations...................................500
Assembly..................................500
Council.....................................500
The Secretariat...........................500
Withdrawal of Membership.................500
Functions of the League of Nations......500
Weaknesses and defects of the League of Nations........................501
Factors and Events leading to the Dissolution................................502
Conclusion....................................502

CHAPTER 32
ORIGIN, PURPOSES, PRINCIPLES, MEMBERSHIP ETC. OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Factors and Events leading to the establishment of the U.N...............503
Preamble of the U.N. Charter.............505
Legal Character of the U.N. 505

Purposes of U.N.—..........................506
  To maintain International peace and security..........................506
  To develop friendly relations among nations..........................506
The Principle of Self-Determination......506
Question of Self-Determination in Kashmir..........................510
  International Co-operation in solving international problem of economic, social, cultural and humanitarian character..........................510
  To make the U.N. a centre for the attainment of the above common ends..........................510
Principles of the U.N.—..........................510
  The principle of the sovereign equality of all members..........................510
  Fulfilment of obligations in good faith..........................511
  Peaceful settlement of international disputes..........................511
  Principle of non-intervention..........................511
  All Members to Assist U.N. in preventive action..........................511
  Non-Members to act in accordance with principles for maintenance of peace and security..........................511
  Non-intervention in domestic matters of State..........................511
Membership—..........................512
  Whether the practice of the U.N...... consistent with provisions of the Charter..........................512
Question of the representation of Communist China in the U.N...........513
Byelorussia and Ukraine as U.N. Members..........................514
Question of Membership of Yugoslavia..........................515
Is withdrawal of a Member-State from the U.N. possible ?..........................515
Expulsion of a member from the U.N..........................516
Suspension of Members..........................516
  Principal Organs of the United Nations..........................516
Comparison between League of Nations and U.N...........................517
Convention on the Safety of U.N. Personnel,1999..........................520

CHAPTER 33

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Composition..........................521
Voting Rights..........................521
Functions and Powers—..........................521
  Deliberative Functions..........................521
  Limitations of the General Assembly..........................522
Legal Significance of U.N. General Assembly Resolutions..........................523
  Supervisory Functions..........................525
  Financial Functions..........................525
  Financial crises faced by the U.N..........................527
  Elective Functions..........................531
  Regarding admission of new States to the United Nations.......531
  Regarding election of members of other organs..........................531
  Constituent Functions..........................532
Expanding Role of General Assembly—Uniting for Peace Resolution, 1950..........................532
Validity of Uniting for Peace Resolution..........................533
Procedure..........................535
General Assembly Resolutions as a source of Universal International Law..........................535
Establishment of Subsidiary Organs by the General Assembly..........................535
Recent Sessions of the General Assembly..........................536
Evaluation of the work of the General Assembly..........................537

CHAPTER 34

THE SECURITY COUNCIL

Composition..........................539
Need for enlargement of the Security Council..........................539
Voting Rights..........................541
Functions and Powers of the Security Council..........................542
  Maintenance of International Peace and Security..........................542

- Pacific Settlement of disputes 543
- Sanctions against aggressor, etc....543
- Definition of 'aggression'................545
- Consequences of the failure of the Security Council..................547
- Veto and its effect on the efficiency of the Security Council..................................547
- Indian view on Veto system............549
- Contribution of the Security Council in the maintenance of Peace and Security 549
- Evaluation 550
- Elective Functions........................551
- Supervisory Function.....................551
- Constituent Functions....................551
- Double Veto 552
- Relationship between Security Council and the General Assembly 552
- Comparison of the League Council with the Security Council..................................553
- Limitations of the Security Council.......554
- Binding Character of the Resolutions of Security Council.......555
- First Ever U.N. Council Summit............555

CHAPTER 35

THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

- Composition....................................556
- Voting..556
- President.......................................556
- Powers and Functions.......................556
- Economic and Social Progress............557
- Council of the Twenty-first Century 558
- Agenda for Development...................559
- Evaluation 560

CHAPTER 36

THE INTERNATIONAL TRUSTEESHIP SYSTEMS AND THE TRUSTEESHIP COUNCIL

- The International Trusteeship System 562
- Trusteeship Council.........................563
  - Composition...............................563
  - Voting......................................563
  - Functions and powers 563
- Problems of the Independence of Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands or Micronesia....................563
- Trusteeship mandate of palau ends..565
- Independence of South-West Africa (Namibia) 565
- General Assembly's Ninth Special Session on Namibia 566
- South Africa Debarred from 35th Session of the General Assembly 566
- General Assembly's call for total sanctions against South Africa 567
- Paris Declaration on sanctions against South Africa 567
- The International Conference in support of the Struggle of the People for Independence (Paris, 1983).......................................567
- Namibia Day..................................567
- Emergence of Namibia as an Independent State.......................568
- Difference between mandatory system and trusteeship system 568
- Evaluation 569

CHAPTER 37

THE SECRETARIAT

- Composition..................................570
- Functions of the Secretary-General.....................................571

CHAPTER 38

THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE

- Introduction 580
- Composition..................................581
- Indian Judge Elected to ICJ...............582
- Law applied by the International Court of Justice 582
- Ex aequo et bono 582

Binding force of decisions of International Court of Justice..........582
Jurisdiction..........583
Method of conferring jurisdiction upon the Court..........583
Main heads of Court's Jurisdiction..........584
Contentious Jurisdiction..........584
Voluntary Jurisdiction..........585
Optional Jurisdiction..........585
India's Declaration under the optional clause of the Statute of the World Court..........586
Is the acceptance of jurisdiction under optional clause really compulsory jurisdiction ?..........588
Transferred jurisdiction..........588
Interim Measures or Relief..........591
Preliminary Objections..........594
Court's Power to allow a State to intervene in a case to which it is not a party..........595
Advisory Jurisdiction..........598
Court's competence in respect of determination of its own jurisdiction..........600
Problem of the enforcement of the Judgments of I.C.J...........601
Contribution of I.C.J. in the codification and progressive development of International Law..........603
Cases decided under contentious jurisdiction..........604
Anglo-Norweigian Fisheries cases..........604
Corfu Channel Case..........604
The Asylum (Columbia v. Peru) Case..........604
Minquiers and Ecrehos (France v. U.K.)..........604
Nottebohm (Liechtentein v. Guatemala)..........604
North Sea Continental Shelf case..........604
Nuclear Tests case..........604
Fisheries Jurisdiction (Merit) case (U.K. and Northern Ireland v. Iceland)..........605
Aegean Sea Continental Shelf case (Greece v. Turkey)..........605
Case concerning United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (1979)..........605
Case concerning the Continental Shelf (Tunisia v. Libya) (1982)..........605
Case Concerning Military and Para--military Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. U.S.) (1984)..........605
Case Concerning the Continental Shelf (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya-Malta), dated 21st, March, 1984..........605
Case concerning Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in Gulf of Maine Area (Canada v. U.S.)..........606
Case concerning Military and Para-military Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. U.S.)..........606
Case concerning the Continental Shelf (Libya v. Malta)..........606
Case Concerning Military and Para-military Activities in and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America)..........606
Case concerning Electronica Sicula (Elsi), [U.S.A.v. Italy], Judgement of 20 July 1989..........606
Land, Island and Maritime Disputes case (El Salvador v. Honduras) 1990..........606
Fisheries Jurisdiction case (Spain v. Canada) Judgment of 4th December, 1998..........606
Case Concerning the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Germany v. United States of America) Judgment of 3rd March, 1999..........606
Case Concerning the Legality of Use of Force (Yugoslavia v. U. S.) Judgment of 2nd June, 1999..........606
Arrest warrant of 11th April 2000 (Democratic Republic of Congo)..........606
Case Concerning the Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia Harzegovina v. Yugoslavia) (2003)..........606
Avena and other Mexican Nationals (Mexico v. United States of America) (2004)..........606

Certain Property (Liechtenstein v. Germany) (2005)....................607
Armed Activities in the Territory of Congo (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Uganda) (2005)....................................607
Frontier Disputes (Benin v. Nigar 2005)....................................607
Armed Activities on the Territory of Congo (New Application, 2002) (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Rwanda) (2006).......607
Landmark Ruling on Bosnian Genocide................................607
Paper Mills on the River Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay) 607
Certain Activities carried out by Nicaragua on the border (Costa Rica v. Nicaragua) [2010]....................................607
Frontier Dispute (Burkino Faso/Niger) [2010]....................607
Whaling in the Arctic (Australia v. Japan) [2010].......................607
Construction of a Road in Costa Rica (Nicaragua v. Costa Rica) [2011]............................607
Request for Interpretation of the Judgment of 15 June, 2012 in the case concerning the Temple of Vihear (Combodia v. Thailand) (2011)....................607
Construction of a Road in Costa Rica along with the San Juan River (Nicaragua v. Costa Rica) (2011)............................607
Request for Interpretation of the Judgment of 15 June, 2012 in the case concerning the Temple of Preah of Vihear (Combodia v. Thailand) (2011)....................................607
Request for the Interpretation of the judgement of 15 June, 1962 in the case concerning the Temple of Preah of Vihear (Decision of 11 November, 2013)....................................607
Case Relating to South China Sea.......................................608
Case Relating to Sentencing to Death of Kulbhusan Jhadhav (India v. Pakistan)....................608 case Concerning Sovereignty over Pedra Branca/Pulau Batu Puteh, Middle Rocks and South Ledge (Malaysia/Singapore) (Malaysia v. Singapore) (2017-2018).............608
Obligation to Negotiable Access to the Pacific Ocean (Bolivia v. Chile) (2013-2018).................608
Advisory opinions of the Court............608
Conditions of admission of a State to the U.N. (1948).............608
Competence of General Assembly regarding Admission of a State to the U.N. (1950).............................608
Reparation of injuries suffered in the service of the U.N. (1949)...................................608
International Status of South-West Africa (1950)....................609
Reservations to the convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide................................609
Effects of Awards of Compensation made by the U.N. Administrative Tribunal.......609
Certain expenses of the U.N. (1962)...................................609
Advisory opinion concerning the legal consequences of the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia......................609
Advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice in the western Sahara case........609
Interpretation of the Agreement of 25 March, 1951 between W.H.O. and Egypt (1980)...........610
Application for Review of Judgment No. 273 of the U.N. Administrative Tribunal..............610
Advisory opinion on applicability of the obligation to Arbitrate under Section 21 of the U.N. Headquarters Agreement of 23 June, 1947 (Advisory opinion of 26th April, 1988) 610
Legality of the use by a state of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict (Decision dated 8-7-1996) [Request for advisory opinion by WHO]..........................611

Advisory opinion on Legality of the Threat or use of Nuclear Weapons—Request for Advisory opinion by the General Assembly of the U.N. (Opinion dated July, 1996) 611
Differences Relating to Immunity from Legal Process of a Special Reporteur of the Commission on Human Rights (1988-1999) 612
Judgment No. 2667 of Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation upon a complaint filed against the International Fund for Agricultural Development 612
50th Anniversary of the International Court of Justice 612
60th Anniversary of the International Court of Justice 612
Evaluation 612

CHAPTER 39

THE SPECIALIZED AGENCIES

The General Nature of the Specialized Agencies 616
Some Specialized Agencies—
I.L.O 617
W.H.O 620
U.N.E.S.C.O. 622
F.A.O 623
I.C.A.O. 624
IBRD (Bank) or World Bank 625
I.D.A 626
I.F.C 627
I.M.F 629
U.P.U 631
I.T.U 632
W.M.O. 632
I.M.O. 633
I.F.A.D. 633
U.N.I.D.O. 634
W.I.P.O 634
W.T.O. 635
MIGA 636
Conclusion 636
Development of International Law by Specialized Agencies 637

CHAPTER 40

WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION

Background 638
Establishment of WTO 639
Membership 640
Withdrawal from Membership 640
Structure 640
Functions of WTO 641
Decision—Making 641
Dispute Settlement Mechanism 642
Acceptance, Entry into force etc 643
WTO in Action 643
First Ministerial Conference, 1996 (Singapore) 643
Second Ministerial Conference, 1998 (Geneva) 643
Third Ministerial Conference, 1999 [Seattle (US)] and November 2001 643
Doha (Qatar) Ministerial Conference (November, 2001) 644
Cancun (Mexico) Ministerial Conference (September, 2003) 645
Hong Kong (Sixth) Ministerial Conference 645
Efforts to end the Deadlock of Doha Conference 646
Seventh Ministerial Conference of W.T.O. (Geneva) (Nov.-Dec. 2009) 647
Eighth Ministerial Conference of W.T.O. (Geneva) (Dec. 2011) 647
Ninth Ministerial Conference of WTO (Indonesia) (Dec. 2013) 647
Tenth Ministerial Conference of W.T.O. (Nairobi) (Dec. 2015) 647
Eleventh Ministerial Conference W.T.O. (Buenos Aires) (Dec. 2017) 647
Twelfth Ministerial Conference W.T.O. (Kazakhistan) (Dec. 2019) 647
WTO and India 647

CHAPTER 41
COLLECTIVE SECURITY

The Concept of Collective Security......651
Covenant of the League of Nations and Collective Security..................651
U. N. Charter and Collective Security....652
First Ever Summit of the Security Council..655
Distinction between Collective Security and Collective Self-defence..655
Conclusion..655
Gulf War (1991) and Collective Security..656

CHAPTER 42
REGIONALISM AND REGIONAL ARRANGEMENT

Regionalism under the League of Nations..657
Regionalism under the U.N. Charter......657
Regional and Global Security..............659
Important Regional Agreements..........659
  Organization of American States (O.A.S.)..................................659
  Arab League................................660
C.E.N.T.O...................................660
O.A.U..660
N.A.T.O.....................................661
Warsaw Treaty or Pact..................662
Dissolution of Warsaw Pact............662
O.S.C.E.....................................662
Conclusion..663

CHAPTER 43
MAINTENANCE OF INTERNATIONAL PEACE AND SECURITY : APPRAISAL AND NEW TRENDS

Introduction..665
Role of Security Council....................668
Role of General Assembly..................668
  Uniting for Peace Resolution...........669
Role of Secretary-General..................669
Role of Regional Arrangement.............669
First-ever Summit Level—Meeting of the Security Council—New challenges and New Trends............670
Secretary-General's Response—An Agenda for Peace....................670
Preventive Diplomacy........................671
Peace-Making................................671
Peace-Keeping................................671
Existing U.N. Peace-keeping operations around the world............672
Past U.N. Peace Keeping operation.....675
Post-conflict Peace-Building..............675
U.N. Rapid Force Proposal Rejected.....676
Conclusion..676

CHAPTER 44
DISARMAMENT

Introduction..678
Disarmament before The League of Nations..678
League of Nations and Disarmament....678
United Nations and Disarmament.........679
  Establishment of the U.N. Atomic Energy Commission........680
  Baruch Plan................................680
Establishment of Disarmament Commission................................681
Establishment of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA)........681
  Antarctica Treaty........................681
  Disarmament Efforts from 1960 to 1970..................................681
Disarmament Decade (1970-1980)...683
Sea-bed Treaty, 1972....................683
Convention on Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction, 1971....................684
Disarmament and Outer Space........684
S.A.L.T.....................................684
Convention on the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacterio-logical and Toxin Weapon and on their Destruction............................685

Geneva Disarmament Conference, 1974 685
Special Session of General Assembly on Disarmament in 1978 685
Evaluation of Disarmament efforts by the U.N. 686
Recent Developments—
  Star War 687
  New types of weapon to counter ICBM's 688
Six Leader's Appeal for Disarmament ...688
U.S. Developings Anti-matter weapon...688
U.S. Raising Arsenal for Germs war......688
Failure of U.S.—U.S.S.R. Summit........688
Intermediate Nuclear Forces Treaty or I.N.F. Treaty 688
Indian Proposals to ban Nuclear arms...688
U.S.—U.S.S.R. agreement to ban chemical weapons 689
U.S.—U.S.S.R. summit on Naval Arms Control 689
U.S. Pledge to Destroy Chemical Weapons 689
Signing of START Treaty 689
Major Voluntary cuts announced by the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. 689
Problem of Nuclear Proliferation arising as a result of the breaking up of the Soviet Union.......689
Register of Conventional Arms 689
Convention on the Prohibition, Production, Stockpiling and use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction, 1993 690
Convention of Prohibition on Restriction on the use of certain conventional weapons which may be deemed to be excessively injurious or to have indiscriminate effect, 1981 690
Nuclear Arms Reduction Treaty (START II) Between Russia and America 690
American President Bill Clinton's Declaration not to conduct Nuclear Text till October, 1994 690
U.S. Russia sign Accord on Ukraine's N-Arms 691
Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTBT) 691
Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty Review Conference 692
Convention on the Prohibition of use, stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and their Destruction 692
Biggest Arms Reduction Pact between U.S. and Russia 693
Conclusion 693

CHAPTER 45

INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY (IAEA)

Objective 695
Functions 695
Membership 695
Structure 696
Headquarters 696
IAEA and Iran 696
Evaluation 698
IDEA and Indo-U.S. Nuclear Deal.........698

CHAPTER 46

AMENDMENT OF THE U.N. CHARTER

Whether wholesale change or amendment of the Charter is feasible and necessary 699
Is desirable change possible without wholesale amendment of the Charter? 699
Procedure for amendment 700
Amendment made so far and their consequences 700
Some proposals for the amendment of the Charter 701
Enemy clause certain to be deleted......703
Enlargement of the Security Council 703
Proposals on peaceful settlement of Disputes 703
India and the General Review of the U.N. Charter 704

CHAPTER 47

EVALUATION OF THE WORK OF THE UNITED NATIONS

Initial hopes 706
The Role of Great Powers..................706
Maintenance of Peace and Security 706
Regional Arrangements 707
Place of General Assembly 707
The Role of the Secretary-General.......708
Colonialism 708
Human Rights and Fundamental Freedom....................................708
Economic and Social Field.................709
Conclusion....................................709

PART V

THE LAWS OF WAR

CHAPTER 48

SETTLEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL DISPUTES

Pacific Means of Settlement of International disputes 712
- Arbitration..................................712
- Permanent Court of Arbitration........713
- The Kutch Arbitration Award (1968)..................................714
- Indian Council of Arbitration (ICA)....................................715
- Advantages and disadvantages of arbitration, etc.....................715
- Judicial Settlement.......................716
- Distinction between arbitration and Judicial Settlement 716
- Forum Prorogatum........................718
- Consent contained in Treaties and Conventions......................718
- Doctrine of Forum Prorogatum and the Advisory Proceedings of the International Court of Justice..................................719
- Negotiations...............................719
- Good Offices.............................719
- Mediation...................................719
- Distinction between 'Good Offices' and 'Mediation' 719
- Conciliation................................719
- Enquiry 720
- Settlement of International disputes under the U.N.O...........720

Compulsive or coercive means of settlement 724
- Retorsion...................................724
- Reprisals...................................724
- Difference between retorsion and reprisal.............................726
- Embargo....................................726
- Pacific blockade 726
- Intervention 727
- Settlement under the Auspices of the U.N 727
- International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID).......................727

CHAPTER 49

WAR, ITS LEGAL CHARACTER AND EFFECTS

Definition of 'War' 729
Non-war-armed conflict......................729
Need for amendment of laws of war 730
Commencement of war 731
Legal Regulation of War.....................731
Effects of outbreak of War 734
- General effects...........................734
- Diplomatic and Consular Relations................................734
- Treaties.......................................734
- Trading and Intercourse in Commerce 735
- Contracts 735
- Enemy Property...........................735

Combatants and non-combatants........736
Concept of 'Total War' 737
Fides etiam hosit Servanda 737

CHAPTER 50

ENEMY CHARACTER

Enemy Character of Individuals..........738
Enemy Character of Corporations........738
Enemy Character of Ships..................739
Enemy Character of Goods 740
Transfer of enemy Ships....................740
Transfer of Goods in Sea 740

CHAPTER 51

LAWS OF LAND WARFARE

Introduction 741
Conference of State Parties to the 1925 Geneva Protocol and other Interested States on the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons (1989)..........................742
Convention on the Prohibition, Production, Stockpiling and use of Chemical Weapons and on their Destruction (1993)................742
Laws of Land Warfare.......................742
Prohibited Means in Land Warfare........743
Ruses of War or Stratagem................744
Deceit..744
Espionage 744
Geneva Convention on Prisoners of War, 1949..................................745
Guerrillas.......................................749
Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field (12 August, 1949)..749
Geneva Convention relating treatment of Dead and Injured Members of Armed Forces.............750
Red Cross Personnel and Red Cross Insignia 752
Red Cross, Red Crescent and other Recognized Emblems....................753
Perfidy..753
Geneva Convention relating to treatment of civilian persons in time of War (12 August, 1949)......753

CHAPTER 52

BELLIGERENT OCCUPATION

Belligerent Occupation......................759
Rights and Duties of occupying power—
  Hague Convention of 1907 760
  Geneva Convention of 1949 on Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War..........................761
  Criticism.....................................763
  Protocol additional to the Geneva Convention of 1949 and Relating to Protection of victims of International Armed Conflicts 763
  Protocol Additional Relating to Protection to victims of non-International Conflicts (Protocol II)............................764
  Protocol Additional Relating to the adoption of distinctive Emblems (Protocol III)...............764

CHAPTER 53

LAWS OF MARITIME WARFARE

Laws of Maritime Warfare...................765
Interference with Submarine Telegraph Cables 766
Geneva Convention on Wounded, Sick and Ship-wrecked members of armed forces at sea...................766
Laws of Submarine Warfare................767
The Status of Foreign war ships...........768

CHAPTER 54
LAWS OF AERIAL WARFARE

Laws of Aerial Warfare.......................770
Legality of Atomic or Nuclear Warfare...773
Legality of Conducting of Nuclear Tests.......................................774
Legality of Nuclear test conducted by India : Pokhran Explosion..........775
Conclusion....................................776
Star War and International Law............776

CHAPTER 55
WAR CRIMES

Sanctions of Laws of War..................777
Definition of 'War Crimes'...................777
  Crimes Against Peace...................778
  War Crimes................................778
  Crimes Against Humanity...............779
U.N. War Crimes Commission.............779
Convention on Applicability of Salutary Limitation to War Crimes.......................................779
Important War Crimes Trials...............779
  The Scuttled U. Boats Case (1940)..779
  Neuremberg Trial..........................780
  Tokyo Trial.................................782
  Peleus Trial................................783
  Eichmann case............................783
Mai Lai Trial.................................784
Chernigov Trial............................784
U. N. War Crimes Commission to investigate War Crimes committed in former Yugoslavia.............................784
Establishment of an International Tribunal for Prosecution of Violators of International Humanitarian Law in former Yugoslavia...........785
Milosevic War Crimes Trial.............786
Establishment and statute of International Tribunal for Rwanda.................................786

CHAPTER 56
GENOCIDE

Meaning and Definition......................788
'Genocide' a crime under International Law..........................788
Other main provisions of Genocide Convention................................789
Example of Genocide in Bangladesh................................789
Provisional Measures by World Court against Federal Republic of Yugoslavia for Prevention of Genocide..................................790
Establishment of International Tribunal for Rwanda.......................790
Conclusion....................................790

CHAPTER 57
TERMINATION OF WAR AND POSTILIMINIUM

Modes of termination of War...........791
Simple Cessation of hostilities........791
Conquest followed by annexation.............................791
By a Peace Treaty........................791
By Armistice Agreement................791
By Unilateral Declaration of one or more of the Victorious Powers..................................792
Doctrine of Postiliminium....................792
Case of Elector of Hesse Cassel.........792

CHAPTER 58
NON-INTERNATIONAL ARMED CONFLICTS

Law relating to non-international armed conflicts...........................794
Humane Treatment...........................795
Civilian Population............................796
Conclusion.....................................797

PART VI
THE LAW OF NEUTRALITY

CHAPTER 59
NEUTRALITY

Meaning and definition of the term 'Neutrality' 798
Development of the Law of Neutrality....798
Rational Basis of Neutrality....799
Neutrality under the Covenant of League of Nations....800
Neutrality under the Pact of Paris....801
Neutrality under U.N. Charter....801
Rights and Duties of Neutral States and Belligerent States....802
Duties of Neutral States....802
The Case of Altmark....803
Duties of the Belligerent States....804
Rights of Neutral States and the duties of Belligerents towards the Neutral States....804
Commencement of Neutrality....804
End of Neutrality....805
Kinds of Neutrality....805
Definition of Neutrality, Neutralization and Neutralism....805
Distinction with Neutrality and Neutralism....806
Distinction with 'Neutrality' and 'Neutralization'....806

CHAPTER 60
RIGHT OF ANGARY

Development of the Law relating to Right of Angary....808
Essential Elements....808
Limitations....809

CHAPTER 61
CONTRABAND AND DOCTRINE OF CONTINUOUS VOYAGE

Contraband....810
Meaning and Definition of the term Contraband....810
Kinds of Contraband....810
Contraband may be of two Kinds....810
Consequences of carriage of contraband of war....810
Economic warfare and the Doctrine of Contraband....811
Doctrine of Continuous Voyage....811
The Kim....812

CHAPTER 62
BLOCKADE

Meaning and definition of 'Blockade'....814
Essential elements of blockade....814
Violation of Blockade....815
Consequences of Violation of Blockade....815
End of blockade....816
The Zamora, (1916)....816
Strategic and Commercial Blockade....816
Long distance blockade....817

CHAPTER 63
UNNEUTRAL SERVICE AND RIGHT OF VISIT AND SEARCH

Unneutral Service....818
Distinction between unneutral service and contraband....819
Distinction between unneutral service and hostile service....819
Right of visit and search....819

CHAPTER 64

PRIZE COURTS

Nature of Prize Courts........................820

Jurisdiction of Prize Courts 820

Law applied by Prize Courts...............820

The Appam.......................................821

Ransom of Prize...............................821

Loss of Prize 821

PART VII

HUMAN RIGHTS

CHAPTER 65

UNIVERSAL PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Introduction 822

What are Human Rights 822

U.N. and Human Rights......................822

U.N. Charter and Human Rights...........822

Provisions of the Charter Concerning Human Rights..............823

Human Rights and Domestic Jurisdiction.................................825

U. N. Bodies Primarily concerned with Human Rights........................826

Human Rights Council 826

U. N. Commission on Human Rights.......................................826

Replaced by Human Rights Council.....................................827

Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities..................................829

Commission on the Status of Women.......................................830

U. N. Commissioner for Human Rights.......................................830

Other U.N. bodies primarily concerned with Human Rights.........831

Universal Declaration of Human Rights.......................................831

Preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights...........831

Scheme of the Enumeration of the Rights and the Rights Enumerated in the Declaration 832

- General....................................833
- Civil and Political Rights..............833
- Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.................................835
- Concluding or Miscellaneous Articles 835

Influence of the Universal Declaration on National Constitutions, Municipal laws and Court decisions.......................836

Legal Significance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights...........836

The International Bill of Human Rights...836

Entry into Force of the two Covenants and the Optional Protocols...837

International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 837

International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights...838

Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the two covenants on Human Rights, 1966......................838

Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966..............838

Optional Protocol to the International covenant on Civil and Political Rights, regarding Abolition of Death Penalty..............839

Critical Appraisal and Significance of the International Bill of Human Rights...839

Measures for Implementation of Human Rights..............................839

Human Rights Committee...................839

Methods or ways of Implementation............................840

Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966...............840

Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights Aiming at the Abolition of Death Penalty 840

Methods of Implementation 841

Important World Conferences on Human Rights 841

International Conference on Human Rights or Tehran Conference (22 April to 13 May, 1968) 841

World Conference on Human Rights, Vienna (14 to 25 June, 1993) or Vienna Conference 842

Vienna Declaration 842

Fourth World Conference on Women, Beijing (China) [4-15 September, 1995] 844

Key International Conventions on Human Rights 845

Conventions Relating to Inhuman, Cruel and Degrading Acts 845

Conventions Relating to Vulnerable Groups 848

CHAPTER 66

REGIONAL PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1950) 851

Rights and Freedoms Recognized under ECHR 852

European Court of Human Rights 853

Composition of the Court 853

Some Important cases decided by the European Court of Human Rights 858

European Social Charter, 1961 861

Implementation of the Charter 863

European Convention for Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1987) 863

First protocol to the european convention for the prevention of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment 864

Second protocol to european convention for the prevention of torture and inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment (1993) 865

American Convention on Human Rights, 1969 865

Advisory Opinion Relating to Interpretation of Right to Life 871

Additional protocol to the american convention on human rights in the area of economic, social and cultural rights or "protocol of San Salvador 871

Rights mentioned or Incorporated in the Protocol 872

Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights to abolish death penalty (1990) 874

Inter-American convention to prevent and punish torture (1985) 874

African Charter on Human and People's Rights, 1981 875

African Commission on Human and People's Rights 877

Other Regional Arrangements for the protection of Human Rights 880

CHAPTER 67

NATIONAL PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS—I.

(Protection of Human Rights under Indian Constitution)

Human Rights and Indian Constitution 881

NATIONAL PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS—II

(Under Protection of Human Rights Act)

Introduction 881

Definition of 'Human Rights' under the Act 882

National Human Rights Commission 886

Constitution 886

Headquarters of the Commission.....887
Appointment of Chairperson and other Members.........................887
Term of office of Members..............888
Removal of a Member of the Commission 888
Procedure of the Commission 889
Functions of the Commission..........889
Interpreting the order of the Supreme Court.........................890
Powers relating to inquiries............891
Investigation................................891
Procedure for dealing with complaints...............................893
Steps after inquiry........................894
Procedure with respect to armed forces....................................895
Matters beyond the jurisdiction of National and State Human Rights Commission...................895
Annual and special reports of the Commission 896
Evaluation of the work of the National Human Rights Commission 896
State Human Rights Commission 898
Constitution of State Human Rights Commission....................899
Headquarter of the State Commission 899
Jurisdiction of the State Commission 899
Appointment of Chairperson and other Members of State Commission 900
Removal of a Member of the State Commission 901
Term of office of Members of the State Commissions...................901
Annual and special Reports of State Commission 902
Human Rights Courts in Districts 902
Evaluation of Protection of Human Rights Act, 1993 (Act No. 10 of 1994) 902
Evaluation of Human Rights in India.......................................905
APPENDIX I 907
APPENDIX II...915
INDEX...973

TABLE OF CASES

A

A and others v. U. K. (19th Feb. 2009) 860
A. D.M., Jabalpur v. Shivkant Shukla, AIR 1976 SC 1207 .... 119, 120
A. M. Luther Co. v. Sagar & Co., (1921) 3 K.B. 532 .... 136, 162, 168
Abu Salem's case 365
Admissibility of Hearings of Petitions by the Committees on South West Africa, Advisory opinion, ICJ Report (1956), p. 26 600
Admission to Membership in the U.N., ICJ Rep. (1948) p. 4 .... 4, 6, 18, 27, 512, 608
Adolf Eichmann v. Attorney-General of the Govt. of Israel, (1962) 136 ILR 277 .... 113, 235, 318, 777, 778, 783
Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice in the Western Sahara case, ICJ Rep. 1975 609
Advisory Opinion on the Designation of Worker's Delegates to the International Labour Conference, PCIJ (1922) 471
Advisory opinion in case of Constitution of Maritime Safety Committee of the Inter-Governmental Maritime Consultative Organization (8th June, 1960) 633
Advisory opinion in the case of Judgments of the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO upon complaints against UNESCO, ICJ Rep. (1956) p. 100 83
Advisory Opinion on Effect of Reservations on Entry into Force of the American Convention, (1982) 67 ILR 559 870
Advisory Opinion on the International Status of South West Africa I.C.J. Rep. (1950) 187, 498, 565, 609
Advisory opinion on the Legal Consequences of the continued presence of South Africa in Namibia (1971), p. 16 .... 609, 610, 824
Advisory Opinion on Legality of the Threat or use of Nuclear weapons [Opinion dated 8-7-1996] 611
Advisory Opinion of 1951 on the Reservation to the Genocide Convention ICJ Rep. (1951) p. 15 .... 27, 471, 478
Advisory opinion on Restriction to the Death Penalty, (1983) 70 ILR 449 871
Aegean Sea Continental Shelf, ICJ Rep. (1978) p. 36 .... 262, 263, 614
Aegean Sea Continental Shelf case (Greece v. Turkey), ICJ Rep. (1976) (Preliminary Objections) 591, 594
Aegean Sea Continental Shelf case (Greece v. Turkey), ICJ Rep. 1980 p. 3. 605
Aerial Incident (Israel v. Bulgaria) I.C.J. Rep. 1959.p. 145 589
Aerial Incident (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Rep. (1959) p. 127 590
Al Fin Corporation Patent, in re, (1970) Ch. 160 169
Alabama Claims Arbitration (1872) 713, 799
Air India Statutory Corporation v. United Labour Union, (1997) SCC 377 : AIR 1999 SC 645 883

Altmark, case of 803, 804

Amarjit Singh v. State of Punjab, (2010) 10 SCC 43 884

Ambatielos (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Rep. (1952) p. 28 590

Ambatielos Arbitration Int. LR 23 (1956) 375

Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case, ICJ (1952) p. 93 .... 150, 600

Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. Ltd. v. Idemtsu Kosan Kobushiki Kaisha, 20 Int. Law Reports (1953) p. 305 151

Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. Ltd. v. S.U.P.O.R. 22 Int. Law Reports (1955) p. 23 151

Anglo-Iranian Oil Ltd. v. Jaffrate, (1953)1 WLR 246 151

Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries case, ICJ Rep. (1951) p. 116 .... 59, 261, 604

Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A. K. Chopra, AIR 1999 SC 625, 633 .... 121, 882

Appeal Relating to Jurisdiction of the ICAO Council (India v. Pakistan), ICJ (1972) pp. 46ff 326, 582, 624

Appleby v. U.K. (2003) 859

Applicability of the obligation to arbitrate under Section 21 of the U.N. Headquarters Agreement of 23 June, 1947 [Advisory opinion of 26th April, 1988] 494, 610

Application for Review of Judgment No. 158 of the U.N. Administrative Tribunal, ICJ Rept. (1973) p. 172 .... 536, 609, 610

Application for Review of Judgment No. 273 of the U.N. Administrative Tribunal, ICJ (1982) 536, 600, 609, 610

Application for the Revision of the Judgment on 11th July, 1966 in the case concerning Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (Bosnia v. Harzegovina v. Yogoslavia), Prelimary Objection Yogoslavia v. Harzegovina (2003) 595, 606

Arbitral Award Made by King of Spain on 23rd Dec. 1906 (Honduras v. Nicaragua) 714

Armed Activities in the Territory of Congo (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Uganda) (2005) 607

Armed Activities on the Territory of Congo (New Application, 2002) (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Rwanda) [2006] 601, 607

Armed Actions (Nicaragua v. Honduras) Jurisdiction and Admissibility Judgment, ICJ Reports 1988 p. 76 601

Arrest warrant of 11 April, 2000 (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Beljium, (2012) 232, 455, 606

Asylum (Colombia v. Peru) case I.C.J. Rep. (1950) 59, 71, 366, 370, 604

Avena and other Mexican Nationals (Mexico v. U.S.) (2004) 606

B

Bank of China v. Wells Fargo Bank and Union Trust Co., (1952)104 F. Supp. 59 169

Bank of Ethopia v. National Bank of Egypt & Liquori, (1937) Ch. 517 162

Ban Kanta Das v. State of Assam, 2009 AIR SCW 3608 895

Banque-Internationale v. Goukassow, (1923) 2 K.B. 682 136

Barcelona Traction (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Rep. (1964) p. 6 76

Barcelona Traction case (Second Phase), ICJ Rep. (1970) p. 3 .... 82, 603, 788

Barcelona Traction case, I.C. Ref. (1959) p. 6 590
Batasuna and Herri Batasuna v. Spain (2009) 859
Bentzon v. Boyle, (1815) 9 Cranch 191 at p. 198 78
Bergman v. De Sieyes, (1946)71 F. Supp. 334 458
Boguslawski and Another v. Gdynia Ameryka Line, (1950) 2 All ER 355 168
Brazillian and Serbian Loans case, (1929) PCIJ Series A Nos. 20, 21 343
British Columbia Ele. Rly v. King, AIR 1946 PC 180 220
Brogan v. United Kingdom (1988) 11 ECHR 117 858
Brown's claim case, Annual Digest (1923-24. case No. 35) 343
Bundesrath (1900) 812

C

Canberro case (1912) 713
Carolinethe (1841) 193, 194, 203, 818
Casablanca case, Hague Court Reports Ist Series (1916) p. 110 717
Case concerning Question of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libya v. U.K.) I.C.J. Reports (1992) p. 3 and Libya v. U.S., ICJ Report 1992 p. 114 933
Case concerning Application of Genocide Convention [Bosnia and Herzegovina v. Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro)] I.C.J. Rep. (1993) p. 325 790
Case concerning Bosnian Genocide, (Feb. 26, 2007) 607
Case concerning certain German Interests in Upper Silesia PCIJ Series A (1925) 343
Case concerning Continental Shelf (Libya v. Malta), 21 March, 1984 .... 596, 605
Case concerning Continental Shelf (Libya v. Malta), Judgment of ICJ dated 3 June, 1985 .... 64, 258, 279, 284, 285, 603, 606
Case concerning Continental Shelf (Tunisia v. Libya), (1981) 595, 596
Case concerning Continental Shelf (Tunisia v. Libya), ICJ Rep. 1982, p. 49 .... 277, 278, 280, 284, 605
Case concerning Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine Area (Canada v. U.S.) (1984) 64, 278, 606
Case concerning Electronica Sicula S.P.A. (Elsi) [U.S. v. Italy] Judgment dated, 20th July 1989 .... 376, 377, 606
Case concerning Legality of use of force (Yugoslavia v. United States of America) (Decided on 2 June, 1999) 193, 593, 606, 938
Case concerning Maritime Delimitation and Territorial Question Between Qatar and Bahrain (Qatar) v. Bahrain), (16 March, 2001) 262
Case concerning Military and Para-military Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. U.S.) ICJ Rep. (1986) Judgment of 27 June, 1986 .... 71, 72, 73, 81, 85, 196, 208, 209, 210, 490, 601, 606
Case concerning Military and Para-military Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. U.S.), ICJ Rep. (1984) p. 169 .... 192, 210, 588, 601, 605, 606
Case concerning Paper Mills on the River Uruguacy (Argentina v. Uruguay), 20 April, 2010 607
Case concerning the Aerial Incident of 10 August, 1999 (Pakistan v. India (ICJ Rep. 2000) 941

Case concerning Monetary Gold Removed from Rome in 1943 (Italy v. France, U. K. and U.S.) 602

Case concerning the Aerial Incident of 4th Sept., 1954 (U. S. v. U.S.S.R.) (1958) 600

Case concerning the Application of the Convention of (1902) governing the Guardianship of Infants (Netherlands v. Sweden) [1958] 471

Case concerning the Frontier Dispute (Burking Faso v. Mali) I.C.J. Rep. 1986 .... 76, 591

Case concerning the Temple of Preah Vihear, ICJ Rep. (1962) p. 6 .... 76, 241, 242

Case concerning the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (Germany v. United States of America) (3rd March, 1999) 592, 606, 938

Case concerning U.S. Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (Merits) I.C.J. Rep. (1980) p. 3, ... 146, 452, 453, 455, 458, 605

Case of Banning of Pakistan Airflights through Indian Territory (India v. Pakistan) ICJ Rep. (1972) p. 46 326

Case of Extradition of Pinto 363

Case of Armed Activities on the Territory of Congo (New Application, 2002) (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Rwanda) (2006) 601, 607

Case of Elector of Hesse Cassel 792

Central Bank of India Ltd. v. Ram Narain, AIR 1955 SC 36 217

Century Twenty-one (P) Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 1987 Delhi 124 456

Certain Expenses of the U.N., ICJ Rep. (1962) p. 185 .... 27, 526, 535, 600, 609

Certain Property (Liechtenstein v. Germany) (2005) 600, 607

Chairman Railway Board v. Mrs. Chandrima Das, AIR 2000 SC 986 123

Charan Lal Sahu v. Union of India, AIR 1990 SC 1480 154

Chechnya case, (2009) 859

Chernigov Trial 784

Chorzaw Factory (Indemnity) case (1928) PCIJ Series A. No. 17, p. 29 .... 76, 142, 150

Chung Chi Chiung v. R. (1939) AC 160 217

Civil Air Transport Incorporated v. Central Air Transport Corporation, (1953) AC 70 171

Civil Rights Vigilance Committee, S.L.S.R.C. College of Law, Bangalore v. Union of India, AIR 1983 Kant. 85 120

Competence of the General Assembly Regarding the Admission of a State to the U.N., ICJ Rep. (1950) p. 4 .... 513, 608

Construction of a Road in Costa Rica (Nicaragua v. Costa Rica) [2011] 607

Cook v. Sprige, (1899) AC 572 182

Corfu Channel case, I.C.J. Rep. (1949) p. 23 .... 142, 192, 194, 195, 203, 265, 266, 422, 602, 604, 718

Crisis in the Law of the Sea : Community Perspectives v. National Egoism, 67 Yale L.J. 438-39 (1958) 256

D

D. K. Basu v. State of West Bengal, (1997) 1 SCC 416, 438 122

D.P. Joshi v. State of Madhya Bharat, AIR 1955 SC 334 345

Dahlab v. Swizerland, (2001) 860
Daimler Co. Ltd. v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Co. (1916) 2 AC 307 738
Danzing Railway Official case, PCIJ (1928) Series B No. 15 ....128, 580
De Haber v. The Queen of Portugal (1851)17 QB 171 136
De Haber v. The Attorney-General for Natal, (1907) AC 326 373
Dharam Teja's case 360
Diversion of water from Muese case, (1937) P.C.I.J. Series A. B. Case No. 70 76
Dogru v. France, (2009) 860
Dollfus Mieget Compagnie S.A. v. Bank of England, (1950)1 All ER 747 224
Dr. Ram Babu Saxena v. The State, AIR 1950 SC 155 ....177, 181, 357, 359
Dralle v. Rep. of Czechoslovakia International Law Reports 17 (1950) p. 155 226
Drifentin Consolidated Gold Mines v. Janson, (1900) 2 QB 339 729
Dudgeion's Case (1981) 860
Duff Development Co. Ltd. v. Govt. of Kelantan, (1924) AC 797 ....135, 139, 224

E

Eastern Extension etc Telegraph Co. Ltd., Nelson's Report, p. 25 82
Eastern Greenland case, PCIJ, (1923) Series A/B No. 53 ....239, 242
Effects of Awards of Compensation made by the U.N. Administrative Tribunal, ICJ Rep. (1954) p. 47 ....31, 81, 534, 536, 609
Ex-parte Petroff (1971) 129, 451
Ex-parte Quirin 778

F

Factor v. Laubenheimer, (1933), 290 US 276 351
Finnish Ships Arbitration (1934), R.I.A.A. iii 375
Fisheries Jurisdiction (Merits) case ICJ Rep. (1974) 603, 605, 614
Fisheries Jurisdiction (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Rep. (1973) 474
Fisheries Jurisdiction case (Spain v. Canada) [4 Dec. 1998] 601, 606, 938
Fisheries Jurisdiction (U. K. v. Iceland) (1973) 605
Ford v. U.S., 273 U.S. 593 219
Fothergill v. Monarch Airlines Ltd., (1981) A.C. 251 Relied on 111
Free Zones of Upper Savoy and District of Gex. PCIJ (1932) Series A/B No. 47 487
Frontier Dispute case (Barkino Faso v. Mali), I.C.J. (1985) Rep. 6 ....76, 81, 83
Frontier Disputes (Benin Niger) (2005) 607
Frontier Dispute (Burkino Faso/Niger) (2010) 607
Frontier Lands case (Belgium v. Netherlands), ICJ Rep. (1959) p. 209 ....241, 242

G

G.B. Singh v. Government of India, AIR 1973 SC 2667 221
Gdynia Ameryka Line (Zeglugowe Spolka Akcyina) v. Boguslndski, (1953) AC 11 ....171, 172

Geipel v. Smith, (1872) LRQB 404 814

German Interests in Upper Silesia, PCIJ Series A No. 6 (1925) 343

German Settlers in Poland, PCIJ (1923) Series 7, No. 6 ..... 181, 343

Golak Nath v. State of Punjab, AIR 1967 SC 1643, 1656 881

Golder v. United Kingdom (1975) ECHR Ser A Vol. 18 859

Govt. of India v. Mobarak Ali Ahmad, (1952) All ER 1060 356

Gramophone Company of India Ltd. v. Birendra Bahadur Pandey, AIR 1984 SC 667 120

Greco-Bulgarian Communities case, P.C.I.J. (1930), Series Bo. No. 17 107

Guarantee Trust Co. of Newyork v. U.S., (1938) 304 U.S. 126 169

Guarantee Trust Co. v. U.S., 340 U.S., 140 168

H

Handyside v. United Kingdom (1968) ECHR Ser A., Vol. 24 858

Hans Muller of Nuremburg v. Superintendent, Presidency Jail, Calcutta and others, AIR 1955 SC 367 ..... 352, 353, 360

Harbhajan Singh v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 9 457

Haya De la Torre case, I.C.J. Rep. (1951) p. 71 370

Hilton v. Guyot, 159 US 113 112

Hudson case 139, 238

I

I'm Alone, PCIJ (1928) 150

I.C.A.O. Jurisdiction case (India v. Pakistan), ICJ Rep. (1972) p. 46ff 326, 582

In re Berubai Union and Exchange of Enclaves, AIR 1960 SC 845 ..... 118, 243, 244

In re Piracy, Jure Gentium, (1934) AC 586 ..... 37, 316, 317

Island of Palmas case (Netherlands v. U. S.) (1928) 2 R.I.A.A. 829 ..... 242, 713

Interhandel (Preliminary Objections) case, ICJ Rep. (1959) p. 6 ..... 375, 376, 377, 594

International Fisheries Company case between U.S. and Mexico (1926) 149

International Tin Council case (J. H. Raynor Ltd. v. (Mining Law) Department of Trade and Industry (1990) 2 A.C. 418 111

Interpretation of Peace Treaties with Bulgaria, Hungary and Romania, (First Phase), ICJ Rep. (1950) 599, 610

Interpretation of the Agreement of 25th March, 1951, between the WHO and Egypt (1980) 494, 495, 496, 610

In the case of Ionian Ship, (1855) 2 Spinks 212 139

Ireland v. United Kingdom (1978) ECHR Ser A., Vol. 25 859

Island of Palmas Arbitration, (1929) 133, 238, 239, 240, 241

J

J.S. Yadav v. State of U.P., 2009 (4) All ALJ 485 (DB) 899

Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F.2d. 547 (1962) 354

Jolly George Varghese v. Bank of Cochin, AIR 1980 SC 470 ..... 108, 119

K

K.T.M.S. Abdul Cader and others v. Union of India, AIR 1977 Mad. 386 ..... 219, 220, 221

K. Murugesh v. Registrar of State of Human Rights Commission, Tamil Nadu, AIR 2009 Mad. 1 892

Kesavanand Bharti v. State of Kerala (1973) 4 SCC 225 .... 836, 881
Kevance v. France, (2009) 860
Krajina v. Tass Agency, (1949) 2 All ER 274 225
Kuenigi v. Donner Smarak, (1955) 1 QB 515 739
Kutch Arbitration Award, (1968) 78, 714
Kishore Chand v. State of H.P., 1991 (1) SCJ 68, 76 881

L

Lachman Dass v. Jagat Ram, (2007) 10 SCC 448 884
Lake Lanoux Arbitration (France-Spain), AJIL (1959) pp. 156, 171 .... 248, 423
Land, Island and Maritime Disputes case (Elsalvador v. Hundras) I.C.J.R. 1990 598
Landmark Ruling on Bosnian Genocide (February 26, 2007) 607
Lautasi v. Italy 860
Lawless v. Ireland, (1961) ECHR Ser. A Vol. 3, para 28 858
Lazard Brothers v. Midland Bank Ltd., (1933) AC 283 177
Legal consequences for States of the continued presence of South Africa in Nambia (South West Africa) (1971) 56, 508, 555, 566, 609, 824
Legal Status of Eastern Greenland case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 53, pp. 441 242
Legality of the Threat or use of Nuclear Weapons Request for the advisory opinion by the General Assembly (July 8, 1996) 611
Legality of the use by a state of Nuclear in armed conflict. Request for advisory opinion (July 8, 1996) 611, 934
Legality of the use of the Force (Serbia & Montenegero v. Belgium) (1999-2004) 600
Legrand case (Germany v. USA) 463
Leyla Sahin v. Turkey 860
Liability for the acts of Multinational Corporations : Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster 153
Lingens v. Austria (1986) 8 ECHR 407 858
Liandovery Castle (1921) 783

M

M.C. Mehta v. Union of India, AIR 1987 SC 1086 .... 153, 154
M/s. "Saiga" case (Saint Vencent and the Grenadines Guinea) [12th March, 1998] 314
M/s. "Saiga" case (Saint Vencent and the Grenadines Guinea) [4th Dec. 1997] 283, 308, 309, 310, 314
M/s. Zee Tele Films Ltd. v. Union of India, AIR 2005 SC 2677 883
Mac Leod v. U.S., 229 US 434 (1913) 110
Mackninnon Mackenzie & Co. v. Andrey D' Costa, (1987) 2 SCC 469 122
Maghanbhai Ishwarbhai Patel v. Union of India, AIR 1969 SC 783 .... 118, 714
Maharashtra Housing & Development Authority v. Maharashtra State Human Rights Commission, AIR (2010) 2 AIR Bom R 567 885
Mai Lai Trial 784
Mann Singh v. France 860
Mavrommatis Palestine Concession case, PCIJ (1924) Series A, No. 2 .... 76, 127, 343, 478
McCullock v. Maryland, 4 Wheat, 316 (1819) 534

Mighell v. Sultan of Johore, (1894)1 Q.B. 149 ... 136, 223. 224

Minquires and Ecrehos (France v. U.K.) case. ICJ Rep. 1953 p. 47 ... 239, 604

Mobarak Ali Ahmad v. State of Bombay, AIR 1957 SC 857 ... 232, 356, 360

Mortensen v. Peters, 8 Sessions cases (5th Series) 93 (1906) ... 107, 110

Moti Lal v. State of U.P. ILR (1951) 1 All. 269. ... 836

Muscat Dhow's case (1905) ... 713

N

N.C. Dhoundial v. Union of India, AIR 2004 SC 1272 ... 889, 890

Nadeem's case ... 363

Narang Brothers Extradition case (1976) ... 360

National Legal Services Authorities v. Union of India, AIR 2014 SC 1863 ... 885

Naulilaa Incident, (1928)2 RIAA 1012, 1019 ... 466, 725

Naval Officer Extradition case ... 360

Neer Claim, (1926) RIAA, iv, 60 ... 374

Nicaragua v. U. S.(1987) ... 602

Noakes v. Doncaster Amalgamated Colliers Ltd., (1940) AC 104 ... 183

North American Dredging Co. case between U.S. and Mexico, (1926) ... 149

North Atlantic Coast Fisheries case, (1910) ... 713

North Sea Continental Shelf case, I.C.J. Rep. (1955) p. 4 ... 604

North Sea Continental Shelf cases, ICJ Rep. (1962) ... 71, 72, 82, 83, 124

North Sea Continental Shelf, ICJ Rep, (1969) p. 468 ... 262, 263, 272, 275, 278

Nottebohm case, Second Phase, ICJ Rep. (1955) p. 4 ... 342, 344, 345, 604

Nuclear Test case (Australia v. France), ICJ Rep., (1974) p. 253 ... 430, 605, 614, 775

Nuclear Test case (Newzealand v. France), ICJ Rep., (1974) p. 457 ... 430, 605, 614, 775

Nuclear Test case ICJ Rep. (1973) ... 602, 604

Nuremberg Judgment, (1946) ... 194, 780

O

Ohio v. Helvering, 293 U.S. 360 ... 224

Oppenheimer v. Cattermole, (1973) Ch. 264 ... 348

Orinoco Steamship Co. case between U.S. and Venezuela, (1903) ... 149

Orozembo (1807) 6 Ch. Rob. 430 ... 818

Ostime v. Australian Mutual Provident Society (1960) AC 459 ... 111

Owners of the Ship Phillippines Admiral v. Wallem Shipping (Hongkong) Ltd. and others, (1976)1 All ER 71 ... 225

P

P.I. Manichild Canna Reddy v. Ravamma and others, AIR 2007 SC 1753 ... 884

Panevezya-Saldutikis case, PCIJ Rep. (1939) A/B No. 75 ... 343, 374

Paper Mills on the River Uruguay (Argentina v. Uruguay) ... 607

Paquet Habana, (1900)175 US 677 ... 43, 78, 112

Paramjit Kaur v. State of Punjab, AIR 1999 SC 340 ... 884, 886, 889, 890, 891

Patan v. U.K., 1981 ECHR 408 ... 859

Peace Treaties case (First Phase), ICJ Rep. (1950) p. 65 ... 610

Peleus Trial ... 783

Peoples Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, (1997) 2 JT (SC) 311 ... 122

Peoples Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India, AIR 2005 SC 2419.......... 886, 887, 888
Philppson v. Imperial Airways, (1939) A.C. 332 relied on.......................................112
Pious Fund case (1920)..713
Prem Chibbar v. Union of India, AIR 1966 SC 442..183
Prem Shankar Shukla v. Delhi Administration, (1980) 3 SCC 526............................117
Pruneyard Shopping Centre v. Robins, (1980)..860
Punjab State Civil Supplies Corporation v. Punjab Human Rights Commission, 2007 Cr LJ 3842 (P&H)..895

Q

Quattroechi's case..364
Queen v. Keyn, 2 Ex. D. 63 (1876)...33

R

R. v. Ganeshani..303
R. v. Governor of Brizton Prison, ex-parte Kolcynski, (1955) 1 Q.B. 540..............354
R. v. Governor of Brizton Prison, Shtraks, (1963) 1 QB 55...................................354
R. v. Kent, (1941)1 KB 454...461
R. v. Keyn...76
Rafah Partisi v. Turkey...859
Rahimtoola v. Nizam of Hyderabad, (1957) 3 All ER 441...............................224, 225
Rajavi Amar Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1958 SC 28....................................183
Ramlila Maidan Incident, In re (2012) 2 SCC (Civ) 820 : (2012) 5 SCC 1......................952, 953
Re Al Fin Corporation's Patent, (1970) Ch. 160..169
Re Castioni, 189 1 QB 149...354
Re Lynch..342
Re Meunier, (1894) 2 QB 415..354
Regina v. Wilson, (1875) 3 QBD 42...357
Reilly v. King (1914) AC 176..183
Reparation for injuries suffered in the service of the UN, ICJ Rep. (1949) p. 174.......... 6, 27, 30, 36, 126, 128, 147, 150, 494, 506, 603, 608
Rex. v. Godfrey, (1932)1 KB 24...219, 356
Right of Minorities in the Upper Silesia (Minority School), 454 (1928) PCIJ Rep. Series A. No. 12...........718
Right of Passage over Indian Territory case (Portugal v. India), ICJ Rep. (1960) p. 6...........72
Right of Passage over Indian Territory case, ICJ Rep. (1957), p. 125............76, 586, 595
Rights of the U.S. Nationals in Morocco cases, ICJ Rep. (1952) p. 176.....................59, 139
Robert E. Brown's claim, American and British Claims Arbitration Tribunal (1923)..........183
Robins v. Pruneyard Shopping Centre...860
Russian Commerical and Industrial Bank v. Comptird Escompte, (1923) 2 KB 630..............136
Russian Indemnity case (1912)..713

Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Republic v. Cibraria, 235 New York Court of Appeals, 255 .... 169

S

S.S. Lotus case, (1927) PCIJ, Series A. No. 10 .... 33, 72, 75, 218, 219, 221, 230, 231
S.S. Wimbledon, PCIJ (1923), Series A. No. 1 .... 251
Savarker's case (1911) 355, 359, 713
Schooner Exchange v. Mc. Faddon (1812) 7 Cranch 116 .... 222, 224, 230
Shapleigh v. Mier, (1937) 299 US 468 .... 245, 736
Sheela Barse v. Secretary Children's Aid Society, (1987) 3 SCC 50 .... 122
Sherhassan Pirates, (1845) 2 Wm. Rob. 354 .... 316
Shimoda and others v. State (1963) 773
Shiv Kumar Sharma v. Union of India, AIR 1969 Delhi 64 .... 118
Silesian American Corpn. v. Clarke (1947) 322 US 429 .... 735
Soeuring v. United Kingdom (1989) 11 ECHR 439 .... 858
Solomon v. Commissioner of Customs and Excise, (1967) 2 Q. B 116 .... 111
Somerville v. Somerville (1801) 5 Ves. 750 .... 344
South West Africa (Preliminary Objections) cases, ICJ Reports (1962) p. 319 .... 590
South West African case, ICJ Reports (1971) p. 16 .... 56, 506, 552, 595, 609
South West African cases, ICJ Rep. (1966), p. 6 .... 17, 48, 74, 84, 595
Sovfracht case, (1943) AC 203 .... 739
Sri Krishna Sharma v. State of West Bengal, AIR 1954 Cal. 598 .... 110
State of Gujarat v. Vora Fiddali, AIR 1964 SC 1043 .... 183
State of Haryana v. Mukesh Kunwar, (2011) 10 SCC 404 .... 884
State of Kerala v. K. Cheru Babu, AIR 1978 Ker. 43 .... 225
State of M.P. v. Narmada Bachao Andolan, (2011) 7 SCC 639 .... 884
State of Madras v. C. G. Menon, AIR 1954 SC 517 .... 117, 351, 359
State of Madras v. K.M. Raja Gopalan, AIR 1955 SC 817 .... 183
State of Maharashtra v. Sau Shobha Vithal Katte, AIR 2006 Bom 44 .... 883
State of Rajasthan v. Shyamlal, AIR 1964 SC 1495 .... 183
State of West Bengal v. Subodh Gopal, 1954 SC 92 .... 836
Stoeck v. Public Trustee, (1921) 2 Ch. 69 .... 342, 347, 348
Sucha Singh's case 354, 360
Sugandha Ray v. Union of India and others, AIR 1983 Cal. 468 .... 244
Suman Sood alias Kamal Jeet Kaur v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 2007 SC 2774 .... 358
Sunday Times v. United Kingdom (1979) ECHR Sec. A, Vol. 30 .... 859

T

T. K. Varied v. State of Travancore Cochin, AIR 1956 SC 142, ... 116
T. Vellaiyan v. The Registrar, State Human Rights Commission, Chennai, AIR 2005 Mad 80 .... 882
Tarasov Extradition case (1963) 357, 360
Temple of Vihear (Combodia v. Thailand) (2011) 607
Tendtex Trading Corporation v. Central Bank of Nigeria, (1977) 1 All E C 881 .... 226

Terlinden v. Ames, 184 US 270 ... 181

Thai-Europe Tapioca Service Ltd. v. Govt. of Pakistan, (1975) 3 All ER 161 ... 225

The Ambrose Light, 25 Fed. Rep. 408 ... 316

The Appam, 243 US 124 ... 818

The Arantzazu Mendi, (1939) AC 256 ... 163

The case of Eastern Extension etc. Telegraph Co. Ltd. Nelson's Report, p. 75 ... 82

The Charkieh, (1873) LR 4 A & E. 59 ... 139

The Christiana, (1879) 4 PD 39 ... 222

The Constitution (1879) 4 PD 39 ... 136

The Exchange v. Mcfaddon (1812) 7 Cranch 116 ... 136

The Franciska (1855) 2 ECC & Ad 113 ... 814, 815

The Glenory, (1945) AC 124 ... 739

The International Fisheries Company case between U.S. and Mexico (1931) ... 149

The Kim (1915) p. 215 ... 812

The Magellan Pirates, (1853) 1 Sp. Fec. Ad. 81 ... 316

The Maria, (1805) 5 Ch. Rob. 365 ... 812, 819, 820

The Parlement Belge, (1880) 5 PD 197 ... 136, 223

The Recovery (1807) 6 C, Rob 341 ... 820

The Scuttled U-Boats case, (1940) ... 779

Tinoco-Arbitration, (1923) ... 177

Tokyo Trial ... 782

Trail Smelter Arbitration between the U.S. and Canada, (1941) ... 423

Treatment of Polish Nationals in Danzing Territory, PCLJ Series B, No. 44 ... 343

Trendtex Trading Corporation v. Central Bank of Nigeria (1977) 1 All ER pp. 881-911 ... 226

Tukaram Kana Joshi v. Maharashtra Industrial Development Corporation, (2013) 1 SCC (Civil) 491 ... 884

Tunis and Morocco Nationality Decrees, PCIJ (1923) Series B. No. 4 ... 343, 580

U

U. S. v. Canada (1941) Vol. 35 AJIL p. 684 ... 423

U.S. v. Melekh, (1960) 190 F. supp. 67 ... 112

U.S. v. Mexico, General Claims Commission, 1926 ... 149

U.S. v. Percheman, (1963) 32 US 51 ... 245, 736

U.S. v. Pink, (1942) 315 US 203 ... 168, 169

U.S. v. Rauscher, (1886) 119 US 407 ... 355

U.S. v. Schooner ... 76

U.S. v. Wong Kim Ark, (1898) 169 US 649 ... 342

Underhill v. Hernandez, (1897) 168 US 230 at p. 2 53 ... 136, 162

Union Carbide Corporation v. Union of India, AIR 1992 S.C. 248 ... 154

Union of India v. Sudhansu Mazumdar, AIR 1971 SC 1594 ... 245

Union of India v. Sukumar Sen Gupta, AIR 1990 SC 1692 ... 134, 236, 244, 245, 246

Upper Silesians Mixed Tribunal ... 126

V

Vavasseur v. Krupp, (1878) LR 9 Ch D 351 .... 136, 223

Velasquez Rodrigues case (1989) 28 ILM 291 .... 870

Victory Transport Inc. v. Comisaria General-De-Abaste Cimentory, Transporters, 381 US 934 (1965) 226

Vineet Narain v. Union of India, AIR 1998 SC 889 .... 121

Virendra Singh v. State of U.P., AIR 1954 SC 447 .... 183, 184, 188, 245

Vishaka v. State of Rajasthan (1997) 7 JT (SC) 384 .... 120, 121, 122, 882

W

Wemhoff v. Federal Republic of Germany (1968) ECHR Ser. A vol. 8 .... 859

West Rand Central Gold Mining Ltd. Co. v. King, (1905) 2 KB 391 .... 33, 72, 182

Western Sahara case, ICJ Rep. (1975) p. 12 .... 243, 603, 609

Whaling in the Arctic (Australia v. Japan) [2010] 607

Whicker v. Hume, 18, LJ Ch 396 .... 344

Williams v. Bruffy, (1917) 96 US 176 .... 162

Winans v. Attorney-General, (1904) AC 278 .... 344

Y

Yamista 778

Youman's case 145

Z

Zahira Habibullah v. State of Gujarat, AIR 2006 SC 1367 .... 893

Zamora (1916) 2 AC 77 .... 809, 816, 820

Zeiss case (1967) IAS 853 .... 169

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS

	Pages
Treaty of Westphalia, 1648	492
Treaty of Paris, 1815	139
Congress of Vienna, 1815	92, 449, 450, 492
Declaration of Paris, 1856	92, 100, 741, 765, 810
UPU (1857)	18, 631
Geneva Convention, 1864	93, 741
Brussels Conference of 1874	770
Convention Relating to SubmarineTelegraph Cables, 1884	766
Hague Convention, 1899	93, 100, 483, 493, 499, 713, 731, 735, 741, 770
Hague Convention, 1907	93, 100, 483, 493, 499, 731, 735, 741, 742, 743, 760, 765
Declaration of London, 1909	100, 810
Treaty of Versailes, 1919	93, 129, 130, 251, 347, 499, 500
Covenant of the League of Nations, 1919	200, 500, 501, 502, 731
ILO (1919)	617
Statute of the PCIJ	580
Paris Convention of Aerial Navigation, 1919	320
Treaty of Washington, 1922	767, 770, 771
Treaty of Mutual Assistance, 1923	731
Hague Rules of Air Warfare (1923)	770
Geneva Protocol on Arbitration Clauses, 1923	715
Geneva Gas and Bacteriological Warfare; Protocol, 1925	679, 741, 772
Treaty of Locarno, 1925	93, 731
Geneva Convention on Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, 1927	715
Kellogg Briand Pact or Pact of Paris, 1928	93, 732
Pan-American Havana Convention on Asylum, 1928	371
Geneva Convention on the Prisoners of War, 1929	93
Warsaw Convention, 1929	322
Treaty of 1929 between Vatican City and Italy	140
Geneva Convention for the Suppression of Counterfeiting of Currency, 1929	1, 219
London Naval Treaty, 1930	767, 768
Hague Convention of 1930	101, 261, 346, 348
Montovideo Convention, 1933	132, 137
London Submarine Protocol of 1936	768
Convention for Suppression of the Illicit Drug Traffic (1936)	219
Nyon Agreement of September, 1937	768

Declaration of St. James Palace (1941)	503
Atlantic Charter (1941)	503
U.N. Declaration (1942)	503
Moscow Declaration (1943)	504
Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation, (ICAO) 1944	18, 321, 322, 486, 624
Chicago International Air Services Transit Agreement, 1944	323
IMF (1944)	18, 629
Chicago International Air Transport Agreement, 1944	323
UNESCO (1945)	18, 622
U.N. Charter, 1945	6, 18, 27, 68, 92, 101, 130, 191, 192, 193, 195, 196, 394, 398, 399, 485, 505, 506, 507, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 525, 526, 527, 531, 532, 550, 553, 554, 555, 560, 562, 563, 564, 567, 580, 600, 601, 616, 637, 651, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 660, 663, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 679, 680, 720, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 907
Convention on Territorial Asylum (1945)	367
FAO (1945)	18, 623, 637
WHO (1946)	18, 620, 637
ITU (1947)	18, 632
WMO (1947)	632
Convention of 1948, on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft	323
IMO (1948)	18, 633
Statute of the ICJ	. 599
OAS (1948)	659
Convention on Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, 1948	478, 479, 845
Genocide Convention, 1948	128, 382
Geneva Convention on Prisoners of War, 1949	128, 234, 742, 745, 746, 760, 761, 845
International Convention for the Suppression of Traffic in Persons and the Exploitation of the Prostitution of others	846
Geneva Convention on the treatment of dead and injured members of Armed Forces, 1949	750
Geneva Convention on treatment of Civilian Persons in time of War, 1949	753, 845
Red Cross Conventions, 1949	749
Geneva Convention on Wounded Sick and Ship-wrecked Members of Armed Forces at Sea, 1949	742, 766, 845

NATO (1949)	661
Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, 1949	749
European Convention on Human Rights, 1950	128, 376
Convention of the Status of Refugees, 1951	349, 368, 848
Convention on the Political Rights of Women (1952)	848
Rome Convention of 1952 on damage caused by foreign air craft to their party on Service	323
International Convention for Protection of Cultural Property, 1954	772
Convention on the Status of Stateless Persons, 1954	348, 350, 848
Protocol of amendment of Warsaw Convention, 1929 concerning the liability of Air Carrier Passengers and Cargo, 1955	323
CENTO (1955)	660
Warsaw Pact (1955)	662
IFC (1956)	18, 627, 636
Convention on the Nationality of Married Women, 1957	343, 346, 347, 848
Newyork Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, 1958	715
Geneva Convention of Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone, 1958	98, 233, 255, 263, 265, 266, 268,
Geneva Convention on Continental Shelf, 1958	124, 255, 271, 272, 276, 292, 486
Geneva Convention on High Seas, 1958	63, 103, 231, 234, 255, 286, 287, 316, 317, 318, 486
Geneva Convention on Fishing and Conservation of the Living Resources on the High Seas, 1958	287
Protocol of Amendments of the Warsaw Convention 1929 concerning the Liability of the Air Carrier to passengers and cargo	323
Indus Waters Agreement, 1960	248
IDA (1960)	19, 626
Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961	129, 382
Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961	19, 103, 449, 450, 452, 453, 454, 458, 459, 460, 461, 607, 734
Convention on Reduction of Statelessness, 1961	343, 348, 349, 848
1967 Protocol to Convention on Reduction of Stateless Persons, 1961	368
OAU (1963)	660
The Nuclear Weapons Tests Ban Treaty, 1963	423, 773, 776
Tokyo Convention on Hijacking, 1963	323, 325
Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, 1963	19, 103, 462
Vienna Convention on Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage, 1963	145

Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States, 1965	103, 127
International Covenant on the Elimination of All Form of Racial Discrimination, 1966	18, 19, 103, 849
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966	19, 119, 120, 130, 347, 837, 838, 845
International Covenants on Human Rights, 1966	103, 119, 128
International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 1966	19, 122, 837, 838
Outer Space Treaty, 1967	334, 335, 336, 682
Protocol to 1951 U.N. Convention Relating to Status of Refugees (1967)	368
The Agreement on the Rescue of Astronauts, the Return of Objects Launched into Outer Space, 1967	336
WIPO (1967)	18, 635
Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, 1968	10, 18, 423, 429, 682, 773, 776, 938
The International Convention relating to Intervention on the High Seas in cases of Oil Pollution Casualities, 1969	427
Convention on Special Missions, 1969	467
The International Convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution by Damage, 1969	145, 423, 427
Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969	68, 103, 475, 477, 478, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 608
International Convention Relating to Intervention on the High Seas in cases of Oil Pollution Casualties, 1969	423
Hague Convention on Hijacking, 1970	129, 234, 323, 324, 325, 382
Montreal Convention on Hijacking, 1971	323, 325, 326, 329, 382
Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by Space Objects, 1971	145, 337
Convention on Wetlands of International Importance specially as to Waterfowl Habitats, 1971	423, 427
Treaty on the Prohibition of Emplacement of Nuclear Weapons on the Seabed and Ocean-Floor and Subsoil thereof (1971-1972)	423, 773
Convention to Prevent and Punish Acts of Terrorism Taking the forms of Crimes Against Persons and Related Extortion that are of International significance (1971)	918
Convention on the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction, 1971	19, 103, 684, 685
Convention Concerning Protection of World Cultural and Natural Heritage, 1972	19, 423, 427, 772

The Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping of Wastes and other Matter, 1972	423, 427
Anti Ballistic Missile Treaty, 1972	688
Indo-Bangladesh Agreement, 1972, 1974, 1982	244
Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora, 1973	427
Convention for Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping from Ships and Aircraft, 1973	427
Convention on Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected persons including Diplomatic Agents, 1973	103, 382, 468
International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Appartheid, 1973	103, 382, 846
Convention on Registration of Objects launched into Outer Space, 1974	103, 337, 338
Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relation with International Organisation of Universal Character, 1975	103
WTO (1975)	18, 635
IFAD (1976)	18, 633, 637
Protocol Additional to the Geneva Convention of 1949 and Relating to Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts, 1977	19, 772
Gleneagles Accord of June 12, 1977	120
Treaty between U.S. and Panama Guaranteeing permanent neutrality of the Canal, 1977	251
Treaty between U.S. and Panama Guaranteeing the use and Defence of Panama Canal, 1977	251
Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties (1978)	103, 184, 185
Agreement Governing the Activities of States on the Moon and other Celestial Bodies, 1979	338
International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, 1979	19, 382, 846
UNIDO (1979)	18, 634
Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material, 1979	429
Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, 1979	18, 121, 122, 347, 848
Convention on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the use of certain conventional weapons which may be deemed to be excessively injurious or to have Indiscriminate Effects, 1981	743
Nairobe Declaration (1982)	428

U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982/98	19, 103, 232, 237, 253, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 265, 266, 267, 269, 273, 274, 277, 280, 282, 284, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 294, 295, 297, 299, 303, 304, 305, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 315, 316, 317, 318, 428, 603, 768
Vienna Convention on State Property Archives and Debts, 1983	103, 181, 182, 184
Conventions Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, 1984	846
Provisicnal Understanding Regarding Seabed Matters (1984)	305
International Convention Against Apartheid in Sports (1985)	846
Vienna Convention on Protection of Ozone Layer, 1985	13, 19, 433
Convention on Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident or Radiological Emergency (1986)	430, 431
Convention on Assistance in the Event of Nuclear Accident or Radiological Emergency (1986)	430, 431
The International Nuclear Forces Treaty (INF Treaty), 1987	11, 23, 688
Montreal Protocol on Conservation of Ozone Layer, 1987	433
U.S-USSR Agreement to ban chemical weapons (1989)	689
Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal, 1989	19, 155
Declaration by State Parties to 1925 Geneva Protocol and other interested parties on Probilition of Chemical Weapons (1989)	742
UN Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989	18, 103, 849
International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of Their Families (1990)	849
Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), 1991	12, 689
Convention of the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Detection at Montreal, 1991	920
Earth Summit (1992)	440
UN Convention on Bio-Diversity, 1992	18, 103, 442
UN Convention on Forestry, 1992	103, 442
UN Convention on Climate Change, 1992	3, 18, 103, 442
Convention on the Prohibition, Production, stockpiling and use of chemical weapons and their Destruction, 1993	690, 742

Nuclear Arms Reduction Treaty (START II), 1993	690
Agreement Relating to the Implementation of Part XI of U.N. Law of the Sea, 1982 (28th July, 1994)	305
GATT Agreement (1994)	399, 400, 639, 640
International Convention on Nuclear Safety (1994)	431
World Conference on Natural Disaster Reduction (1994)	439
Desertification Convention (1994)	19, 440
Convention on Safety of U.N. and Associated Personnel (1994)	498, 520
Kyoto Treaty on climate change, 1997	13, 19
International Convention for Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, 1997	19, 103, 431
Convention on the Prohibition of the use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and their Destruction, 1997	692
International Convention on Suppression of Financing of Terrorism, 1999	19, 104, 431
Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty Review Conference, 1999	692
U.N. Convention Against Transnational Crimes, 2000	395
Decade for International Disaster Reduction (1900-2000)	439
Stockholm Convention on Persistent Organic Pollutants, 2001	156
UN Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property (2004)	226, 228, 229
Convention for the Suppression of the Acts of Nuclear Terrorism (2005)	104, 431
International Convention on Protection of Persons from Enforced Disappearance, 2006	850
Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, 2006	849
Convention on the International Recovery of Child Support and other Forms of Family Maintenance, 2007	850
Copenhagen Summit Conference on Climate Change (Dec., 2009)	3, 437
Biggest Arms Reduction Pact between U.S. and Russia (2010)	693
Durban Conference on Climate Change, 2011	437
U.N. Convention on Biological Diversity, 2013	442
Lima Conference on Climate Change, 2014	438

Part 1

INTRODUCTORY

CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

Dynamism in Law

Change is the law of nature. Everything, except of course the law of change itself, is subject to change. Law being no exception to this rule is inherently of dynamic character. But the twentieth century (and one and half decades of twenty one century) has witnessed ever accelerating rhythm of change; the scientific and technological developments have unleashed political, economic, social and cultural forces which are transforming the society in an increasing rate. The same trend is continuing with greater acceleration in the Twenty-first century. In view of the unprecedented speed and dynamism that are characteristic of the present age, it is very natural to inquire : can law keep pace with life?[1] This has indeed been a perennial question but it has assumed added significance in the present time due to unprecedented rhythm of change in various fields. At some quarters it is argued that "law is becoming less important and practical action more important, in shaping economic and social policy in an increasingly dynamic society and this is particularly true, internationally."[2] But as aptly answered by C. Wilfred Jenks that "all experience suggests that while economic growth, education and social attitudes have a far-reaching influence on social policy they can exercise their necessarily gradual influence effectively only if law provides a framework of recognised obligation and settled habit within which they can operate. Law cannot make men equal, but unless the equality of man is recognised by law there is little likelihood of other influences creating it in fact".[3] Further, "When justice cannot invoke the aid of the law, and of procedure effective to secure respect for the law, long and broad views on our common humanity all too readily succumb to entrenched privilege, this is no less true under new social order and in new states than in the most traditional of societies".[4] As pointed out by Prof. Edgar Bodenheimer, "Law being the cement which holds the social structure together, must intelligently link the past with the present without ignoring the pressing claims of the future."[5] The growth of law begins with the growth of society. At no specific stage of development, law can be said to have been invented and imposed ab extra.[6] Consequently legal orders are "pierced together slowly, in trial and error to human demands."[7] They are not produced overnight. They have their roots and backgrounds in the society. The study of international law should be directed "...... to explore how the present law has come to be, what it is, how it is involved in a process of reform and extension and intensification, in order that we may be able to assist in the building stone upon stone in storm and rain, of a transnational legal order for state and people and men".[8]

As pointed out by Roscoe Pound, "Law must be stable, and yet it cannot stand still".[9] The "central problem of law", consequently, is "to reconcile the conflicting needs of

---

1. C. Wilfred Jenks, Social Justice in the Law of Nations, The I.L.O. Impact After Fifty Years, Oxford University Press (1970), p. 5.
2. Ibid at p. 80.
3. Ibid.
4. Ibid.
5. Jurisprudence—The Philosophy and Method of the Law. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1962), p. 218.
6. C.K. Allen, Law in the Making (1961), p. 6.
7. P.E. Corbett, Law and Society in the Relation of States, p. 287.
8. From the farewell lecture of Prof. Frederick Van Asbeck of Leiden University referred in Philip C. Jessup, "The Concept of Transnational Law. An Introduction. Vol. 3 (1964), pp. 1-2.
9. Interpretation of Legal History, Cambridge, Mass, (1923) p. 1.

stability and change".[10] The most important function of law is to help in solving the problems of the society in and for which it exists".[11] Law can perform this august function effectively only if it can reconcile the needs of change and stability.

Dynamism in International law

What is true of law in general, is also, even more particularly, true of international law. The problem of change, flexibility and adaptability is much more acute and urgent in the international field. "As a result of ... catastrophic upheaval on so many fronts in the realm of international law...... must perforce, also change. The central problem, given in the accelerating and meteoric changes occurring on so many fronts is this : Can the inertia built into the law as a social science and especially the branch of the law dealing with the relationship between sovereign nations, change quickly enough to meet the new challenges......"[12] Further, "... whether the Gutterdameruang of a nuclear holocaust can be avoided by the advent of the reign of the Rule of Law, whether this philosophy will supervene in time to save mankind from self destruction, and whether the changing norms of international law can help in the dire straits in which the world finds itself is the question, the answer of which is not readily at hand".[13]

It has been aptly remarked by Soviet authors, "International law is not static. It is constantly developing, sometimes it does not keep up with developments, other times it anticipates them and gives an early warning of tendencies in the development of international relations. Developing international law is probably more than ever replenishing collection of contractual and other documents. It is a developing philosophy of values. At major turning points in history it sometimes undergoes qualitative changes."[14] For example, on 5th June, 1989, the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) with a view to warn the people of the increase in the temperature of the earth due to 'Green house-effect', gave the slogan of "Global Warming; Global Warning". This indeed is a very serious problem with which the world is confronted. Due to increase in the temperature of the Earth level of the waters of the seas will increase more than a metre affecting more than half of the population of the world. At crucial or important turns of history, there are qualitative changes in international law. One such qualitative change was witnessed in June, 1992 when the Earth Summit, held at Rio de Janeiro (Brazil), undertook to save Planet Earth from Environmental crisis. It was also decided to hold a conference after five years to review the progress made during the last five years. The U.N. review conference was therefore held in 1997 wherein as many as 160 members participated. Yet another significant international conference, known as Kyoto Environmental Summit on Global Warming was held from 1 to 11 December, 1997. This conference fixed the targets to be achieved between 2008 and 2012. It was decided that on the basis of 1990 levels, America, European Union and Japan would reduce 7%, 8% and 6% respectively of the green house gases. The gravity of the problem can be gauged from the fact that the warnings of the scientists are proving to be correct. According to the Scientists the month of July, 1998 has been the warmest month of last 118 years and the temperature of the Planet Earth has increased by one per cent. But the trends for changes, or changes themselves for good, sometimes encounter a setback. For example, the above target was accepted by America under European pressure. America subsequently decided to abandon Kyoto Treaty in 2001 and announced in February, 2002 an alternative optional plan of voluntary cutting emissions. Canada, Britain and Germany did not agree with the latest American plan and expressed their reservations.

In recent times, nuclear disaster in Japan on account of Sunami and now (in middle of June 2013) huge disaster and devastation leading to death of hundred of persons due to bursting of clouds and flash of floods in Kedarnath and Badrinath in Uttarakhand are indicative of impending damages of climate change due to global warming.

---

[10] Hardy C. Dillard, J., "Conflict and Change : The Role of Law," Proc. ASIL (April, 25-27, 1963), p. 50.

[11] J.L. Brierly. The Basis of obligation in International Law (Oxford, 1958), p. 72.

[12] Leonard M. Salter, "International Law in Transition : New Norms for Old", The International Lawyer, Vol. 7, No. 3 (July, 1973), p. 687.

[13] Ibid. at p. 695.

[14] Yuri Rybakov, Leonid Skotnikov, Alexander Zmeyevsky, "The Primacy of Law in Politics", Int. Affairs (May 1989), p. 57 at p. 61.

Dynonism in Environmental Law

However, Kyoto Treaty came into force on 16 February, 2005. It could be possible only with the support of 141 nations who had ratified the Treaty. As of November, 2009, 187 States had signed and ratified the Kyoto Treaty. But unfortunately, America, the greatest polluter of the world could not become a party to the Treaty.

Besides this, U. N. Framework Convention on Climate Change, 1992 has as many as 195 State Parties (all U. N. Members except South Sudan plus nine, cook Islands and European Union).

Further, Copenhagen Summit Conference on Climate Change, held in third week of December, 2009, is generally regarded as unsuccessful conference and dismal failure. However realizing that the summit conference was moving to an unsuccessful end, leaders of America, China, Brazil and South Africa in an attempt to save the conference becoming unsuccessful, presented an agreement before 194 countries attending the conference. After the negotiations of two weeks, the conference agreed to the establishment of a Green Fund with a view to protect poor countries from global warming. A Green Fund of 100 billion dollars for the period 2010 to 2012. America promised 3.6 billion dollars, Japan 11 billion dollars and 10.6 billion dollars was promised by European countries, India agreed to all this because Kyoto Treaty had yet not been abandoned.

Copenhagen Summit fixed target of limiting global warming by 2° celsius but no targets were fixed for the year 2020 or 2050. Kyoto Treaty remained in tact. Though it was not a perfect treaty yet it was a start to tackling global problem.

However, on 11th December, 2010 world leaders from 193 countries signed a new global climate legal regime called the Cancun Agreement. It almost sounded the death knell for Kyoto Protocol. But definite obligations of countries were not fixed at Cancun. They were to be fixed at Durban. On 28th November, 2010 to 11th December, United Nations climate change conference was held in Durban (South Africa) to establish, a new treaty to limit carbon emissions. The conference agreed to a legally binding deal comprising all countries, which will be prepared by 2015 and to take effect in 2020. After two weeks of negotiations a deal was reached on the last day i.e. Sunday, 11th December, 2011 after 60 hour long meeting. The terms of the Treaty were to be defined in 2015 and to become effective in 2020. The agreement referred as the "Durban Conference" was notable in that for the first time it included developing countries such as India and China as well as in the U.S. who refused to sign the Kyoto Protocol.

It is important to note that the agreement entailed the continuation of the Kyoto Protocol although some countries including members of the European countries are not likely to commit to it. Lastly, a notable achievement of the conference was the progress regarding creation of Green Fund to which management framework was adopted. The Fund to distribute US $ 100 billion per year to help countries adopt to climate impacts.

Reference may also in made here to the world summit of Legislatures organised by London based International, that has its office in India as well. It was organized from June 6-8, 2014. Its India President last year was Prakash Javedkar, now the new Environment Minister in Narendra Modi's cabinet.

A brief reference may also be made to the US President Obama's new promise, under the clear Air Act, to cut carbon emissions by 30% (from 2005 levels by 2030) in power plants. It needs to be lauded and welcomed and ought to be followed by other developed and developing countries.

Lastly, it is important to note Lima Deal of Conference of Parties (COP) of U.N. Framework Convention on climate change, at Lima on 15th December, 2014. A compromise draft on national pledges to cut, global carbon emissions saved the UN climate talks from a collapse and kept hopes after a global deal in Paris next year (i.e. 2015) to climate change. After a marathon 13-day Conference of Parties (COP), negotiations on Sunday (i.e. 15-12-2014) adopted the draft that addressed India's concerns and set roadmap for a new binding deal.

The agreement—Lima Call for climate Action—is likely to pave the way for all nations to submit their 'nationally determined' pledge for emission cuts and adaptation measures by October, 2015.

The contentious issues will, however, come again during Paris talks (in late 2015) ahead of the final agreement. Indian Environment Minister, Prakash Javedkar said after the delegates approved a blue print for talks leading up to a deal in 2015 that will come into effect after 2020. The added, "All of India's concerns have been addressed. We achieved targets and we got what we wanted".

Nations participating in the conference concluded that by elaborating the elements of the new agreement, scheduled to be stumped in Paris in late 2015, while also agreeing to the ground rules on how all countries can submit contributions to the new pact during the first quarter of next year. These intended Nationally Determined contributions will form the foundation for climate action post-2020 when the new pact is set liability for reducing carbon emissions.

Breaking up of the Soviet Union, Vienna Conference on Human Rights (1993) establishment of World Trade Organization (WTO), establishment of International Criminal Court and more recently terrorist activities of Al-Qaida are such other important international turns which have brought about qualitative and revolutionary changes.

Crisis in International law

The rapid changes in different fields have brought a sense of "crisis" in international law. This "crisis" is a product of the acceleration of the process of change in the international community that is characteristic of our era.[15] And the factors responsible for this crisis include "rapid technological progress, the rise of new ideologies and systems of public order, including militant communism, decolonization, itself spurred on by the Communist challenge to the West; the appearance of many new states of widely different cultural backgrounds and levels of development; rising demands for social reform; the tear of war and growing reluctance of the more advanced states to protect their interests by coercive means; and the increase in the number and functions of international organisations".[16] In advisory opinion on Admission to Membership in the United Nations,[17] Judge Alvarez aptly remarked, "The fundamental principles of international law are passing through a serious crisis, and this necessitates its reconstruction. A new international law is developing which embodies not only this reconstruction but also some entirely new elements."[18] Scientific and technological advancements have also brought a sense of crisis in the field of international law. The increase of temperature due to 'greenhouse effect' leading to the depletion of ozone layer poses a very serious problem to our very survival and hence necessarily to International Law. Thus, "the present so-called "crisis" in international law was nothing more than a tension between the needs of stability and the demands of change. As regards the emergence of a large number of new countries. The new demands of the new countries did not mean or amount to any wholesale rejection of the traditional legal system but merely readjustment of the old law to the new conditions".[19] In times of rapid political, economic and technological changes, the development of law both within and among states, tends to lag behind; its content becomes unstable and uncertain, and its effectiveness is minimized. If the development processes of a legal system are inadequate, a 'crisis' of law emerges. The rapid changing world of the twentieth century and the twenty-first century is going through such a crisis. Whether or not the developmental processes it has created, and is creating, will prove adequate is one of the fundamental questions of contemporary international law."[20]

---

[15] Oliver. J. Lissitzyn, International Law Today and Tomorrow, (Oceana Publications Inc. Dobbs Ferry, Newyork, 1965), p. 102.

[16] Ibid.; See also R.P. Anand, New States and International Law, (1972), p. 118.

[17] I.C.J. Rep. (1948) p. 4.

[18] Ibid, p. 67.

[19] Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, edited by R.P. Anand, (1972) p. XXXI.

Problems of Adaptability and Change

In view of the rapid changes in different fields, many of our old ideas about international law have become inadequate or even obsolete in the light of modern requirements.[21] One of the main defects of international law, according to Brierly, has been that it has aimed to stabilize rather than to provide for the growth of international society, and to maintain existing values rather than to create new ones.[22] As compared to municipal law, international law is confronted with many difficulties and problems to keep pace with the rapidly changing times and circumstances. In the absence of a world legislative body, treaty making is the counterpart of the legislative process in the domestic field of the states. It is, therefore, more difficult to meet new situations and conditions resulting from the far-reaching scientific and technological developments, and other significant changes in the field of international law which requires the consent of different states with different traditions and ideologies. Nevertheless, international law is not static and that slowly but steadily it gathers dynamism and activity and endeavours to mend itself to the needs of the day. In order to be effective, international law or any law for that matter, must keep pace with the time, to obliterate those norms which have fallen out of date, and to baptize new principles as norms of law. As pointed out by Prof. Oliver, J. Lissitzyn, "Customary international law has at times developed with considerable speed to provide for the regulation of the new transitional needs and activities. The twentieth century has witnessed, for example, the rapid development of the doctrines of air sovereignty and the continental shelf".[23] He, however, adds, "Nevertheless, the acceleration of the process of change in the international community and detailed nature of the regulation required for many new activities render customs an inadequate instrument for the formation of legal norms in response to all the new needs and expectations.[24] Customs being thus an inadequate instrument for bringing about timely changes in international law, treaty process then remains the most effective process to effect changes. But treaty process is a cumbersome process for it obviously, invariably and inevitably depends upon the consent of states with different ideologies, traditions and interests. International treaties and conventions come into force only after they have been ratified by a prescribed number of states and the states are generally reluctant to ratify a treaty which affects or is likely to affect their rights and interests. States do not hesitate to abandon the treaty which affects their interests. The glaring example of this is the abandonment of Kyoto Treaty by America in 2001.

Thus as compared to municipal law, international law is confronted with many difficulties and problems in keeping itself abreast of the changing times and circumstances. These problems and difficulties are obviously due to the fact that international law operates in a decentralised system. Above all, the greatest problem is the concept of sovereignty.[25] But as aptly remarked by Judge Jessup, "Sovereignty in its meaning of an absolute, uncontrolled state will... is the quick sand on which the foundations of traditional international law are built...... once it is agreed that sovereignty is divisible and that it is therefore not absolute, various restrictions on and relinquishment of sovereignty may be regarded as normal and not stagmatizing. The slow but steady development of the majority rule in international organisations bears witness to the change which is taking place.[26] It is now generally recognised that sovereignty is neither absolute nor indivisible. In fact, 'Sovereignty' has a much restricted meaning today than in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, when with emergence of powerful highly nationalised states few limits on State's autonomy were acknowledged. At the present time, there is hardly a State which in the interests of the international community has not accepted restrictions on its liberty of action."[27]

---

[20] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World, p. 424.

[21] See International Law: The Collected Papers of Sir Cecil Hurst (London, Stevens, 1950), pp. 156-157.

[22] J.L.A. Brierly, The Basis of Obligation in International Law, (Oxford, 1958), p. 58.

[23] International Law Today and Tomorrow, (1965), p. 105.

[24] Ibid.; See also Leo Gross, "Sources of Universal International Law". Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, Edited by R.P. Anand, (1972), p. 189 at pp. 196-197.

[25] As aptly observed by Sir H. Lauterpacht, "International Law, whether codified or not, implies essentially a restriction on the sovereignty of states whose relation it governs. It is in the nature of things that states wedded to an uncompromising maintenance of their sovereignty cannot view with favour attempts at effective codification: AJIL. Vol. 49 (1955), p. 16 at p. 38; See also Q. Wright, "Toward a Universal Law for Mankind," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 63 (1963), pp. 445-6.

Traditional International Law and New International Law*

The traditional international law has undergone so many changes that the international lawyers have evolved a new term, i.e., 'new international law' to indicate the norms and rules that have been evolved since the Second World War. Judge Alvarez has aptly observed, "A new conception of law in general and particularly of international law, has also emerged......... The traditionally, juridically and individualist conception... is being more and more superseded by what may be termed the law of social interdependence".[28] 'The ...... new international law has already manifested itself in the Charter of the U.N. The United Nations wish to promote peace positively by forming a constructive peace law. The interdependence of the nations is one of the corner stones of the new law of nations."[29] The traditional, international law was envisaged as a law governing the relations of sovereign states with each other. Prof. Oppenheim defined international law as "the name for the body of customary and conventional rules which are considered legally binding by civilized nations in their intercourse with each other."[30] This definition was given by Oppenheim in 1905 and sums up the position of classical, traditional international law that stood before the First World War. In view of the significant changes that have taken place since then this definition has become obsolete and inadequate. Later on changes were made in subsequent editions. For example, Eighth Edition of Oppenheim's book International Law was defined as "Law of Nations or International Law is the name of for the body of customary and treaty rules which are considered legally binding by States in their intercourse with each other."[31] "Indeed every important element in it can now be challenged."[32] "...... it is now generally recognised that not only states but also public international organisations have rights and duties under international law, even though they may not have all the rights and duties that states have."[33] The establishment of the League of Nations was a great landmark for this new development which culminated in the establishment of the United Nations. The international organisations have now become a common and regular feature of international life. In its advisory opinion, Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the U.N.,[34] The International Court of Justice confirmed this development by holding that the U.N. is a legal person and can bring out claims for reparation for the injuries suffered by persons (in the instant case by Count Barnodotte while serving in the Middle East) in the service of the U.N. It is, therefore, now an indisputable fact that public international organisations are also the subjects of international law. In fact, "the future of international law is one with the future of international organisation."[35] The establishment of World Trade Organisation in 1995 to regulate international trade and commerce is testimony to this fact. So is the case of the establishment of International Criminal Court.

---

[26] Philip C. Jessup, A Modern Law of Nations, p. 40.

[27] J.G. Starke : Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (Butterworths, Singapur, 1989) p. 100

* See also for P.C.S. (1985) Q. 1 ; For answer see also Chapter on "Definition, Nature and Basis" and "Subjects of International Law". See also for P.C.S. (1987) Q. 1.

[28] I.C.J. Rep. (1948) p. 4 at p. 67.

[29] Dr. B.V.A. Roling, International Law in an Expanded World (1960) p. 121; See also RP Anand, New States and International Law (1972), p. 113.

[30] L. Oppenheim, International Law (Newyork, Longmans Green & Co., 1905) pp. 1-2.

[31] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I (Peace), Eighth Edition by H. Lauterpacht, pp. 4-5.

[32] Oliver J. Lissitzyn, International Law Today and Tomorrow (Dobbs Ferry, Newyork, 1965), p. 38. For a detailed criticism of Oppenheim's definition see also Chapter on "Definition, Nature and Basis of International Law".

[33] See e.g. Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the U.N. Advisory Opinion, I.C.J. Rep. (1949), p. 174; D.W. Bowett, The Law of International Institutions (London, Stevens & Sons, 1963), pp. 273-310. The Holy See has long been regarded as having rights and duties under International law.

[34] I.C.J. Rep. (1949) p. 174.

Secondly, "since the Second World War international law has been enriched not only by the addition of the numerous international and supernational state organisations, but also by a new international law that has been evolved around the individual."[36] Regarding this benign development in the field of international law, Corbett has also written, "To me it has long meant that we are witnessing a transition in international legal development from a prolonged stage in which the predominant, not to say exclusive, concern was the regulation of the conduct of states as distinct entities to one in which equal attention is given to promoting the growth of a body of world law transcending states, and applicable on a footing of equality, to individuals, corporations, international organisations and states." [37] Thus the most important change that has taken place is that of addition of new subject.[38] International law has undergone significant changes in the course of time. The shift has been "from the more or less formal regulation of diplomatic relations between states to an international law of welfare." [39], Further "international law is today actively and continuously concerned with such divergent and vital matters as human rights and crimes against humanity, the international control of nuclear energy, trade organisation, labour conventions, transport control or health regulation...As international law moves today on so many levels, it would be surprising indeed if the traditional principles of inter-state relations developed in previous centuries were adequate to cope with the vastly more divergent subject-matters of international law of the present day." [40]

These factors necessitated the revision of Oppenheim's definition of International Law once again. That is why, the editors of ninth edition of Oppenheim's book have defined International law in the following words :

"International law is the body of rules which are legally binding on states in their intercourse with each other. These rules are primarily those which governs the relation of states, but states are not the only subjects of International Law. International organisations and, to some extent, also individuals may be subjects of rights conferred and duties imposed by international law."[41]

Thirdly, it is now well established that international law comprises not only of customary and conventional rules but also of "general principles of law." [42] Article 38 (1) (c) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice mentions : "General Principles of law recognised by civilized states" as the third source in order in which the sources of international law are to be used by the International Court of Justice while deciding a dispute. "Article 38, paragraph 1(c) of the Statute of International Court of Justice... places on record one of the main sources of the rules of public international law. Indeed it describes the inexhaustible reservoir of legal principles from which the tribunals can enrich and develop public international law." [43]

---

35. P.E. Corbett, Law and Society in the Relation of States, p. 12.

36. Dr. B.V.A. Roling, Internationl Law in an Expanded World. (Djambatan N.V. Amsterdam 1960), p. XXII: See also W. Friedmann, The Changing Structure of International Law (1964), pp. 221-249.

37. Percy E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (Princeton, New Jersey, 1971), p. 184.

38. W. Friedmann, The Changing Structure of International Law (London Steven & Sons; 1964). p. 67.

39. W. Friedmann, "Changing Dimensions of International Law", Columbia L. Rev., Vol. 62 (1962), p. 1147 at p. 1148.

40. W. Friedmann, "Some Impacts of Social Organisation on International Law." AJIL, Vol. 50 (1956), p. 475 at p. 477.

41. Oppenheim's International Law Ninth Edition (Longman Group U.K. Limited and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson. 1992, Vol. I, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings' & Sir Arthur Watts, p. 4.)

42. Oliver, J. Lissitzyn, International Law To-day and Tomorrow (1965), p. 39.

43. McNair, "The General Principles of Law Recognised by Civilized Nations," BYBIL. Vol. XXXIII (1957), p. 1 at p. 6.

It may be noted here that even the latest definition of International Law given in Oppenheim's book (1992) is conspicuous by its silence about the general principles. Obviously therefore, the definition of International Law given in the Ninth edition of Oppenheim's book (1992) still suffers from this deficiency.

Further, "the very conception that international law is a 'body of rules', now stands challenged as static and inadequate.[44] It is a common place that law is a process, not a body of self-executing rules." [45] A static conception of international law based merely on body of rules, derived from technically defined 'sources' will be inadequate in facing the challenges and demands in a divided and dynamic world.[46] Though law is a dynamic concept yet it has become customary to define law as a body of rules. What is true of law in general is also true of international law. Therefore it does not seem to be proper to criticise Oppenheim on this account.

Lastly, the use of the term 'civilized states' has also been subjected to severe criticism. Several decades before western countries considered only Christian states as civilized states and neither long history nor culture was considered necessary for this. Even ancient and civilized countries like India and China were not considered to be civilized. The use of epithet 'civilized' in the definition was therefore, not proper. That is why, in later editions of Oppenheim's book the word 'civilized' was removed.

It may be noted here that present international law, to some extent, is based on the Charter of the United Nations and it is developing despite the weakness of the institution. The Charter gives a place of importance to the individuals and that is why human rights are developing under the present international law. In fact the development of new international law has begun after the establishment of the United Nations. The Charter is an international treaty and is based on the true legality of international law. International law in its turn derives inspiration from Charter and functions despite the weaknesses of the United Nations as an institution. There is no alternative to the United Nations and it is difficult to envisage a world without the United Nations which has become almost an Universal Organisation because as many as 191 countries have become its members. It has succeeded in preventing a world war for more than fifty years. Though in a negative sense, it is a great achievement indeed. It has made significant contributions in the social, economic and cultural fields. All this has infused new vigour and dynamism in the present international law. The United Nations has completed more than fifty years of its existence. It is now universally recognised that it has become an indispensable organisation. At present it is facing an unprecedented financial crisis which is affecting its overall performance in various fields. But there is no reason to believe that as in the past it will not be able to encounter successfully this crisis. It is in the interest of humanity as a whole that this august universal international organisation should be strengthened.

in the dynamic world of today, international law finds itself confronted with many challenges. The most formidable of these challenges are communism, terrorism emergence of large number of states, nuclear weapons, scientific and technologic revolution, depletions of ozone layer due to green-house effect etc.

Communist challenge

The Communist world is generally represented by the Soviet Union and China. It will, therefore, be relevant to consider the challenges posed by Soviet Union and Communist China and whether international law can meet these challenges. It may be noted at the outset that the Soviet theory of international law regards treaty or agreement as the only appropriate method for effecting changes and development in international law.[47] The [44] International Law Today and Tomorrow (Newyork, 1965), p. 39.

---

[45] M.A. Kaplan and Node B. Katzenback, The Political Foundations of International Law (Newyork and London, Johnwiley & Sons, 1961), p. 231 (and at pp. 19-29); and see, generally, the writings of My-res S. McDougal.

[46] Lissitzyn Note 42, at p. 40.

[47] See K. Venkatraman, "The Role of Customary Practice in the Development of Universal International Law," Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, Edited by R.P. Anand (1972), p. 212 at p. 215.

Soviet Union considered custom, as inadequate and insignificant for the development of international law. The Soviet attitude towards international law is the product of "the combined pressure of need and Marxist doctrine."[48] The Soviet Union generally made a pragmatic approach toward international law.[49]

According to the Soviet definition, international law is "the sum total of the norms regulating relations between states in the process of their struggle and co-operation, expressing the will of the ruling classes of these states and secured by coercion exercised by states individually and collectively."[50] After the death of Stalin, the above definition was slightly modified by inclusion of a reference to "peaceful co-existence."[51] Soviet writers laid a great emphasis on 'peaceful co-existence' in relations between the sovereign states. According to the Soviet view, "the principle of peaceful co-existence should be the basis of the whole structure of contemporary international law. Only if it is based on the principle of co-existence, can the international law best promote the cause of peace and mutual understanding between States." [52] The Soviet Union claimed that the principle of peaceful co-existence finds reflected in the principle of unanimity of the permanent members of the Security Council of the United Nations when major decisions are to be taken and contended that "The majority rule cannot be applied to the relation between different social systems. Such relations are inevitably to be based on mutual respect for the sovereign equality of nations, peaceful negotiation, and reasonable compromise.[53] It is on the basis of this principle that the Soviet Union adamantly refused to pay its part of the expenses for the United Nations Operation in the Middle 'East and Cango. The Soviet Union adopted the same attitude in regard to the giving of compulsory jurisdiction to the International Court of Justice. It consistently refused to accept or rather confer the obligatory jurisdiction on the International Court of Justice. The obligatory jurisdiction, it was claimed, "is not only contrary to the spirit of peaceful co-existence but at same time is not adequate in the present circumstances. The most burning international issues, such as, the liquidation of colonial system or the solution of the West Berlin are political problems first of all, and cannot be solved by a court or arbitration alone.[54]

Yet another concept evolved by the Soviet writers which posed a serious challenge to the existing international law was that of the wars of "National Liberation." [55] So was the case with the concept of 'unequal treaties.' The term 'unequal treaties' has been defined as follows: "Equal treaties are concluded on the basis of the equality of the parties; unequal treaties are those which do not fulfil this elementary requirement. Unequal treaties are not legally binding; equal treaties must be strictly observed." [56] The examples of the Soviet Challenges to International Law noted above are simply illustrative and by no means exhaustive. These examples should, however, not mislead us to think that the Soviet Union has not generally followed the norms and principles of international law. "The observance by the Soviet Union of much of international law need not be a cause for surprise. It demonstrates the essential role international law still plays even in the relations between antagonistic states so long there is no all out military conflict.

---

[48] Lissitzyn, note 42, at p. 46.

[49] Ibid.

[50] Definition by A.Y. Vishinsky in 1948 quoted from Ibid at p. 49.

[51] According to the Soviet view "Co-existence is a continuation of the struggle between the social systems, but struggle by peaceful-means, without resorting to war without interference by one state in the internal affairs of another. It is competition in peaceful endeavours. It implies reciprocal concessions and compromises". Victor P. Karpov, "Soviet Concept of Peaceful Co-Existence and its Implications for International Law". The Soviet Impact on International Law. Edited by Hans W. Baade (Newyork, 1965), p. 14 at p. 15.

[52] Ibid. at p. 20.

[53] Ibid. at p. 17.

[54] Victor P. Karpov. "Soviet Concept of Peaceful Co-existence and Implications for International Law". Ibid., p. 14 at p. 18. See also Richard N. Gardner, "The Soviet Union and the United Nations". Ibid p. 1 at pp. 5-6.

[55] See George Ginsburgs, "Wars of National Liberation, and the Modern Law of Nations—the Soviet Thesis," Ibid, at pp. 67 to 77.

[56] Adopted from Oliver J. Lissitzyn. International Law Today and Tomorrow. (Newyork, 1965), p. 53.

International relations simply cannot be maintained without a framework of mutually recognised and observed norms... considerations of reciprocity, sometimes induce the Soviet Union to bring its practice into close conformity, with that of the rest of the world.[57] Therefore the view was expressed that "The Soviet ideology is likely to be modified as a result of the joint or co-operative activities with capitalist countries such as Antarcatica and Outer Space. This will inevitably lead to the expansion of the role of international law in the relations between the two camps." [58]

By the end of the year 1991 the communist system collapsed in the Soviet Union. The concepts of Glassnost and Prestroika created such strong ways for freedom and democracy that the whole existing system collapsed. The shortage of food production and consumer goods in the Soviet Union were mainly responsible for the abrupt collapse of seventy year's system. This led to the breaking up of the Soviet Union and mad rush for emulating the western system once its staunch rival. The constitutent states of the former Soviet Union started looking towards the west for help, aid and survival. Almost all the former republics of the Soviet Union became the members of the United Nations. Even in Russia formally Communism came to an end. Other Communist countries could not also escape this strong wave of opposition to Communism. Due to internal conflicts and civil war Yugoslavia was divided into several parts. Czchoslovakia was divided into two parts as Czech and Slovak leaders agreed to split the country on 20th June, 1992, ending a 74-year-old federation of their two peoples. Even in China, the advent of capitalism is posing a great challenge to Communism. Thus the Soviet challenge to the International Law has now come to an end. Russia has now become a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO) and Prime Minister of Russia has recently hinted that Russia may join WTO. As China has already become a member of WTO, Russia may soon follow the suit.

The People's Republic of China or Communist China had also challenged the accepted norms and principles of international law in many important respects. For example, Communist China has been a much more staunch supporter of the concept of 'unequal treaties'. According to a Chinese writer "Whether or not a treaty is equal does not depend upon the form and words of various treaty provisions, but depends upon the state character, economic strength, and the substance of correlation of the contracting states."[59] Consequently, all treaties entered into by China in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries regarding consular jurisdiction, unilateral most favoured nation treatment, restrictive tariff regulations, territorial cessions or leases, etc. are regarded as unequal treaties. A recent example of a multilateral treaty regarded as unequal by China is Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, 1968 on the ground that obligations among all contracting parties are not 'identical and reciprocal'. But China herself does not uniformly follow this principle. The most glaring example of this is the provision relating to veto conferred on the permanent members of the Security Council under the U.N. Charter which is nothing but an unequal.[60]

It is significant to note here that Communist China had not articulated a comprehensive novel theory of international law. It is, however, clear, "that the People's Republic has not overtly rejected the entire fabric of international law that had developed as of the time when communism triumphed in China in 1949. Although usually reluctant to invoke international law, the PRC has often at least given lip service to its interpretation of customary and conventional norms when non-legal techniques of persuasion and dispute resolution have proven inadequate. There have been many occasions when Peking has purported to perceive and evaluate in terms of broadly accepted international legal principles. Furthermore because reciprocity is the basis of international law, no government can long except its legal claims to be honoured unless it demonstrates a corresponding willingness to honour the similar claims of its foreign counterparts. For these reasons it is not surprising that to considerable extent the PRC's articulation of its foreign policies has taken account of, and claimed consistency with basic principles of international law." [61]

---

[57] Adopted from Oliver J. Lissitzyn. International Law Today and Tomorrow. (Newyork, 1965), p. 60.

[58] Ibid, p. 70.

[59] Quoted from Hungdah Chiu, "Comparison of the Nationalist and Communist Chinese Views of Unequal Treaties." China's Practice of International Law; Some Case Studies, edited by Jerome Alan Cohen (Cambridge Massachusetts. (1972), p. 239 at p. 259)

[60] Ibid, see pp. 260-264.

Moreover, both the Soviet Union and Communist China, had not rejected the entire fabric of international law although they have tried to modify certain accepted principles in several important respects. At one time it appeared as if the Communist challenge had shaken the very foundations of international law but subsequently it became evident that in many spheres reconciliation between the conflicting demands became necessary and on the principle of reciprocity the communist countries also were compelled to accommodate themselves by observing many norms and principles of international law. International law was never static, like all living law it was always undergoing the process of reconstruction and re-interpretation in order to mend itself to the needs of the day.

The concepts of Glasnost and Prestroika during the regime of Soviet President Gorbachev brought about the Communist Republics closer to the Western States. Directly or indirectly these concepts awakened the hitherto dormant waves of independence. For a considerable period of time the Soviet Union was facing financial and certain internal problems. The shortage of food and consumer goods added to the gravity of the situation. People started losing faith in communism and were eager to follow the open market system of capitalism. One by one all republics of Soviet Union declared their separate independence. It ultimately led to the breaking up of the Soviet Union. In the course of time almost all the republics of former Soviet Union became members of the U.N. Communism was officially abolished in Russia. It was quite natural and obvious that other Communist States could not escape the influence of such epoch-making events Czecho-Slovakia was divided into two states. Yugoslavia was destined to witness greater turmoil and besides losing its membership of the U.N. in 1992, it was broken up into several states. The advent of capitalism even in China started shaking the foundations of communism. Thus one of the greatest challenge to International Law came to an end. China has now become one of the members of World Trade Organisation (WTO)

Challenge of Nuclear Weapons*

One of the most serious and formidable challenges with which international law is confronted with is the challenge of nuclear weapons. Due to devastating capability of nuclear weapons the world may be said to be sitting on a volcano which may erupt any time and may engulf the whole world. According to Fenwick, atomic bomb cannot come under the recognized laws of war and its nature is such that its use can be made only by violating the existing laws.[62] The development of nuclear weapons have shown the inadequacy of the existing laws of war. Therefore, ".........whether the changing norms of international law can help in the dire straits in which the world finds itself is the question, the answer of which is not readily at hand." [63]

Since International Law is a dynamic concept and it has the capability to adopt itself to the changes that take place, it can well be hoped that International Law will successfully face this challenge. The International Nuclear Forces Treaty (INF Treaty) 1987 is a glaring example of this. Both the great powers signed this Treaty on 8th December, 1987. This Treaty prohibits nuclear missiles of the range of 300 to 3400 miles. This Treaty provides for the destruction of 2800 missiles of the medium range (i.e. between 300 to 3400 miles). This Treaty has been rightly hailed as a good beginning in the direction of total elimination of nuclear weapons. On 31st July, 1991, President Gorbachev of Soviet Union and President George Bush of U.S. signed a historic treaty

---

61. Quoted from Hungdah Chiu, "Comparison of the Nationalist and Communist Chinese Views of Unequal Treaties." China's Practice of International Law; Some Case Studies, edited by Jerome Alan Cohen (Cambridge Massachusetts. (1972), pp. 12-13.

* P.C.S. (1966), Q. No. 1 ; See also Q. No. (e) of the same year and Q. No. 1 of P.C.S. Exam 1968.

62. C.G. Fenwick, International Law, p. 773.

63. Leonard M. Salter, note 12, at p. 695.

known as Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START) reducing 30% of strategic nuclear arsenals. Besides this, on 3rd June, 1993, President Boris Yeltsin of Russia and President George Bush of America signed START II which aims to reduce two-thirds of nuclear arsenals within next ten years. Reference may also be made to the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons which has been signed by a large number of countries. There are certain unequal and discriminating provisions because of which it has failed to achieve the desired objectives. While it imposes obligation on non-nuclear nations it does nct impose similar obligations on nuclear powers. Nor does it provide for the destruction of existing nuclear arsenals or even the stoppage of testing new weapons by nuclear powers. Nuclear Tests by France in defiance of public opinion is a glaring example of this. That is why the need is to remove unequal and discriminating provision from the treaty and also to provide for time bound destruction of existing nuclear arsenals. The latest attempt to meet the nuclear challenge is the comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty. But this Treaty suffers from certain deficiencies and favours the nuclear power against those who do not possess or on the verge of acquiring them. Unless a Treaty guarantees the destruction of all nuclear arsenals and prohibits all nuclear tests for once and all time, it cannot achieve the desired objectives.

Reference may also be made the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTBT). In June 1995, a conference was held in Geneva to adopt the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty to prohibit nuclear tests. This Treaty seeks to remove the shortcomings of the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear weapons. Thus CTBT was adopted. CTBT Review conference was held in Vienna in the first week of October 1999. The conference was attended by 90 countries. The conference appealed to the countries whose ratification was necessary for the Treaty to come into force to ratify the treaty at an early date. Before the start of the Review conference, 154 countries had already signed and 51 countries had ratified it. Forty four countries have nuclear capacity including five original countries. Out of these 44 countries 26 countries have already ratified the treaty. So far as many as 144 countries have ratified CTBT. The remaining countries that have not so far ratified the CTBT are China, Democratic People Republic of Korea (DPRK) Egypt, India, Israel, Pakistan and the United States.

Reference may be made here to the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, 1968 which became effective on 5 March, 1970. It has been signed and ratified by as many as 190 countries. However four recognised sovereign states are not parties to this Treaty. These countries are India, Israel, Pakistan and North Korea.

Reference may be made here to the convention in early notification of a Nuclear Accident Radiological Emergency. It entered into force on 27th October 1986. Besides this reference may also be made to the Convention Assistance in the Event of Nuclear Accident or Radiological Emergency, 1986. It entered into force on 26 February, 1987. It has been ratified by 111 (one hundred eleven) countries.

North Korea has been behaving like a rogue nuclear nation. One after another it has been testing more and more powerful nuclear weapons. Time and again it threatens war with South Korea and America. In this very month i.e., July 2017, it has tested Inter-Continental Ballistic Missile (ICBM) covering different parts of America. America on its turn shows its preparedness to retaliate. Thus at may by any wrong move, by either of these nations a nuclear war may start. To avoid such an eventuality, at G 20 meet, on 8th July, 2017 American President and Chinese President agreed to work on North Korea 'menace'. By nature, North Korean President does not seem to be listening to any advice. Let us hope that wisdom will prevail on these nations so as to avoid a nuclear war which would mean catastrophe and devastation. After the killing of Sulemani, top Iranian military commander, tension between Iran and America increased. Iran broke the earlier deal as to not to go nuclear and avowed to take revenge from America...

Scientific and Technological Revolution

Yet another formidable challenge confronting International Law is as to how to develop and adapt it in accordance with scientific and technological advancements which are taking place with an accelerated speed. The achievements in the field of means of communication and tele-communication have made it difficult rather impossible to prevent intervention by a state in the affairs and territory of other states. Consequently, the foundation of concepts such as Sovereignty and Nationality have been shaken.

Challenge posed by Depletion of Ozone Layer as a result of Green-house Effect

Depletion of ozone layer as a result of 'green-house effect' poses a very grave challenge before the whole world and hence before International Law. This challenge is probably more serious than the challenge posed by nuclear weapons. Though Ozone Treaty has been entered into in 1987 to face this challenge and other measures are also being taken to solve this problem with a view to meet this challenge as well as to deal with other environmental problems, U.N. Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) popularly known as the Earth Summit was held in Brazil from 3rd to 14th June, 1992, to face this challenge so as to save planet earth. Kyoto Climatic Conference was held on December, 1997, to devise means and strategies to meet this challenge.

As of November, 2009, 187 Countries had ratified the Kyoto Treaty on climate change 1997. But U.S., the biggest polluter of the world, has caused the great upset. America refused to ratify the treaty because according to it, it would harm the economy and is flowed by the lack of restrictions by emerging economies, China, India and Australia. The other developed nations who have not joined the treaty stated that they were on track to cut emissions by 30%. Besides this, U.N. Frame work convention on climate change, 1992 has been ratified by 195 countries (all U.N. Members except South Sudan. Apart from U.N. Members Nive, Cook Island and European Union have ratified the convention.

Reference may be made here to Vienna Convention on the protection of Ozone Layer, 1985. It entered into force in 1988. So far it has been ratified by 197 countries (all UN members plus Nive, Cook Islands as well as European Union). Thus, this treaty has become universal. Besides this, Montreal Protocol in Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer was also adopted. This protocol has also been ratified by 197 countries. It is necessary to note here that on 16th September, 2009, above mentioned Vienna Convention and Montreal Protocol became the first treaties in the history of the United Nations to achieve universal ratification.

Challenge Posed by Terrorism

Yet another challenge and indeed really potent, is that of terrorism. After the emergence of various terrorist outfits which have spread all over the world, has led a new dimension to the challenge of terrorism.

One of the reasons for expansion of its activities, is that there is no unity in the international community in respect of its elimination or destruction. Some countries especially America have attacked and bombarded some selective places in Syria and Iraq to defeat terrorism, but its approach has been selective and has not proved effective to resist the expansion of terrorist groups. Some other countries such as France, Iraq, Britain etc. have followed suite to American action and have attacked some places occupied by terrorist, but their approach has also been selective.

Another great power, Russia has also taken upon itself the task of elimination of terrorism. Russia started attacking places occupied by terrorist in Syria.

Western governments, especially America, are of the view that the vast majority of Russian strikes have targeted rebel groups in an attempt to defend President, Bashar al-Assad. America and Western Countries are satisfied with Russia entering the fight against terrorism. It is generally admitted that Russian attacks have proved to be more effective than those of America and other countries. However, the ground reality shows that militants advanced to the outskirts of Syria's second city of Aleppo, despite of Russian air strikes that aimed at routing the terrorism. NATO Secretary General, Jems Stoltenberg said that Russia's continued support for Syrian President is only serving to prolong the crisis there. He added that Russia should play a constructive role in the fight against terrorism.

It is clear from the aforesaid facts that if the world powers such as U.S. and Russia are keen in their fight against terrorism, they should unite whole heartedly in their fight against terrorism. Nothing less than this will not serve the desired result.

In the present world, terrorism is posing more and more dangers. Today, terrorism pervades all parts of the world. Each and every nation of the world is facing the menace of terrorism. No country is now safe from terrorist methods such as human bombs and 'lone would attack'.

Emergence of a large number of new states*

The present system of International Law has been described as being a product of Western power politics and as being unsuited to the needs and aspirations of the independent States of Asia and Africa.* As pointed out by Dr. Nagendra Singh, 'the greatest impact known to history on the development of International Law has been the sudden expansion of the world family of nations from 51 members in 1946 to 126 in 1969. At present, there are as many as 192 members of the United Nations. The U.N. has thus become nearly universal. The proliferation of the new states has not only made 'Eurocentrism' in thinking about international law as anachronistic but has also brought about qualitative changes in the norms and principles of international law.[64] Most of the new states were earlier the colonies of the Western states and had been relegated to the status of 'objects' and consequently, could not contribute in the development of norms and principles of the modern international law. However, this does not mean "that the new states are political entities which emerged out of the blue."[65] As a matter of fact, many of the new states, particularly in Asia, were previously independent and did play an active role in international affairs during the sixteenth; seventeenth and eighteenth centuries but they were subsequently made colonies and after being deprived of their identity as states and were relegated to the position of 'objects of international law,[66] After having freed themselves from the clutches and yoke of the imperialist powers, these new states for the first time tested the established doctrines of traditional law in accordance with their views and practices.[67] They started with the general premises that the norms and principles of international law in the development of which they had not participated were not binding on them. While doing so they rejected some of the existing norms and principles of international law. It is, however, significant to note that the new states have not rejected the whole fabric of international law for that would have implied a denial of their own rights accorded to them under international law. Their approach has been that of the rejection of some of the norms and principles and of 'eclectic' selection of others.[68] According to Robert L. Friedheim,[69] the term "new states" is a misnomer. In his view, such states should be referred as "Dissatisfied" States. In the view of another eminent writer, Syatauw,[70] the term 'new states' is misleading. The term 'new states' should be discarded, particularly if it is taken as referring to those states that have gained their independence since World War II. Not only is the term incorrect, it is misleading and therefore detrimental to a clear understanding of the working and development of international law and international relations. Many of us have used the term in our writings in the past, especially in the 1950 and the early 1960, the time of the great influx of new Asian and African States. But these so-called new states now have a history and experience of some ten, twenty or thirty years. They have come to participate fully and actively in international affairs. They have played their part in international decision-making, often bringing decisive weight to hear on the deliberations. They have provided officials for some of the highest functions in the organised international society such as the Secretary General of the U.N., an increasing number of Judges of the International Court of Justice and of the members of the International Law Commission and several mediators or members of committees of good offices."[71] Thus the term 'new states' is now "outmoded, incorrect and may therefore lead to serious misrepresentation. And this should at all cost be avoided in a field such as international law that is sufficiently hampered by misconceptions and misunderstandings."[72]

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1966) Q. 1 ; P.C.S. (1968) Q. 1.

[64] See Upendra Baxi, "Some Remarks on Eurocentrism and the Law of Nations, Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, Edited by R.P. Anand (1972), p. 3.

[65] J.J.G. Syatauw, "The Relationship between the Newness of States and their Practice of Inernational Law". Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, Edited by R.P. Anand (1972), p. 10.

[66] R.P. Anand, New States and International Law, (Vikas Publications, Delhi, 1972), p. 113.

[67] J.J.G. Syatauw, Some Newly Established Asian States and Development of International Law. (The Hague, Martinus Nijhoff, 1961), p. 234.

A brief reference may also be made here of India's position in regard to the rules and principles of international law. Like other new states, India has also sought to reject or modify some of the rules and principles of the traditional international law. India has neither accepted the whole nor has rejected the entire fabric of the traditional international law. "India, like many other new nations, has expressed dissatisfaction with some of the rules of international law as developed in the West. This, however, does not mean that India's challenge of some of the rules of international law is motivated by any desire to subvert the international legal order. Nor is India's opposition of the same kind as that of the Soviet Challenge."[73] Further, In fact, India's argument would seem to indicate that it is far more influenced by the Western rather than Soviet concepts of international law. This should not be surprising. However, it must not be supposed that India would agree to all the rules and principles that are identified as international law in the West. Rather, it does not challenge the doctrine of international law in the same way as the Soviets challenge it."[74] Since her emergence as new state after the attainment of independence, India has made her own contribution for the progressive development of international law. Her contribution has been particularly significant in the fields of codification of international law, colonial issue,[75] peaceful co-existence[76] and non-alignment.[77]

---

[68] See J.J.G. Syatauw. "The Relationship between the Newness of States and their Practice of International Law". Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, Edited by R.P. Anand, pp. 12-18.

[69] See Robert L. Friedheim, "The Satisfied and Dissatisfied States Negotiate International Law", World Politics (October, 1965).

[70] J.J.G. Syatauw, "Old and New States: A Misleading Distinction for Future International Law and International Relation", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15, No. 2 (1975), p. 153.

[71] J.J.G. Syatauw, "Old and New States: A Misleading Distinction for Future International Law and International Relation", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15, No. 2 (1975), p. 153 at p. 171.

[72] Ibid, at p. 172.

[73] M.K. Nawaz, "International Law in the Contemporary Practice of India: Some prospectives Proc. ASIL, April, 25-27, 1963, p. 275 at p. 289.

[74] M.K. Nawaz, "International Law in the Contemporary Practice of India: Some prospectives Proc. ASIL, April, 25-27, 1963 at p. 282.

It is clear from the above discussion that no serious attempt has been made to devise an Afro-Asian system of International Law either as an adjunct of the existing system or as a substitute for the same nor does it seem to be feasible. The emergence of a large number of Asian-African States has made it clear that the international law which was mainly evolved by European powers to govern their relations with each other, needs reconstruction and reorientation in order to cater the needs and requirements of the majority of states. Hitherto, International Law was mainly based on the concepts of co-existence and reciprocity. From the international law of co-existence and reciprocity, international law now needs to be transformed into an "international law of co-operation."[78] The emergence of the new states has made the international society almost universal. This is evident from the fact that the U.N. has now as many as 191 members as against 51 members when it was established in 1945. International law must also, therefore, become universal in order to serve the interests of all states properly, equitably and effectively. It is generally recognised that like all living law, international law should also be "responsive to the needs of the society to which it was applied. International Law should change with the changed circumstances if it had to retain its health and vitality.[79]

The Breaking up of the Soviet Union.—International Law has been confronted with a new challenge that has manifested itself as a result of the breaking up of the Soviet Union. Hitherto the world was accustomed of having two Super Powers—U.S. and the U.S.S.R. and the Non-Alignment movement functioned as a balancing force. With the disappearance of the Soviet Union, the world has now only one Super Power i.e. the U.S. The domination of one Super Power may pose serious challenge to the existing international law including the law of the U.N. During the Gulf War (1991) the U.S. dominated the Security Council to such an extent that it did not allow the council to hold its meetings until its objective in war was achieved. The fear of domination by one Super Power will continue to lurk in the minds of member states until an alternative is found. That is why, developing states are now clamouring for democratisation of the organs of the U.N. including the Security Council. Though by and large the Soviet Union (now Russia) has endeavoured to reconcile itself with this revolutionary challenge that has taken place, rather befallen yet certain developments such as the eastward expansion of NATO are making the problem more complex. Russia has coped even with this disturbing problem and has now joined the NATO.

Need for Universal International Law

In order to cope with the manifold changes that have taken place and are taking place with accelerating rhythm, the need is to evolve a 'Universal International Law', "a relatively new phrase which has come into vogue in the last few years probably as a result of more intensely perceived ideological division in the world, the insistence on a common set of values as a pre-condition for a viable legal order, and, more recently, the challenge to the traditional body of doctrine and precept emanating from new states in Asia and Africa."[80] As aptly remarked by Prof. Quinsy Wright, "Stability with change, solidarity with variety, peace with justice, international law with national independence, these difficult conciliations, it is the task of international law to effect."[81] It has already been stressed earlier that the traditional definition of international law has now become inadequate. In order to ensure dynamism in international law and to make it universal certain new concepts such as "transnational law",[82] "Common law of mankind"[83], 'world order' and 'world law'[84] etc., have been put forward. The term 'transnational law' has been described as including "all law which regulates actions or events that transcends national frontier. Both public and private international law are included as are other rules, which do not wholly fit into such standard categories......... Transnational situations, then involve, individuals, corporations, states, organisations of states or other groups."[85] In his book, The Common Law of Mankind, C.W. Jenks has also contended that the traditional definition of international law is inadequate because it fails to convey that international law is a part of the Common Law of Mankind in an early stage of development. The term 'world order' has been described as follows: "The image projected is one of human behaviour regulated by law on a world scale in as much the same way as it is not regulated within the State. The order contemplated is supranational but its subject and actors are not necessarily states alone; they may be other groupings or even individuals. World order presumes world community under law; but not necessarily a community of states; it may be a community of individuals, transcending states."[86] Corbett, however, concedes that there are formidable problems and difficulties in the establishment of world law or world order contemplated. He simply states that ".........it has gained, ground and no excessive optimism is required to regard even the present stage as at least law in the making."[87] According to Jenks, "The whole future of man depends on his success in three quests : the quest for world peace, the quest for social justice, and the quest for personal freedom. These quests cannot succeed unless we develop a common law of mankind in an organised world community."[88] The need is therefore to evolve a common law of mankind. To put it in other words, in order to become useful and effective, International Law must keep pace with the accelerated rhythm of change; it must develop faster than it has done in the last fifty years and become more universal. In his excellent paper,[89] Dr. Quincy Wright has rightly pointed out, that the foundations already exist "in the formal acceptance of the states of the purposes, principles, organs and procedure of the United Nations. The challenge is to build on these foundations so that the international system they contemplate, will supersede in practice as well as in theory and law, the inadequate system of power politics that has led to two major and many lesser wars in the twentieth century. Salvation of the world from the holocaust of nuclear war may provide necessary inducement". In South West Africa cases, Judge Tanaka has, also aptly observed : "The unified national laws of the character of jus gentium and the laws of human rights which is of the character of jus naturale in Roman law, both constituting a part of the law of world community which may be designated as World Law, Common Law of Mankind (Jenks 1958), Transnational Law, (Jessup 1956) at the same time constitute a part of international law through the medium of Article 38 (1) (c)".[90] The traditionally, juridically, and individualistic conception of international law is being slowly but steadily, transformed into the law of social interdependence. The most important characteristics of this law are—(a) "It is concerned not only with the delimitation of the rights of states, but also with harmonizing them; (b) in every question it takes into account all its various aspects; (c) it takes the general interest fully into account; (d) it emphasises the notion of the duties of states, not only towards each other but also towards international society; (e) it condemns the use of abuse of right; (f) it adjusts itself to the necessities of international life and evolves together with it; accordingly it is in harmony with policy; and (g) the rights conferred by strictly juridical law it adds which states possess to belong to the international organisation which is being set up.[91]Thus the new International law that is being evolved is not strictly juridical; it also takes into account political, economic, social and psychological factors.[92]

---

[75] See M.K. Nawaz, "International Law in the Contemporary Practice of India: Some prospectives Proc. ASIL, April, 25-27, 1963 at pp. 281-288.

[76] See Nagendra Singh, India and International Law, (S. Chand & Co., New Delhi, 1969), pp. 73-86.

[77] As pointed out by Dr. Nagendra Singh, "In modern times, after Independence in 1947, non-alignment and peaceful co-existence have been the watchwords of this country's foreign policy. In this direction India's contribution can best be summarised in advocacy of the concept of Panchsheel" Ibid. at p. 75: See also Nagendra Singh, "India and International Law". Edited by R.P. Anand (1972), p. 25 at pp. 37-40.

[78] The term 'Co-operative international law' has been defined by W. Friedmann as describing "the growing number of international legal relationships and organisations...... concerned with the regulation of experiments in positive international collaboration. The legal and institutional problems posed by the developing and increasingly important branches of international law are essentially of a different character from those posed by traditional international law. To speak in sociological terms, a developing co-operative international law represents community aspects, rather than society aspects, in relationship between states and nations", Law in a Changing Society (1959), p. 460.

[79] R.P. Anand, Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, (1972), p. xiv.

---

[80] Leo Gross, "Sources of Universal Law", Ibid. p. 189.

[81] "The place of international law in the Contemporary Study and Practice of International Relation," Patna Law College Golden Jubilee Commemoration Volume, p. 62 at p. 76.

[82] See Philip C Jessup, Transnational Law, New Haven, Yale University Press, (1956).

[83] See C.Wilfred Jenks, The Common Law of Mankind (1958); See also Saul H. Mendlovitz, on the Creation of a Just World Order, Preferred worlds for the 1999 (The Free Press, Newyork, 1975); Richard A Falk, A Study of Future Worlds (Newyork, 1975); Rajni Kothari Foot Steps into the Future (1974).

[84] See Percy E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law, (1971). See also Hedley Sull "Models of Future World Order" India Quarterly, Vol. XXXI (1975), p. 62.

[85] Philip C. Jessup, Transnational Law (1956), pp. 2-3.

[86] P.F. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (1971), p. 10.

[87] Ibid, at p. 23.

[88] C.W. Jenks, Social Justice in the Law of Nations (1970), p. vii.

[89] "The Foundations for a Universal International System" in Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law (1972), p. 145 at p. 167.

Reference may be made here to some of international convention or treaties whose membership has become universal or nearly universal. Some of these treaties or conventions are following :

1. U.N. Charter (193 Members);
2. U.N. Convention on Climate Change (197 State Parties);
3. Convention or Treaty Establishing International Labour Organisation (187 of U.N. Members);
4. World Health Organisation (194 Countries);
5. Food and Agricultural Organisation (194 Members);
6. International Monetary Fund (188 State Parties);
7. Universal Postal Union (192 State Parties);
8. International Tele-Communication Union (193 Member States);
9. International Maritime Organisation (173 Members);
10. World Intellectual Property Organisation (192 Members);
11. Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (188 States Parties);
12. International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (177 States Parties);
13. Convention on the Rights of the Child (194 States Parties);
14. World Trade Organisation (164 Members);
15. United Nations Industrial Development Organisation (174 Member States);
16. United Nations Educational, Social and Cultural Organisation (195 Members);
17. World Meteorological Organisation (191 Members);
18. International Finance Corporation (184 Countries);
19. Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (190 Members).
20. U.N. Convention on Biological Diversity (196 States Parties).
21. International Civil Aviation Organisation (193 Members)
22. International Fund for Agricultural Development (173 Members)

---

[90] I.C.J. Rep. (1966), p. 6 at p. 248.

[91] Per Judge Alvarez, Admission of a State to Membership in the United Nations : I.C.J. Rep. (1948), p. 4 at p. 67.

[92] Ibid.

23. U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea (168 Countries)
24. Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961 (192 Members)
25. U.N. Convention to Combat Desertification (197 States Parties)
26. International Development Association (173 Members)
27. Convention on Development, Production, Stockpiling of Bacteriological and Toxic Weapons and their Destruction (190 countries)
28. Vienna Convention on Consular Relations (180 countries)
29. 1989 Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous wastes and Disposal (187 countries)
30. Protocol Additional to the Geneva Convention of 12 August 1949 and Relating to Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflict (174 countries)
31. Protocol Additional Relating to Protection to Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (168 countries)
32. International Convention for Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, 1997 (170 countries)
33. International Convention on Suppression of Financing of Terrorism, 1999 (190 countries)
34. U.N. Convention Against Transnational Organized Crimes, 2000 (185 countries)
35. Protocol to prevent and Suppress and Punish Trafficking of Persons, 2000 (166 countries)
36. International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 (172 countries)
37. International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 1966 (170 countries)
38. International Convention Against Taking of Hostages, 1979 (174 countries)
39. Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Involvement of Children in Armed Conflicts, 2000 (163 countries)
40. Optional Protocol on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography, 2000 (169 countries)
41. International Convention on All Forms of Racial Discrimination, 1966 (182 countries)
42. U.N. Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances, 1989 (189 countries)
43. Convention Concerning the Protection of World Cultural and Natural Heritat, 1972 (191 countries)
44. Vienna Convention for Protection of Ozone Layer, 1985 (197 countries)
45. Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against Safety of Civil Aviation, 1971 (185 countries)
46. Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against Safety of Civil Aviation, 1971 (197 countries)
47. Convention concerning Discrimination in Respect to Employment and Occupation, 1960 (172 countries)
48. Convention on Psychotropic Drugs, 1971 (183 countries)
49. Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs, Psychotropic Substance, 1988 (198 countries)
50. U.N. Convention Against Corruption, 2003 (175 countries)
51. Kyoto Protocol to the U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change, 1997 (192 countries)

52. Genocide Convention, 1948 (152 Members)
53. International Convention for Suppression of Crimes against Persons Enjoying International Protection (Including Diplomatic Representation), 1973 (180 countries)
54. U. N. Convention on Law of Treaties, 1969 (116 countries)
55. Statute of International Criminal Court, 2002 (123 State Parties)
56. Convention on Political Rights of Women, 1952 (123 State Parties)
57. Optional Protocol to the Convention on Political Rights of Women, 31 March, 1953 (123 State Parties)
58. Treaty to ban Anti-Personnel Land Mines, 1997 (164 State Parties)
59. Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (147 Members)
60. Convention Against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, 1984 (147 State Parties)
61. U.N. Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989 (193 Members)
62. Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, 2006 (131 countries)
63. Convention concerning Protection of World Cultural and National Heritage, 1972 (189 countries)
64. Convention on the Development, Production, Stockpiling of Bacteriological and Toxin Weapons and on their Destruction, 1971 (185 countries)

The above list is simply illustrative and by no means exhaustive. The above list shows that even now there are great number of rules of international which apply universally on sovereign nations.

Development of International Law by International Organisations

A brief reference may also be made here to the development of international law by the organs of the international organisations. The organs of international organizations contribute to the clarification and development of international law.[93] They help to create opinio juris but state practice becomes evidence of law only when the vast majority of states believe themselves to be legally bound. These organs often invoke legal principle in order to reach normative decisions. As pointed out by Rosalyn Higgins, "The collective processes in a United Nations organ help to focus attention upon the need for mutual observance of the rules. Indeed, in some cases reference to a widely accepted rule of law can serve a bridge between differing ideologies."[94] The constituent instruments of international organisations represent an advanced stage of the development of international law. They have "introduced a quasi-legislative element in the law making processes at the expense of contractual element, facilitating a quicker response to the problems of international social order."[95]

What is true of the organs of the U.N. is also, even more, true of the organs of the specialized agencies of the U.N. For example, both the World Health Organisation (WHO) and the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) carry out a wide range of activities which contribute to the development of International Law. This has become possible due to the provisions of the Constitutions of these specialized agencies. Under Article 21 of the Constitution of WHO, each Member has undertaken the obligation to take action

---

[93] See Rosalyn Higgins, "The Development of International Law by the Political Organs of the United Nations," Proc. ASIL (1965), p. 116 appearing in Edward Collins (Ed.) International Law in a Changing World, pp. 446-450.

[94] Ibid, at p. 447.

[95] Obed Y. Asamoah, The Legal Significance of the Declarations of General Assembly of the U.N. (1966) p. 2.

relative to the acceptance of the Conventions (adopted by a two-thirds votes of the Health Assembly) or agreement within a period of 18 months after its adoption by the Health Assembly. In case a Member does not accept the convention or agreement within the said time, it is required to furnish the Director-General with a statement of the reasons for non-acceptance. Article 37 of the I.C.A.O. convention authorises the I.C.A.O. to adopt regulations[96] with a wide variety of technical matters essential to the safe and swift operation of international civil aviation. According to Article 90, an annex may be adopted by a two-thirds majority vote of the members of the Council. A regulation thus adopted comes into force three months after its submission to the member-States or within the time specified by the Council, "unless the majority of contracting States register their disapproval with the Council." Under Article 38 of the I.C.A.O. convention, if a member finds it difficult or impracticable to comply with any of the international standards or procedures adopted by the Council, it is under the obligation to notify I.C.A.O. immediately of the differences between its own practices and the practice established by the Annex. If the member concerned fails to notify or remains silent, it will amount to approval.

As pointed out by an Author,[97] "the modifications of the usual international legislative procedures adopted by the World Health Organization and the International Civil Aviation Organization have permitted these two organizations to make valuable contributions to international law. In the case of WHO the most important contribution is without doubt the International Sanitary Regulations." This document is so basic to the prevention of the 'spread of pestilential diseases and one of the few multilateral treaties of its scope without serious loopholes due to incompatible reservations, has been described by Professor Jenks as 'one of the major achievements of the international legislative process."[98] Further, "In the case of the I.C.A.O. the major contribution is in the international standards and recommended practices and procedures which permit international air navigation to be carried on with safety, regularity and efficiency. I.C.A.O.'s enlightened procedures for modification permit the I.C.A.O. to keep up with rapid changes that are taking place in civil aviation and the same time to avoid being bogged down in many of the ordinary time-consuming activities of other international organizations."

Reference may also be made here to the unusual legislative procedure introduced by the International Labour Organization (ILO). Under the Constitution of the ILO, members have undertaken an obligation to submit conventions and recommendations adopted by the conference by a two-thirds majority for the consideration of the national authorities competent to give effect to their provisions. Once accepted, these conventions become binding upon members. The legislative procedure of the ILO, when introduced in 1919, was a radical innovation in following three respects : (1) "The whole conception of a convention being adopted by an international conference by a two-thirds majority and authenticated by the President and the Secretary-General of the conference instead of being signed by plenipotentiaries was then new." (2) "An even more radical innovation than the substitution of adoption for signature was the participation in the act of adoption of non-government delegates voting independently. This has remained a unique feature of ILO procedure. "No less radical and unprecedented an innovation was the obligation to submit conventions adopted by the International Labour Conference by a two-thirds majority for parliamentary consideration irrespective of the attitude towards the convention of the representatives of the Government concerned."[99] [96] Regulations are the combination of 'international standards' and 'recommended practices' dealing with technical matters essential to the safe and swift, operation of international civil aviation and are designated as "Annexes" to the ICAO convention. A 'recommended practice' is one the uniform application of which is desirable in the interests of safety and efficiency of international air navigation. The members are not under obligation to obey it, on the other hand an "international standard" is recognised as necessary for the safety or regularity of international civil aviation. It is binding upon the members, I.C.A.O. International Standards and Recommended Practices Personal Licensing Annex. I (Fifth Edition), Montreal, (1962), p. 3.

---

[97] George A. Codding, Jr. : "Contributions of the World Health Organization and the International Civil Aviation Organization to the Development of International Law" Proc. ASIL (1985), p. 147.

[98] C. Wilfred Jenks, the Common Law of Mankind (London : Stevens & Sons, 1958) op. cit 187.

A brief reference may also be made to a similar provision in the Constitution of the Universal Postal Union (UPU) which provides that those postal administrations which do not respond to a proposal put to them by the International Bureau within a period of three months, will be considered to be in agreement with the proposal. As written by Codding, Jr., "The experiences of WHO and ICAO have a high potential value. Other international agencies could possibly adopt them profitably to their own use, particularly those agencies whose activities are of a technical nature. A combination of all the special procedures of ILO, WHO, ITU and UPU in one international organization provides speculation. In any case, it is becoming increasingly obvious that some major changes are needed in the international legislative process if the international community is to be able to keep up with the amount of work that is being delegated by States to international organizations. The WHO and ICAO have, at least, made a start."

Now the world is witnessing the third phase of the post-war development of international organisations. The first phase started immediately after 1945 when U.N. system including the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank was established. The second phase started near about 1960 when common market, organisation of European Co-operation and Regional Development Bank etc. were established. The third phase started near about 1973 and is still continuing. In the third phase, U.N. Environment Programme, World Food Council, International Energy Agency (IEA) etc. have been established.[100] The importance of international organisations is constantly increasing and they are making significant contribution for the development of international law. In many matters they have become part and parcel of international life.

Thus this international legislative procedures established and developed by the specialized agencies are far advanced than those established and developed by the organs of the U.N. The organs of the United Nations particularly the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council, should emulate the examples of the specialized agencies discussed above. Jenks has aptly remarked : "The future of International law, and in large measure the future of international society, depends on our succeeding in developing during next generation a whole series of new major branches of the law of which, despite immense and most encouraging progress during the last half-century only the beginnings as yet exist. Indeed, "The future belongs to International Organisations."[101] And the future of international organisation is safe so long as the United Nations is there. The United Nations has already completed more than sixty years of its successful existence. Since it has become an indispensable organisation the development of international law will go in future, rather it will gather momentum in the course of time. Though the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations is indeed a great achievement and deserved the wide publicity it received yet another historic event of great importance was the 50th anniversary of the International Court of Justice on 18th April, 1996 which was unfortunately eclipsed by the former event.[102] So far as the development of international law is concerned, the latter event is equally, or even more significant.

---

[99] C. Wilfred Jenks : Social Justice in the Law of Nations—The ILO Impact After Fifty years (Hersch Lauterpacht Lectures, 1969 [Oxford University Press, 1970] at pp. 22-25.

[100] C. Fred Bergsten, "Interdependence and the Reform of International Institutions" Int. Orgn., Vol. 30, No. 2 (Spring 1976), p. 361.

[101] E. Shibaeva, "Law of International Organizations in the System of Modern International Law", IJIL, Vol. 17 (1977), p. 227 at p. 233; See also M.K. Nawaz, "Law and International Organization", IJIL Vol. (1977), p. 234.

[102] See Rahmatullah Khan, "50th Anniversary of the International Court of Justice", IJIL, Vol. 36, No. 4 of 1996, p. 80.

Rethinking about new international law making processes[103]

In view of the revolutionary changes that have taken place in the field of international law, it has become imperative that the speed of development of international law be accelerated and the law-making processes of new international law be amended and be made in consonance with changing times and circumstances. Law-making capacity of General Assembly resolutions should be recognized and they should be used for the development of international law. New means and processes should be developed so as to make use of the advisory opinions of the International Court of Justice for the development of international law. Article 38(1) should be amended to incorporate decisions and determinations of the organs of International Organisations as a source of international law. This formal recognition will infuse dynamism in international law and will enable it to keep pace with changing times and circumstances. There is also the need of serious reconsideration over the basis of obligation in international law. The basis of obligation in international law is changing from sovereignty oriented consent to community oriented consensus.[104] Along with consent, consensus should also be recognized as a basis of obligation in international law. The concept of Jus Cogens should be further developed and encouraged so that international law may be developed as a super-national system binding on all states. In order to achieve the objective of progressive development of international law and its codification powers and jurisdiction of the International Law Commission should be enhanced.

Brief Review of International Law in the Second Millennium.—The Second Millennium witnessed the birth, growth and development of Public International Law as a universal force or a legal system to reckon with. The modern International Law as a definite branch of jurisprudence which we know today is said to be dating from the Sixteenth and Seventeenth centuries. Born as it were in Europe, it was determined by the modern European system. Started to serve the interests of a few European States and thus marked by Euro-centrism, in the course of time it became a branch of jurisprudence of general and then universal application. There has been vertical and horizontal expansion of International Law. Besides applying on the lands, rules of International Law apply to outer space, lakhs of kilometres outside the orbit of Earth to the thousands of metre's below the waters of the Oceans. On the other hand, from being traditional law governing the relation of sovereign states, international law expanded to embrace international organisations, non-state entities and individuals as its subjects. Indeed the establishment of the U.N. and development of human rights was probably the most remarkable things that were witnessed in the second millennium. While traditionally comprising of only customary and treaty rules, international expanded to include general principles of law recognized by civilized states, decision and determinations of judicial and arbitral tribunals and juristic works.

While there has been phenomenon expansion of international law, it was also confronted with challenges at different fronts such as those of nuclear weapons, Scientific and Technological revolution, environmental degradation and pollution population explosion etc. While some serious efforts such as those of entering into International Nuclear Forces Treaty (INF Treaty), Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START), Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT) and Comprehensive Test Bond Treaty (CTBT), have been made the challenge remains still formidable and grim. So is the case with the problem of environmental pollution and degradation. Yet another anomaly that has been witnessed during the Second Millennium is the uneven development and progress of countries of the world. While a few countries European and American have prospered, a number of Asian and African countries are still struggling with shortages of food and consumer goods. The population explosion has further complicated the problem and has made the situation quite grim. Yet another serious problem confronting the International Law is the growing menace of terrorism with its different manifestations such as hijacking and taking of hostages and its linkage with illicit drug trafficking. Last but not the least, establishment of peace remains as elusive as ever. Though it is quite heartening to note that the United Nations, which was established after the Second World War, has been successful in preventing the Third World War yet it cannot and must not be forgotten that absence of war does not denote peace. It is ironical that the United Nations Charter simply speaks of 'maintenance' of international peace and security and not the establishment of peace. The pre-requisites of the establishments of peace are economic, social and political justice which remain the cherished goal to achieve.

---

[103] For a little detailed study see paper entitled "Rethinking About New International Law Making Processes" read by the author on 2nd April, 1989 at New Delhi in the Twenty-third Annual Conference of the Indian Society of International Law.

[104] See R.P. Anand, "International Organisations and Functioning of International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 240, No. 1 of 1984, p. 63.

Challenges before International Law in the Third Millennium.—It is desirable to keep in mind the challenges before International Law in the Third Millennium. One of the greatest challenges before International Law in the Third Millennium is the danger of a nuclear war. As noted above, despite serious efforts to meet this challenge in the Second Millennium, the situation continues to remain serious rather grim. If the nuclear war takes place, either the man may have to start again from the stone age or while mankind may be erased from the face of earth. One of the main reasons for the lack of success in this field is the narrow national interests and ambitions and lack of mutual trust and confidence among states. Even the realization of the consequences of even a limited nuclear war have failed the countries to come together for the general benefit of the whole mankind. International Law will have to cope with this great menace. At stake is the very survival of mankind.

Yet another formidable challenge is that of environmental degradation and pollution which is no less serious than that of a nuclear war. Serious efforts have been made in the Second Millennium to solve this problem. Stockholm Conference of 1972 and Earth Summit of 1992 deserve special mention in this connection. These conferences have simply sown the seeds, shown the ways through which the problem can be solved. But the real problem is that of implementation. For example, in the Kyoto Environmental Summit on Global warming it has been decided that America, European Union and Japan will reduce the consumption of green house gases by 7%, 8% and 6% from the level of 1990 and these targets will have to be achieved in between 2008 and 2012. Only the Third Millennium will witness whether the countries named above are able to achieve these targets. There was, however, a setback when America abandoned the treaty in 2001. The Kyoto Treaty came into force on 16 February, 2005 and has now as many as 187 States Parties. But America, the main polluter did not become a member of the Treaty. This is indeed a great setback. Moreover many Asian and African countries including India because of their economic problems are not able to make their contributions in the reduction of consumption of green house gases. If the present and ensuing environmental problems are not solved in a near future, the Planet Earth will have to encounter a very bleak and grim future. If the present rate of warming up of the Earth continues, waters of oceans may rise by several metres, ice on the high mountains may melt, vegetation and human life may suffer because of direct ultra-violet rays of the sun, disease's like cancer may proliferate and so on.

Glaring examples of oonstant increase in global warming of the planet earth are Nuclear disaster in Japan and bursting of clouds and flash flood in Kedarnath and Badrinath in Uttarakhand. Mankind will be in peril if it does not take heed of these and several other events.

Yet another challenge before International Law in the Third Millennium is the menace of terrorism. It is unfortunate that no serious attempt had been made till recently to tackle this problem at the international level. International Law during the Third Millennium will have to tackle this problem.

The United States of America had to pay dearly for the attack of terrorists on twin towers of World Trade Centre at Newyork on 11th September, 2001, i.e. the very first year of the New Millennium is without any shade of doubt are the most horrible and devastating events of the history. It shook not only America, the mightiest country of the world but also the whole world. It sent the chilling shock waves throughout the entire world. If America, the strongest nation of the world, can thus be the target of the terrorists no country in the entire world is safe.

America regarded it as a war against it and vowed to avenge itself. But America did not respond immediately. America first enlisted the support of its allies and other countries and even asked Pakistan to support it in its war against terrorism. Then America waged a full-scale war against Taliban Government of Afghanistan. Due to heavy American bombings, for nearly two months the Taliban Government crumbled and collapsed. Due to the efforts of the United Nations, a new interim Government of Afghanistan has been formed.

Yet another serious event that manifested the menace of terrorism was the terrorist attack on Indian Parliament on 13th December, 2001. Though the attempt was foiled by the security staff of the Parliament, it shocked the conscience of whole nation and underlined the need of more and strict vigilance over all the important buildings of the country.

The menace of terrorism has not abated even after the decline and fall of Taliban Government of Afghanistan. This is evident from the terrorist attack on American Centre at Kolkata. Fortunately, the international community seems to have awakened to the grave challenges of terrorism. For example, the United Nations adopted the International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism, 1999. The United Nations adopted International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism (April, 2005). But acts of terrorism all over the world, especially in India, remain unabated. This is evident from London Blast in July, 2005, attack on Ram Janam Bhumi Premises at Ayodhya in July, 2005, attack on Sankatmochan Temple in Varanasi and Mumbai Blasts at Local Trains on 7 August, 2006. Though India is most hard-pressed due to terrorist attacks for a long time, yet it cannot but be denied that terrorism is not limited to India, it has spread all over world even in America and Britain. It can be curbed only with the help and cooperation of all nations.

During the Third Millennium International Law will also have to cope with scientific and technological advances in the field of means of communication and telecommunication which are taking place with an accelerated speed.

A formidable challenge before International Law in the Third Millennium is that of economic disparity. A considerable number of Asian and African countries are still facing the problems of poverty, shortages of food and consumer goods, debt burden etc. During the Second Millennium, the concept of new-International Economic Order was evolved but despite several solemn declarations it could not make much headway due to non-cooperation of developed countries. Ultimately the forces free and open markets and capitalism triumphed. This finds its manifestation in the establishment of the World Trade Organisation (WTO). Even countries like Russia, despite their inhibitions, have been compelled to vying with other countries to get the membership of this organisation which is the brain child of countries like America. China has already become a member of W.T.O. International Law in the Third Millennium will have to cope with this formidable problem. So long as there is a wide gap and economic disparity between the rich and poor countries permanent and lasting peace cannot be secured or established.

Last but not the least, one of the most remarkable things that took place after the establishment of the United Nations was the development of the concept of Human Rights which tended to make International Law a branch of jurisprudence of universal application. While human rights jurisprudence has recorded phenomenon growth during last fifty years, it is somewhat paradoxical that violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms all over the world have not abated. The problem of their observance and implementation still remains crucial. There is no dearth of law. Monitoring and international supervision of the observance of human rights will have to be improved in the Third Millennium.

Recent Developments

Two prominent developments have taken place which may change or affect India's future in particular and whole world in general. The first development is the conclusion of Indo-U.S. Nuclear Deal on July 18, 2005, India and the U.S. signed the landmark Civilian Nuclear Agreement in Washington DC. This event took the world by surprise on March 2, 2006, separation of Civilian and Military Nuclear Reactors was initiated by India and the U.S. that listed out which reactor India would put under IAEA safeguards. On December 18, 2006, the Hyde Act was passed by the U.S. Congress and was enacted into law by President Bush amending the U.S. Atomic Energy Act. On July 27, 2007, the 123 Agreement was initiated by the U.S. and India outlining how they would conduct civilian Nuclear trade.

On August 1, 2008 International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) cleared India's specific safeguards agreement that defines its level of supervision of civilian Nuclear plants. The next step was Nuclear Supply Group (NSG) waiver. The NSG waiver came through after intense negotiations among its 45 members to allow nuclear trade with India. Finally, on October 8, 2008, President Bush signed the Act and made the 123 Agreement as approved by the Congress into in the U.S. Law. Subsequently, the formal signing of the Agreement between the representatives of the U.S. and India was also completed. Thus ending 30 years of isolation, India has become a member of elite club of Nuclear Nation. Thus India can import much needed fuel for its plants. While, India's weapons programme can develop unhindered. India can now import sensitive technology for reprocessing and enrichment of fuel. So also India can export its indigenously designed nuclear reactors to other countries. There is likelihood of $100 billion worth of nuclear commerce in the next 20 years. Thus India can now formally begin trade in civilian nuclear technology while continuing to develop its weapons.

The second development is India's mission to the Moon. On 22 October, 2008, India launched at 6.22 a.m. its spacecraft to the Moon, thus becoming the 6th nation to enter the elite club in this field. Further, it is planned that Indians in Moon will be in 2020. By 2015, India will send its own astronauts into space.

Indian Space Research Organisation (ISRO) is making innovations day by day and by leaps and bound. On 25th June, 2017 it launched into orbit 13 satellites including Cartosat-2E satellite. The recently launched 712 kg cartosat series space craft is an advanced remote sensing satellite capable of providing scene-specific spot imagery. This time the total weight of all the 13 satellites was about the weight of several elephants, indeed a great achievement. Earlier, ISRO surprised the world by launching into space 104 satellites including the satellites of developed nations such as America, Russia, France etc. It is a world record.

N.B.—For further details see, Chapter on Outer Space.

Conclusion

It is clear from the above discussion that International Law, like all living law, is not static; it gathers dynamism and activity mending itself to the needs of the day. It is quite obvious that "New times bring more varied problems, and the area of International Law is one of the area where novel concepts and new directions will have to be fashioned to cope with problems being posed under new circumstances."[105] "Every new crisis seems to add voices—voices of goodwill which ask whether that law is not already long out of today's date, also left behind by radical developments in international society."[106] It may, however, be added that every new crisis may become the harbinger of new developments in international law. The genocide perpetrated in Bangladesh is a glaring example of this phenomenon. According to Thomas M. Frank and Nigel Rodley, "International Law is not static. The Bangladesh case is an example, by far the most important in our times, of the unilateral use of military force justified inter alia, on human rights grounds, and India succeeded. International law, as a branch of behaviourial science as well as normative philosophy, may treat this event as the harbinger of a new law that will henceforth, increasingly govern inter-State relations. Perhaps India's example by its success has already entered into the nations' conscious expectations of future conduct".[107] The apalling human tragedy and genocide perpetrated in an unprecedented scale in Bangladesh ceased to be a matter of domestic affair of Pakistan and had become international. It clearly demonstrated the utter helplessness of the international machinery for the protection of human rights.[108] It also dawned the realization to evolve norms and principles of International law to cover such situations. It would, therefore, be no excessive optimism to hope that the Bangladesh episode may be a harbinger of new law in the field of human rights. The traditional International Law has undergone enormous changes in the last fifty years. International Law has always endeavoured to cope with the changing times and circumstances. There is no reason to believe that the possibilities of future growth have been exhausted. International Law "is still growing and indeed the pace has increased enormously in the last fifty years."[109]

---

[105] Leonard M. Salter, "International Law in Transition ; New norms for Old", The Int. Lawyer, Vol. 7, No. 3 (July 1973), p. 687.

In the absence of a world legislative body, International Law finds itself confronted with many problems and difficulties keeping pace with the needs of the day. It is, however, heartening to note that since the inception of the United Nations Charter, the most remarkable constitutional development has been the continuous growth of the powers and functions of the General Assembly. The resolutions and declarations of the General Assembly are generally said to be recommendatory but under certain circumstances they may be more than mere recommendations and may create legal implications. Being the most representative of the U.N.'s organs, the General Assembly has great potentialities of future growth and its declarations and resolutions have great potentialities of becoming the sources of Universal International Law.[110] The International Court of Justice has also lent its support to this auspicious evolution of the law of the United Nations.[111] It is, however, not suggested that the General Assembly has become an international legislative power but that it may become if its growth continues unhampered. In the words of Judge Alvarez,[112] "the General Assembly... is the meeting place where states discuss political matters of general interest... in doing so, the Assembly is in a good position to reconcile law and politics. In short, the Assembly...... is tending to become an international legislative power. In order that it may actually become such a power, all that is needed is that governments and public opinion should give it support. Public opinion is an important factor which comes into play in the new International Law." It has been aptly pointed out, "The G.A. (i.e. General Assembly) resolutions constituted the "joint action" and the 'process' through which states and peoples pursued their objectives. The point is, it would be naive to ignore such law creating resolutions—one may legitimately go a step further to state that given the current concerns of the world community and the versimilitude of joint action being taken, law-making conventions and conferences are only tiny episodes in the drama of creation of International Law.

---

[106] "Force, Intervention and Neutrality in Contemporary International Law", Proc. ASIL, April 25-27, 1963, p.147.

[107] After Bangladesh : The Law of Humanitarian Intervention by Military Force", AJIL, Vol. 67, No. 2 (April, 1973) p. 275 at p. 303.

[108] See "U.N. Prevention of Human Rights Violations : The Bangladesh case" Int. Orgn. Vol. 27. No. 1 (Winter, 1973), p. 115; See also "Biafra, Bengal and Beyond; International Responsibility and Genocidal Conflict", AJIL Vol. 66, No. 4, (September 1972), p. 89.

[109] J.E.S. Fawcett : The Law of Nations (London, 1968), p. 27.

[110] See Leo Gross : "Sources of International Law", Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, Edited by R.P. Anand (1972), p. 189 at pp. 204-209.

[111] See for example Judgment of Judge Alvarez in Admissions case, I.C.J. Rep. (1948), p. 68, Injuries Case, I.C.J. Rep. (1949), p. 182 and Certain Expenses case, I.C.J. Rep. (1962), p. 185.

[112] Reservations to the Genocide Convention, I.C.J. Rep. (1951), p. 15 at p. 49

For modern international law in the making one needs to look beyond the law-making conferences to the law creating conferences......... the UNCTAD, GATT, IBRD, IMF, OECD, OPEC, etc. are vigorously involved in creating this new International Law............... And International Law would cease to have any validity or relevance if it did not take cognizance of the processes through which the world community pursued its pressing concerns."[113]

For the development of International Law in the present times, following four points also deserve a special mention—(1) The development of International Law now does not depend on the will of some powerful states. (2) As compared to the years preceding the Second World War, the Communist States are now taking more active part in International Legislation. (3) Newly independent states are taking active part in the development of International Law. (4) Large number of newly independent states will greatly influence the development of International Law. This will influence specially the economic condition of individual states.[114]

"International law is confronted with many difficult problems and challenges, the most formidable being the danger to our entire planet from a nuclear conflagration. International law today is involved constantly in the resolution of these difficult problems and challenges and has become a dynamic and progressive force in the world.[115]

The significance of the present International Law need not be over-emphasized. Indeed it is that indispensable body of rules regulating for its most part the relations between states, without which it would be virtually impossible for them to have steady and frequent intercourse. It is in fact an expression of the necessity of their mutual relationships. In the absence of some system of International Law, the international society of states could not enjoy the benefits of trade and commerce, of exchange of ideas, and of normal routine communication."[116]

International Law "must be continuously developed by revision in content, expansion of scope, and improvement of the means of securing compliance, so that it is kept in accord with the changing needs of the international community".[117] Since the present age is witnessing accelerating and meteoric changes on so many fronts, International Law must also develop much faster than it has done in the past. If at any time, the lag between the law and changes taking place in the international field widens too much, the resultant will be inevitable catastrophe. Indeed the future of mankind rests on the capability of International Law to develop and adapt itself to the changing times and circumstances.

---

[113] Rahmatullah Khan, "International Law—Old and New", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 371 at p. 374; see also Rosalyn Higgins. The Development of International Law through the Political Organs of the United Nations (1963), p. 2; Guenter Weissberg, "United Nations Movements Towards World Law" I.C.L.Q. Vol. 24, Part 3 (July 1975), p. 460 at p. 461; see also Michel Virally, "The Sources of International Law" in Sorensen, Manual of Public International Law, p. 162.

[114] Leo J. Bouchez, "Some Reflections on the Present and Future of the Law of the Sea" in the Present State of International Law (1973), p. 143 at p. 149.

[115] R.S. Pathak, "The Functioning of International Law in the International System", I.J.I.L., Vol. 24 (1984) p. 1.

[116] Starke's International Law Eleventh Edition, Butterworths (September, 1994, Edited by I.A. Shearer), p. 14.

[117] Edward Collins, note 20, p. 424.

CHAPTER 2

DEFINITION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

In the view of European Scholars, modern International Law is determined by the modern European system. According to Oppenheim, International Law is "essentially a product of Christian civilization, and began gradually to grow from the second half of the Middle Ages." [1] This view is subject to criticism because there are several such principles and rules of International Law as existed in their developed form in the ancient period. Some of them are such as existed in their developed form in ancient India. The view of Oppenheim and other Western jurists that International Law owes its birth to the modern European system is not correct. International Law was in a developed state in the Ramayana and Mahabharat period.[2] The example of International Law relating to Diplomatic Agents may be cited in this connection. Thus the birth of International Law can be traced back to ancient times.[3] However, it cannot be denied that the words 'International Law' were used for the first time by eminent British jurist, Jermy Bentham in 1780.[4] Since then, these words have been used to denote the body of rules which regulate the relations among the States. Though International law can be traced to ancient Greece, Rome and India, it cannot be denied that the public International law which we know today, study and practice has come to us through Europe. It is determined by the modern European system. It will, therefore, be proper to refer it as 'modern international law.'

Definition*

I. L. Oppenheim.—Professor Oppenheim has defined International Law in the following words :

> "Law of Nations or International Law is the name for the body of customary and conventional rules which are considered legally binding by civilized States in their intercourse with each other."

This definition[5] was given by Oppenheim in 1905. Oppenheim is one of the most celebrated authors of Public International Law. A critical discussion of Oppenheim's definition is made below with a view to show and highlight the changes that have taken place in the concept and definition of Public International Law during the last to ten decades.

---

[1] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. 1, Eighth Edition (1970 reprint), p. 6.

[2] See S.S. Dhavan, The Ramayana—International Law in the Age of Ramayan, National Herald Magazine, Jan. 28, 1973, p.1.

[3] Dr. Nagendra Singh, aptly remarked: "A study of the Smrities (200 B.C. to 400 A.D.) would undoubtedly reveal that Ancient India had a highly developed system pertaining to the laws and rules of war based on considerations of humanity and chivalry. The rules of war applied even if the struggle was in the nature of a civil war which is again in conformity with the modern concept as embodied in the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the one underlying the recognition of belligerency.... Let alone the laws of war, it was much more to in the realm of the laws of peace that India's contribution as far as universality of application is concerned came to be so well-marked and known.... Apart from the aforesaid illustrations concerning the laws of war, there are several important topics of International Law such as the right of asylum, the treatment of aliens or foreign nationals, the immunity and privileges of ambassadors etc., in respect of which India evolved rules and regulations dating back to some years before Christ." India and International Law (1969), pp. 3-4, 11 and 21. For India's contribution to the Development of International Law; see also excellent article, "India and International Law" by Nagendra Singh appearing in Asian State and Development of Universal International Law, edited by R. V. Anand, (1972), pp. 25-42.

[4] See L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. 1, Eighth Edition, p. 94.

* See Q. No. 2 of P.C.S. Exam. 1976—For the answer of this question see the definitions of Oppenheim, Brierly, Holland, etc. and the criticism of the definition of Oppenheim. See also 'conclusion' given after the definitions. The correct definition of International Law has been given under the heading 'Conclusion' ; see this also, for Q. No. of I.A.S. Exam, (1972) ; see also for P.C.S. (1985) Q. 1 See also matter discussed under Chapter 1.

 See also for CSE (1995) Q. 5 (a) ; see also for IAS (2002) Q. 5 (a) UPPCS (2002) Q. 5; see also Nature and Basis of International Law.

[5] See Oppenheim, International Law (Newyork, Longmans, Green & Co., 1905) pp. 1-2.

Criticism.—Professor Oppenheim's definition suffers from several serious defects. It might have been good and adequate when it was given but now it has outlived its utility and has become obsolete and inadequate.[6] "Indeed every important element in it can now be challenged." The definition of Oppenheim has been subjected to following criticism—

(i) In the first place... "it is now generally recognized that, not only "States" but public international organisations, have rights and duties under International Law, even though they may not have all the rights and duties that States have." [7] In fact, "The future of International Law is one with the future of International organisation." [8]

(ii) The use of the term 'civilized states' by Oppenheim is also severely criticized. The criterion of distinguishing so-called 'uncivilized states' was neither long history nor culture. Even though China had 5,000 years old culture, she was not included in the group of civilized states. So was the case of oriental States. In not too distant past, the Western States regarded only the 'Christian States' as 'Civilized States'. This criterion was undoubtedly wrong. At present there are as many as 193 members of the U.N. which include Christian as well as non-Christian States. That is why, in later editors of Oppenheim's book have deleted the term 'civilized states'. For example, in eighth edition of Oppenheim's book,[9] International Law has been defined in the following words :

"Law of Nations or International Law (Droit des gens, volkerrecht) is the name for the body of customary and treaty rules which are considered legally binding by States in their intercourse with each other."

(iii) Thirdly, "More controversial but no longer untenable is the view that even individuals and other private persons may have some such rights and duties." [10] Of all the changes that have taken place in the International Law since the Second World War, the most important change has been the addition of new subjects.[11] The main change that has taken place is that from the formal structure of relation of States it is moving towards the interests and welfare of citizens of member States.[12] As Jenks has rightly remarked : "contemporary International Law can no longer be reasonably presented within the framework of the classical exposition of International Law as the law governing the relations between states but must be regarded as the common law of mankind in an early stage of its development."* It is no longer possible to regard International Law as governing relations solely between States. At present, it also governs relations between States and international organisations, between States and private persons, and between International Organisations and private persons. This has been conceded even in later editions of

---

[6] Oliver, J. Lissitzyn, International Law To-day and Tomorrow (Oceana Publications Inc. Dobbs Ferry, Newyork, (1965), p. 38.

[7] Ibid; see also Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the U.N. Advisory opinion, I.C.J. Rep. (1949), p. 174; D.W. Bowett, The Law of International Institutions (London, Stevens & Sons, 1963), pp. 273-310, Percy E. Corbett. The Growth of World Law (Princeton, New Jersey, (1971), p. 183. See also Josef L. Kunj, "The Changing Law of Nations", A.J.I.L., Vol. 51 (1957), p. 77.

[8] Percy E. Corbett, Law and Society in the Relation of States, p. 12 ; See also E. Shibaeva, "Law of International Organisations in the System of Modern International Law", I.J.I.L. Vol. 17 (1977), p. 227 at p. 233.

[9] L, Oppenheim, International Law—A Treatise, Vol. I Peace, Eighth Edition, Edited by H. Lauterpacht, pp. 4-5.

[10] See W. Friedmann, The Changing Structure of International Law (1964), pp. 221-249. See also Dr. B.V.A. Rolling, International Law is an Expanded World (Djambatan N.V. Amsterdam, 1960), p. xxii; see also P.E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (1971), p. 184; C. Wilfred Jenks, Social Justice in the Law of Nations (1970), pp. 16-20.

[11] Friedmann, Ibid, at p. 57.

[12] C.W. Jenks, The Common Law of Mankind (1958), p. 27, See also W. Friedmann, "Changing Dimension of International Law", Columbia Law Review, Vol. 62 (1962), p. 1147 at p. 1148.

[*] Asked Q. No. 3 of I.A.S. Exam, (1972) ; For answer see also preceding asterisk ; see also matter discussed under the heading "Need for Universal International Law" in Chapter 1.

Oppenheim's book. For example, in eighth edition of his book following passage deserves mention : "It must be noted that although the rules of International Law are primarily those which govern the relation of states, the latter are not the only subjects of International law. International organisations and, to some extent, also individuals may be subjects of rights conferred and duties imposed by international law." [13] In this connection, the example of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice on Effects of Awards of Compensation made by the U.N. Administrative Tribunals[14] may also be cited. Besides this, 1965 Convention on Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States deserves a special mention. Reference may also be made to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, which enumerates a number of rights of the individuals and now "constitutes authoritative interpretation" of the human rights provisions of the Charter. International Covenants of Human Rights and the Optional Protocol to the Covenants on Civil and Political Rights further confirm that the individuals have become not only the subjects of International Law but can also directly claim rights and remedies provided under International Law. Individuals can send petitions to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights. Individuals can also send petitions (or make complaints) to the Human Rights' Committee established under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966. Above all, the Charter of the U.N. begins with the words "we the people of the United Nations." The developments since the inception of the U.N., particularly the international protection of human rights, have confirmed that these words have not crept into the Charter incidentally but were deliberately used and were pregnant with meaning. It may, therefore, be observed that the present International Law cannot be regarded as the law governing the relations between States, but must be regarded "as the common law of mankind in an early stage of its development." European Convention on Human Rights, 1950, American Convention on Human Rights, Convention on Suppression and Punishment of Apartheid, 1973, Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, etc. also deserve a special mention in this connection.

(iv) Fourthly, "it is now widely recognised that International Law consists not only customary and conventional rules but also of 'General Principles of Law.'[15] Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice mentions 'General Principles of Law Recognised by Civilized States' as the third source in order under which the sources of International Law are to be used while deciding an international dispute. That is to say, if the Court does not find any International Treaty or International custom on a particular point under dispute, the Court may take the help of 'General Principles of Law Recognized by Civilized States'. As aptly pointed out by Lord McNair, it describes, "the inexhaustible reservoir of legal principles from which tribunals can enrich and develop public International Law." [16]

(v) Fifthly, "the very conception that international law as a "body of rules" now stands changed as static and inadequate." Further, "Like all living law, international law does not stand still but is continuously reinterpreted and reshaped in the very process of its application by authoritative decision-

4603
LIBRARY
Acc. No.

---

[13] Oppenheim, note 9, pp. 5-6.

[14] (1954) I.C.J. Rep., p. 47.

[15] Lissitzyn, Supra Note 6, p. 39.

[16] McNair : "The General Principles of Law Recognised by Civilized Nations" BYBIL Vol. XXXIII (1957), p. 1 at p. 6; see also Manley O. Hudson, The Permanent Court of International Justice, 1920-1942 (Newyork 1943), pp. 606-620; J.E.S. Fawcett : The Law of Nations (London, 1968), pp. 21-25; Vladimir Paul : "General Principles of Law in International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 10 (1970), p. 324.

makers, national and international." [17] International Law, or any law for that matter is a dynamic concept. Law changes with the change of time and circumstances. A law, to be living, must be flexible, adaptable and changeable. M.A. Kaplan and Nde B. Ketzenbach[18] have aptly remarked, "it is now a common place that the law is a process, not a body of self-executing rules". What is true of law, in general is also true of International Law. The changing character of International Law is a consequence of transformation of general conditions, a transformation the impact of which is equally felt in the municipal legal orders. This is good so far as it goes but it cannot be denied that it has become customary to define law as "body of rules." Therefore it is not proper to criticise Oppenheim on this account.

In view of the changing character of International Law, Oppenheim's earlier definition has now become obsolete and inadequate. Prof. Friedmann has remarked, "Both in volume and scope, the area of international institutions and agreement has greatly widened. International Law is today actively and continuously concerned with such divergent and vital matters as human rights, crimes against peace and humanity, the International control of nuclear energy, trade organisation, labour conventions, transport control or health regulations. This is not to say in all or any of these fields international law prevails, but there is no doubt today that they are its legitimate concern." [19] Further, "As International Law moves today on so many levels, it would be surprising indeed if the traditional principles of inter-State relations developed in previous centuries were adequate to cope with the vastly more divergent subject-matters of International Law of the present day.[20] It has, therefore, become necessary to redefine International Law. "The redefinition of International Law will be a continuing process, but it will be increasingly unlike the subject defined and handed down to us by previous generations." [21]

New Definition of International law in ninth edition of Oppenheim's Book.—The editors of the ninth edition of Oppenheim's book, Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts have revised Oppenheim's definition of International law. In their words :

"International law is the body of rules which are legally binding on States in their intercourse with each other. These rules are primarily those which govern the relation of states, but States are not the only subjects of international law. International Organisations and, to some extent, also individuals may be subjects of rights conferred and duties imposed by international law." [22]

Further, "States are the principal subjects of international law .... States are primarily, but not exclusively, the subjects of international law. To the extent that bodies other than States directly possess some rights, power and duties in international law they can be regarded as subjects of international law, possessing international personality." [23] Moreover, "Not only individuals but also certain territorial or political units other than States, to a limited extent, be directly the subject of rights and duties under international law." [24]

---

[17] Lissitzyn, Supra note 6, p. 39.

[18] The Political Foundations of International Law. (John Wiley & Sons, 1961), p. 231; See also Myres McDougal, "International Law and Social Science; A Mild Plea in Avoidance", A.J.I.L., Vol. 66 (1972), p. 77.

[19] W. Friedmann, "Some Impacts of Social Organizations on International Law", A.J.I.L., Vol. 50 (1956), p. 475 at p. 477.

[20] Ibid.

[21] W. Friedmann, "The Changing Dimensions of International Law", Columbia Law Review, Vol. 62 (1962), p. 1147 at p. 1165.

[22] Oppenheim's International Law, Ninth Edition (Longman Group U.K. Limited and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992), Vol. I, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, p. 4.

[23] Ibid, at p. 16.

[24] Ibid, at p. 17.

Thus the above concept and definition of International Law given in ninth edition of Oppenheim's International Law is nearly similar to that given by Starke and Fenwick. However, it is still deficient in one respect because it is still conscpicuous for its silence regarding general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

In view of the foregoing discussion and taking into consideration the present state of international law, international law may be defined "as the body of general principles and specific rules which are binding upon the members of international community in their mutual relations." [25] The term 'international community' is very appropriate for it includes States, international institutions, individuals and other non-State entities.

II. Some other Definitions.

(i) J.L. Brierly.—In the words of Brierly : "The Law of Nations or International Law may be defined as the body of rules and principles of action which are binding upon civilized States in their relations with one another." [26]

(ii) Torsten Gihl.—Professor Torsten Gihl defines International Law in the following words : "The term 'International Law' means the body of rules of law which apply within the International Community or Society of States." This definition presupposes that States constitute a society and that this society has a legal system, International Law or the law of nations. This is another way of saying that International Law exists, that there is a body of rules, having the character of rules of law, which regulate the relations of States inter se[27].

(iii) Hackworth.—In the words of Hackworth : "International Law consists of a body of rules governing the relations between States. It is a system of jurisprudence which, for the most part, has evolved out of the experiences and the necessities of situations that have arisen from time to time.[28]

(iv) Queen v. Keyn.—In the Queen v. Keyn,[29] Lord Coleridge, C.J., defined International Law in the following words : "The law of nations is that collection of usages which civilized States have agreed to observe in their dealings with one another."

(v) West Rand Central Gold Mining Ltd. Co. v. King.[30]—In this case the Court observed, International Law may be defined as "the form of the rules accepted by civilized States as determining their conduct towards each other and towards each other's subjects.

(vi) S.S. Lotus case.[31]—In S.S. Lotus case, International Law was defined in the following words : "International Law governs relations between independent States. The rules of law binding upon States therefore emanate from their own free will as expressed in conventions or by usages generally accepted as expressing principles of law and established in order to regulate the relations between these co-existing independent communities or with a view to the achievement of common aims. Restriction upon the independence of States cannot therefore be presumed." [32]

(vii) Philip C. Jessup.—Jessup has defined International Law in the following words : "International Law or the Law of Nations must be defined as law applicable to States in their mutual relations with States." Judge Jessup further adds, "International Law may also......... be applicable to certain inter-relationships of individuals themselves, where such inter-relationships involve matter of international concern."[33]

---

[25] Charles G. Fenwick, International Law (Third Indian Reprint, 1971), p. 31; See also conclusion given after the definitions.

[26] The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition, Edited by Sir Humphrey Waldock (1963), p. 1.

[27] Torsten Gihl : The Legal Character and Sources of International Law (Stockholm, (1957), p. 53).

[28] Hackworth : Digest of International Law, Vol. (1940), p. 1.

[29] 2 Ex. D. 63, 153, 154 (1876).

[30] (1905) 2 K.B. 91.

[31] (1927) P.C.I.J. Series A. No. 10.

[32] Ibid, at p. 18.

[33] Philip C. Jessup : A Modern Law of Nations (1948), p. 17.

(viii) Gray.—According to Gray : "International Law or the Law of Nations is the name of a body of rules which according to the usual definitions regulate the conduct of states in their intercourse with each other."

(ix) Hall.—In the words of Hall : International Law consists of certain rules of conduct which modern civilized states regard as binding on them in their relations with one another with a force comparable in nature and degree to that binding the conscientious person to obey the laws of his country and which they also regard as being enforceable by appropriate means in case of infringement." [34]

(x) Kelsen* —According to Kelsen : "International Law or the Law of Nations is the name of a body of rules which—according to the usual definition—regulate the conduct of the States in their intercourse with one another." [35]

Criticism—The above definitions can also be criticised in the same way as Oppenheim's definition has been criticised. These definitions are not appropriate and do not properly represent international law as it exists today.

III. Soviet definition and approach to International Law

According to the Soviet definition, International Law is "the total of the norms regulating relations between States in the process of their struggle and co-operation, expressing the will of the ruling classes of these States and secured by coercion exercised by States individually and collective." [36] Another eminent Russian writer defined International Law as "the totality of norms, which were developed on the basis of agreements between the States which govern their relations in the process of struggle and co-operation between them, expressing the will of the ruling classes, and are enforced in case of necessity, by the pressure applied either collectively or by individual States." [37] After the death of Stalin the above definition was slightly modified by inclusion of a reference to "peaceful co-existence". In recent years, Soviet writers have laid a great emphasis on 'peaceful co-existence' in relation between the sovereign states. According to the Soviet view, "the principles of peaceful co-existence should be the basis of the whole structure of contemporary international law. Only if it is based on the principle of co-existence can international law best promote the cause of peace and mutual understanding between States."[38] According to another eminent Soviet writer "International law can be defined as the aggregate of rules governing relations between states in the process of their conflict and co-operation designed to safeguard their peaceful co-existence, expressing the will of the ruling classes of these states and defended in case of need by coercion applied by states individually or collectively.

This definition notes the class, character and significance of International legal relations (states), the nature of the relations between them, conflict and co-operation and the method of safeguarding and implementing the rules of International Law, i.e. their defence individually or collectively, by the states themselves............ The purpose of present day international law is to regulate relations between states and this way strengthen world peace and security .... Although International law, like any branch of law, has a class character and pertains to the superstructure, it cannot express the will of the ruling class of any particular state. It is the expression of the agreed will of a number of states in the form of an International agreement or custom which has grown up over a long period. The purpose of present day international Law is to promote peaceful co-existence and co-operation between all states regardless of their social systems." [39]

---

[34] International Law, Eighth Edition, p. 1.

* See also for Q. No. 1 of P.C.S. Exam, (1974) ; for Holland's views see matter discussed under the heading "whether International Law is the vanishing point of jurisprudence ?" discussed in this Chapter.

[35] Hans Kelsen, Principles of International Law, p 3.

 Asked in I.A.S. Exam, (1975) Q. No. 1(c) : For answer see also "Soviet Practice" discussed under the Chapter entitled "Relationship Between International Law and Municipal Law".

[36] Definition by A.Y. Vyshinsky in 1948.

[37] Adopted from Kazimierz Z. Grzybowski, Public International Law, (1970), p. 17.

[38] Hans W. Baade (Ed.), The Soviet Impact on International Law (1965), p. 15.

[39] F.I. Kozhevmikov (Ed.), International Law, pp. 7, 8, 10 and 11.

Criticism.—The Soviet definition emphasises struggle and co-operation between States will of the ruling classes, etc. But as pointed out by George Ginsburgs, "Indeed, whereas today the trend in most of the world moves more and more in the direction of a qualified recognition that international law no longer applies to states alone, but encompasses a variety of international personalities other than states as well, including, possibly, individuals, the Soviets have today adamantly opposed most aspects of such expansion of international law. Their jurists with rare exceptions continue to cling to a very conservative conception of what constitute a subject of international law." [40] The Soviet definition is not adequate because it does not mention international organisations, individuals and non-State entities as subjects of international law. It does not also include the general principles of law recognised by civilized States. In view of the breaking up of the Soviet Union and end of Communism there, Soviet definition and concept the Soviet Union and end of Communism there, Soviet definition and concept have also undergone significant changes.

IV. Chinese Definition and approach to International Law.—According to a Chinese writer : "International Law like all other branches of law, is created in a definite stage of mankind's social development. The origin of international law is directly related to the creation of the state. International law is created as the political, economic, and the relations among states emerge." [41] In his view, only the definition of international law given by Soviet scholars (for example, by Vyshinsky given earlier), explains the question of the contents and substance of international law. This definition (i.e., of Vyshinsky) is adaptable to the "international law of various historical periods including the modern one." He points out that international law possesses the following characteristics of law in general : (i) it expresses the will of the ruling class; (ii) it is the aggregate of norms adjusting definite social relations; and (iii) it is guaranteed by enforcement measures. In his view, therefore, international law is a kind of law possessing legal validity; it is not what are called self-executing norms of morality." [42]

As pointed out by Jerome Alan Cohen and Hungdah Chieu[43] : By the time the above article appeared in late 1957, the Soviet definition of international law that it recites had been supplemented by the insertion, after the words 'struggle and co-operation' of the phrase 'designed to safeguard their peaceful existence'.[44] This change followed the CPSU's promulgation in 1956 of a new policy that required scholars to recognise that the purpose of present day international law is to promote peaceful co-existence and co-operation between all states regardless of their social systems[45]......... Although the PRC (i.e., People's Republic of China) began to emphasize peaceful co-existence as early as 1954 and although Chinese writer appears to have accepted the post-1956 Soviet modification of the definition of international law to include reference to peaceful co-existence, by the 1960's the Chinese and Soviet view of this slogan and its legal implications differed substantially. For example, on October 8, 1964, Wu Te-feng, then a Vice-President of the Supreme People's Court and President of the Chinese Political Science and Law Association stated : Imperialism is the basic source of war, and American imperialism, moreover, is the most ferocious and ambitious aggressor ever to exist in the history of mankind, and it is the most flagrant violator of the principles of modern international law. Naturally, democratic legal workers in various countries should engage in the thorough exposure of, and determined struggle against it. However modern revisionists nevertheless make great efforts to propagandize the carrying out of 'peaceful co-existence' with imperialism without being subject to any principle disseminating the view that contemporary international law is the law of 'peaceful co-existence' with

---

[40] The Soviet Impact on International Law (1965), p. 67 : see also Jenks, The Common Law of Mankind, p. 1; McDougal Studies in World Order, p. 170; Philip C Jessup Transnational Law, p. 2.

[41] Ho Wu-Shuang and Ma Chun, "A Criticism of the Reactionary Viewpoint of Ch'en Ti-Ch'ing on the Science of International Law", CEYC No. 6: 35 (1957) in Peoples China and International Law, Edited by Jerome Alan Cohen and Hungdah Chieu, Vol. I, Princeton, Jersey, (1974), p. 26.

[42] Ibid at p. 27.

[43] Jerome Alan Cohen and Hungdah Chien, Supra note 40, at pp. 27-28.

[44] See P.I. Kozheznilkov Supra note 41, at p. 7.

[45] Ibid, at p. 11.

American imperialism.[46] This development was mainly due to the conflicts between China and Soviet Union and the latter was referred as modern revisionist. But in the 1970's even the Chinese developed relations with America, Britain and other so-called imperialist powers and hence once again a shift has come in the attitude of Chinese scholars.

The Chinese scholars criticize vehemently the definitions of international law given by Oppenheim and other Western writers. In the view of a Chinese writer,[47] these definitions cause us first to realise that Bourgeois international law is created for the so-called 'civilized states' and does not possess the spirit of democratic legislation in the international big family. In the view of Bourgeois writers, only 'Christian states' are 'civilized states' while non-Christian states, mainly oriental states, are 'uncivilized states'. For instance, Oppenheim said that before the First World War, China, Persia, Burma, Abyssinia, and other oriental states were still 'uncivilized states'. The criterion of the Bourgeoisie for distinguishing so-called 'civilized and uncivilized' states is neither long history nor culture. Even though China has had 5,000 years of excellent culture, she was not included in the group of 'civilized states'. The exclusion of Oriental states from the exclusive club of 'civilized states' reflects exactly the needs of the aggressive interests of the imperialistic monopolistic Bourgeoisie. He added, "......... although bourgeois international law may in certain periods and under certain conditions play a role of mutual restriction among 'civilized states' it is mainly a weapon used by 'civilized states' to control and oppress what they consider to be 'uncivilized states'. The 'uncivilized states' are their preys. The Chinese people feel very deeply here. In the past, imperialism seized the right of consular jurisdiction in China on the pretext that China was 'backward in the rule of law' and 'uncivilized'. By establishing 'spheres of influence, advocating the 'open door' and 'equal opportunity for all' and even trying to partition China, imperialism treated China as a 'backward' and 'uncivilized' State which could be oppressed." [48]

In China, International law is regarded as "a legal instrument in the service of foreign policy." [49] In the words of a Chinese author, "International law, in addition to being a body of principles and norms which must be observed by every country, is also, just as any law a political instrument : whether a country is a socialist or capitalist, it will to a certain degree utilize international law in implementing its foreign policy." [50]

As regards the subjects of international law, like Soviet Union, the Chinese also do not regard International Organisation and individuals as subjects. In their view, the Bourgeois theory concerning the subjects of law is inconsistent with the principles of modern international law.[51] But this view cannot be accepted. As pointed earlier, while criticising Oppenheim's definition that individuals have now become subjects of international law and can now, although only in a few cases, claim rights directly under international law and need not always do so through the medium of State. Similarly international organisations have also become subjects of international law. They can enter into agreements or treaties with other international organisations as well as states and other entities. They are legal persons and may make claims for the compensation of persons suffering injuries in their service.[52] China has now taken a complete U turn. It has recently joined the W.T.O.

---

[46] Reporter of Cheng-fa-yen Chiu, "China Political Science and Law Association held Fourth General Meeting" CPYC No. 4: 28 (1964).

[47] Ying T'ao "Recognise the True Face of Bourgeois International Law from a few Basic Concepts", KCWTYC No. 143-44 (1966) in Jerome Alan Cohen and Hungdah Chiu, Supra note 43 at pp. 29-30.

[48] Ibid, at pp. 30-31.

[49] Shiu Sung, Yii-Ta-hasin, Luying-hui, and Ts'ao K'o, "An Initial Investigation into the old Law view point in the Teaching of International Law" CHYYC No. 4 : 14 (1958) in Jerome Alan Cohen and Hungdah Chiu, Supra note 43 at p. 31.

[50] Chou Fulun, "On the Nature of Modern International Law—A Discussion with Comrade Liu Hsin" CHYYC No. 3 : 55 (1958). Adopted from Ibid at pp. 31-32.

[51] For Chinese Approach to International Law See also "Chinese Practice" under the chapter entitled "Relationship between International Law and Municipal Law" and 'Chinese view' under the Chapter entitled "Subjects of International Law and Place of Individual under International Law".

[52] See for example, Advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice. Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Service of the U.N., I.C.J. (1949), p. 174.

V. Charles G. Fenwick.—In the words of Fenwick :

> "International law may be defined in broad terms as the body of general principles and specific rules which are binding upon the members of the international community in their mutual relations".[53]

Appraisal.—Fenwick's definition is better than all the above-mentioned definitions because instead of the word 'states' he uses the words 'members of the international community' which include states, international institutions, individuals and non-state entities. He also uses the term 'general principles', His definition is very short but pregnant with meaning and takes into account the changes that have taken place after the Second World War. Indeed it is an appropriate and correct definition of international law.

VI. Whiteman.—Whiteman defines International Law in the following words : "International law is the standard of conduct, at a given time, for states and other entities subject thereto."

Evaluation.—This is a very brief but adequate definition. The words "other entities subject thereto" may include international organisations, individuals and non-State entities. The words used in the definition are apparently very simple but they are pregnant with meaning and very vast in their scope. Moreover, Whiteman has also emphasised the dynamic aspect of international law. She writes, "International law is, more or less, in a continual state of change and development. In certain of its aspects the evolution is gradual in others it is avulsive."

VII. J.G. Starke.—In the words of Starke[54] :

> "International Law may be defined as that body of law which is composed for its greater part of the principles and rules of conduct which States feel themselves bound to observe, and, therefore, do commonly observe in their relations with each other, and which includes also :
>
> (a) the rules of law relating to the functioning of international institutions or organisations, their relations with each other, and their relations with States and individuals ; and
>
> (b) certain rules of law relating to individuals and non-States entities so far as the rights or duties of such individuals and non-state entities are the concern of the international community."

The definition of Starke is appropriate because it takes into account the changing character of international law and truly reflects the present position of international law.

Conclusion.—On the basis of the above definitions we may conclude that International law is a body of rules and principles which regulate the conduct and relations of the members of international community. The contention that States alone are subjects of international law is not only inconsistent with the changing character of international law but has become completely obsolete and inadequate. Individualistic character of international law is being replaced by the law of social inter-dependence.[55] In re Piracy Jure Gentium,[56] Lord Chancellor Sankey aptly remarked that international law is a "living and expanding Code." In view of the changing character and expanding scope of international law today, international institutions, some non-State entities and individuals have also become the legitimate subjects of International law. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that even today, as pointed out by Starke, "it is composed for its greater part of the principles and rules of conduct which States feel themselves bound to observe, and therefore do commonly observe, in their relations with each other........."[57] "Thus International law is constantly evolving body of norms that are commonly observed by the members of international community in their relations with one another. These norms confer rights and impose obligations upon States and, to a lesser extent, upon international organisations and individuals."[58] Moreover, "International law has effects on, and is effected by, the international relations, political thought and communications, as well as by the awareness of women and men in every State that they are a part of those addressed by the United Nations' Charter as being 'We, the People of the United Nations".[59]

---

[53] International Law, (Third Indian Reprint, 1971) p. 31.

[54] Starke's International Law, Eleventh Edition, Butterworth (September, 1994), p. 3.

[55] Admission of a State to Membership in the U.N., I.C.J., Reports (1948), p. 4 at p. 67, per Judge Alvarez.

[56] (1934) A.C. 586, 589.

---

57. See Supra note 54.

58. Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 2.

59. Martin Dixon and Robert McCorqudale, International Law (First Indian Reprint, 1995) p. 1.

CHAPTER 3

NATURE AND BASIS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Before we take up different aspects of nature and basis of international law it will be desirable to discuss in detail the question whether international law is true law or not. This is necessary because the nature of international law is not the same that of national law, and a number of conceptions or even assumptions as to who is subject to the rules of international law as to the acceptance of international law (entailing rights and obligations and the enforcement of them) must be analysed before the substance of international law itself can be determined.[1] Though this question is now only of academic interest because it has been well established for once and for all times that international law is law, a discussion of this question is still important for it helps to understand the nature of international law. The observation that international law is not law was made by jurists who were trained and groomed under municipal law and jurisprudence and who sought in international law all those things which they had been seeing and were accustomed of seing in municipal law. They were under a fallacy that there could be no system of law and jurisprudence other than municipal law and jurisprudence. They failed to realize that while state law is essentially a centralized system, international law operates in a decentralizd system. The fallacious observation made by jurists such as Austin, Pufendorf, Hobbes, Holland and Jethrow Brown influenced international lawyers and writers so much so that even at present they have not been able to free themselves completely from such influence. For example, Starke has criticized Austinian concept of law and subscribes to the view that international law is law yet seems to be under some influence of the said fallacy because he goes on to remark that international law is a 'weak law'. Once it is admitted that municipal law is a centralized system while international law operates in a decentralized system, it becomes obvious that comparison of the two systems is not proper. Even if a man is so weak and thin and appears like a skeleton, he will still be called a man. When we say he is weak, we do so by comparing him with a healthy and strong person. Thus being 'weak' here is a relative concept. So is the case with international law when it is said that it is a 'weak law'. It is only by comparing it with municipal law we can say this. But it must be stressed that the comparison is not happy and proper because municipal law and international law are different for they operate under different set of circumstances. International law is as good and strong as it can be under the system and circumstances it operates. Its sanctions are as effective and potent as they can be under the decentralized systems in which they operate. As aptly remarked by Prof. Hart, international law is law because states regard it as law. Nothing need be further proved. It may be added that international law is not only law but its significance and efficacy are constantly increasing. International law deals with such matters, inter alia, such as nuclear weapons and environment upon which very survival of mankind depends.

Whether International Law is a law in the true sense of the term or not?[*]

"The new-fangled term 'international law' was invented at a time when men's minds were obsessed by theories of national sovereignty and it is not surprising therefore, that there came to be attached to it a stigma and a contempt which have never attached to the traditional 'law of nations'.[2] The controversy whether international law is a law or not revolves on the divergent definitions of the word 'law' given by the jurists. If we subscribe to the view of Hobbes, Austin and Pufendorf that law is a command of sovereign, enforced by a superior political authority, then international law cannot be included in the category of law. On the other hand, if we subscribe to the view that the term 'law' cannot be limited to the rules enacted by superior political authority, then international law can be included in the category of law. In his paper entitled, "Is there a true International Law?" Published in 1884, eminent jurist Lawrence aptly remarked, "Everything depends upon the definition of law which we choose to adopt. The controversy is really a logomachy—a dispute about words, not things." Thus, "The largest of jurisprudential controversy, namely, that as to the word 'law' is a verbal dispute and nothing else".[3] Whether or not one wishes to attribute a legal character to the norms of international law depends largely upon the definition of law he chooses to accept." [4] Thus the jurists are divided into two main groups in regard to the legal character of the norms of international Law. We will now discuss critically the views of both the groups of jurists.

---

[1] See Martin Dixon and Robert McCorqudole, International Law [Lawman (India) Pvt. Ltd., New Delhi, 1995], p. 7.

[*] See P.C.S. Exam., (1969), Q. 6(a) ; I.A.S. (1973) Q. 4 ; I.A.S. (1961) Q. 4 ; P.C.S. (1967) Q. 1 ; P.C.S. (1982) Q. 1(b) ; P.C.S. (1984) Q. 1(b) ; P.C.S. (1995) Q. 7(a).

[2] B.A. Wortley, Jurisprudence (Newyork, 1967), p. 153.

Hobbes, Pufendorf and Austin subscribe to the view that law "properly so called" is a command of the sovereign and is enforced by a superior political authority. Since law is the command of a determined superior, no law can exist where there is no supreme law-giver and no coercive enforcement agency. According to Austin, law is given by determinate superior political authority to political inferiors and is backed by a coercive enforcement agency. Thus, in the view of Austin, sanction occupies an important place in the enforcement of law. People follow law because they fear that if they do not do so, they might be compelled and even punished. According to Hobbes, man is by nature nasty, brutish and violent and fear or sanction which is inherent in law is necessary to maintain order in society. In his view, men need for their security "a common power to keep them in awe and to direct their action to the common benefit." Thus, we see that those jurists who deny the legal character of International law regard law as the command of the sovereign and having a coercive enforcement agency. In the view of these writers, the rules commonly called international law, are in fact the rules of 'positive morality'. Holland, Jeremy, Bentham and Jethro Brown, etc., are other prominent jurists who deny the legal character of international law.

In support of their view-point these jurists put forward the following arguments : (1) In municipal law, there is a determinate superior political authority which does not exists in international law. (2) As compaired to municipal law, international law lacks an effective legislative machinery. (3) International law lacks sanction which, according to the writers of this pursuasion, is an essential element of law. (4) There is no such executive power in International Law as may enforce the decisions of the International Court of Justice and ensure the observance of the provisions of the treaties. (5) International Law lacks a potent Judiciary. (6) Some writers call international law a quasi-law.[5]

The above view which denies the legal character of International law has been severely criticised by a large number of jurists. It is based on the definition of law that law is the command of the Sovereign backed by coercive enforcement agency. In other words, sanction is an essential element of law. But as pointed out by Prof. Oppenheim, "this definition is not correct. It does not cover that part of Municipal Law which is termed as unwritten or customary law. There is, in fact, no community and no State in the world which could exist with written law only".[6] Prof. H.L.A. Hart has also criticised the definition of law given by Austin. In his view, this concept "plainly approximates closer to penal statutes enacted by the Legislature of a modern State than to any other variety of law." [7] According to Prof. Oppenheim,[8] law may be correctly defined as "a body of rules for human conduct within a community which by common consent of this community shall be enforced by external power."* J.L, Brierly has also criticised Austinian concept of law. In his words : "Unless we distort the facts so as to fit them into the definition it cannot account for the existence of the English Common Law." [9] Further, "If, as Sir Frederick Pollock writes, and as probably most competent jurists would today agree, the only essential conditions for the existence of law are the existence of a political community and the recognition by its members of settled rules binding upon them in that capacity, international law seem on the whole to satisfy these conditions." [10] Thus the existence of law presupposes the existence following prerequisites : (a) a community ; (b) a body of rules ; (c) common consent of the community that (d) if necessary, for enforcement of these rules by external power. "The three requirements of this definition (i.e. Oppenheim's definition of law) are satisfied by international law, to a greater or lesser extent. The states of the world do together constitute a body bound together through common interests which create extensive intercourse between them, and differences in culture, economic structure, or political system, do not affect as such the existence of an international community as one of the basic factors of international law. Rules for conduct of the members of that community exist and have existed for hundred of years. Equally, there exists a common consent of the community of states that rules of international conduct shall be enforced by external power, although in the absence of a central authority for this purpose states have sometimes to take the law into their own hands by such means as self help and intervention ...." [11] It may be added that outlawing of resort to force by the United Nations and steps for international enforcement action have led to less reliance on self help.[12]

---

[3] Glanville, L., Williams "International Law and Controversy Concerning the word "Law", BYBIL. Vol XXII (1945) p. 146.

[4] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969) p. 2.

[5] See for example, D.J. Lathan Brown, Public International Law, (London, Sweet and Maxwell, (1970), p. 274.

[6] International Law, Vol. I, Edited by Lauterpacht (1970, Reprint), p. 7.

[7] H.L.A. Hart, The concept of Law, (Oxford, 1961), p. 24.

[8] International Law, Vol. I. Eighth Edition, p. 10.

International Law is Really Law*.—Most of the jurists now subscribe to the view that international law is really law. So far as the sanction or coercive force behind the law concerned, it may be said that it is not an essential element of law and even if sanction is regarded as an essential element of law there are sanctions in international law. The common law of England is its glaring example. To some extent, covenant of the League of Nations provided, and now the U.N. Charter provides for some sanctions. So far as the legislative, judicial or executive branches in the international system are concerned, "What matter is not whether the international system has legislative, judicial or executive branches corresponding to those we have become accustomed to seek in a domestic society ; what matter is whether international law is reflected in the policies of nations and in relations between nations." Further, 'The fact is, lawyers insist that nations have accepted important limitations on their sovereignty, that they have observed those norms and undertaking, that the result has been substantial order in international relations." [13]

J.G. Starke, who has also criticised the Austinian concept of law, subscribes to the view that international law is really law. In this connection, he has put forward four main arguments. In the first place, it has been established by modern historical jurisprudence that in many communities, a system of law existed and was being observed though such communities lacked a formal legislative authority. "Such law did not differ in its binding operation from the law of any state with a true legislative authority." [14] Secondly Austin's views might have been correct for his time but in view of present day international law, they are not true.[15] Customary rules of international law are diminishing and they are being replaced by law-making treaties and conventions. Law-making treaties are counterparts in the international system of the legislation in the municipal legal system. Thus International legislation has come into existence and it is now wrong to say that international system has no legislation at all. Thirdly, "the authoritative agencies responsible for the maintenance of International intercourse do not consider International law as merely a moral Code."[16] Lastly, the United Nations is based on the true legality of international law.[17]

---

* Asked in I.A.S. Exam. (1973), Q. No. 6(a).

[9] The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition (1963), p. 70.

[10] Ibid. at p. 71.

[11] Oppenheim's International Law, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Ninth Edition Longman Group UK Limited and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, pp. 9-10.

[12] Ibid, at p. 10.

 See also for P.C.S. (1995) Q. 7(a) ; UPPCS (2004), Q. 5.

[13] Louis Henkin, How Nations Behave (1968), p. 28.

[14] J.G. Starke, An Introduction to International Law, Eighth Edition (1977), p. 20.

[15] Ibid.

Oppenheim regards international law as law because of the following two reasons : In the first place, international law is constantly recognised as law in practice. The Government of different States feel that they are legally as well as morally bound to follow international law.[18] Secondly, while breaking international law, States never deny its legal existence. On the contrary they recognise its existence and try to interpret international law as justifying their conduct.[19] An emerging system of sanctions for the enforcement of international law, recourse to law-making treaties and certain aspects of the activities of international organisations indicating the emergence of legislative process, recognition of certain rules having the character of jus cogens etc. are some of the "indications of a growing maturity in the international legal order". Indeed,"...... international law may now properly be regarded as complete system".[20] Further, "while the frequency of the violations of International Law may strain its legal force to breaking point, the formal, though often cynical, affirmation of its binding nature is not without significance."* Frequent violations do not prove that the law does not exist. Even Municipal or State law is frequently violated. But as pointed out by Oppenheim, violations of International Law are certainly frequent, especially during war. But the offenders always try to prove that their acts do not constitute a violation, and that they have a right to act as they do according to the law or at least that no rule of the Law of Nations is against their acts. It is true that frequency of violation of International Law may strain its legal force to breaking point. For example, during the Second World War rules of International Law were frequently and flagrantly violated. For some time at least, it appeared as if no law existed. But thanks to the inner vitality of the Law of Nations, within a few years, faith in the law was again revived and States again reaffirmed their faith in the rule of law. They demonstrated this by establishing the United Nations which is based upon the true legality of International Law.

Even when States violate rules of International Law, they do not deny the existence of law but try to justify their conduct and affirm the binding nature of the rules of International Law. This affirmation is significant for it lends to the strength of the law and the legal system. As pointed out by Edward Collins[21] : "International Law is created and is deemed to be legally binding by authoritative national and international decision makers because they understand that generally agreed upon rules and principles of action serve the indispensable function of providing a basis for the orderly management of international relations." Brierly has also aptly remarked : "It is both practically inconvenient and also contrary to the best juristic thought to deny its (international law) legal character."[22] Prof. H.L.A. Hart has also written : "It is clear that in the practice of States certain rules are regularly respected even at the cost of certain sacrifices ; claims are formulated by reference to them, breaches of the rules expose the offender to serious criticism and are held to justify claims for compensation and relation. These, surely, are all elements required to support the element that there exist among States rules imposing obligations upon them."[23]

---

[16] J.G. Starke, An Introduction to International Law, Eighth Edition (1977), p. 20.

[17] Ibid at p. 21.

[18] International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, pp. 14-15.

[19] Ibid at p. 15.

[20] Oppenheim's International Law, note 11, at pp. 11-12.

* See Q. No. 4 of I.A.S. Exam, (1961) ; C.S.E. (1979) Q. 7(a).

[21] See Glanville L. Williams "International Law and Controversy Concerning the word "Law" (1945) p. 29.

[22] The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition (1963), p. 69.

[23] The Concept of Law (Oxford, 1961), p. 226.

The arguments of the jurists who regard International Law as really law, may be summed up as follows :

(1) The term law cannot be limited to rules of conduct enacted by a sovereign authority. Sir Henry Maine, one of chief exponents of historical school of jurisprudence, carried on research on historical jurisprudence and firmly established that in primitive society there was no sovereign political authority yet there were laws.

(2) The Austinian concept of law fails to account for the customary rules of International Law. If we accept the Austinian definition of law common law of England will lose its legal validity.

(3) Customary rules of International Law are diminishing and are being replaced by law-making treaties and conventions. To day, the bulk of International Law comprises of rules laid down by various law-making treaties, such as, Geneva and Hague Conventions. The rules laid down by these treaties are binding although they do not emanate from a sovereign political authority.

(4) When international questions arise, States do not rely upon moral arguments but rely upon treaties, precedents and opinions of specialists.

(5) States do not deny the existence of International Law. On the contrary, they intepret International Law so to justify their conduct.

(6) In some State (e.g. U.S.A. and U.K.), international law is treated as part of their own law. A leading case on the point is the Paquete v. Habanna,[24] wherein Justice Gray observed : "International law is a part of our law, and must be ascertained and administered by courts of justice of appropriate jurisdiction, as often as questions of right depending upon it are duly presented for their determination."

(7) As per Statute of the International Court of Justice, the International Court of Justice has to decide disputes as are submitted to it in accordance with international law.

(8) International conferences and conventions also treat international law as law in its true sense.

(9) The United Nations is based on the true legality of international law.

(10) So far as sanction in law is concerned, international law does not completely lack it.

(11) It is true that international law is frequently violated but it does not mean that international law is not law. Even State or municipal law is violated. Frequent violations of law indicate the weakness of enforcement machinery and have nothing to do with the legality of the rules. Legality of rules and enforcement of rules of law are two different things.

(12) The decisions of the International Court of Justice are binding upon the parties to a dispute and only in respect of that dispute. The powers and jurisdiction of International Court of Justice are not equivalent to the Municipal Court but under certain conditions, its decision can be enforced. Article 94 of the U.N. Charter provides that each member of the U.N. undertakes to comply with the decision of the International Court of Justice. It further provides that if any party to a case fails to perform the obligations incumbent upon it under a judgment rendered by the Court, the other party may have recourse to the Security Council, which may, if it deems necessary, make recommendations or decide upon measures to be taken to give effect to the judgment.

On the basis of above arguments, it may be concluded that International law is really law. However, it has to be admitted that international law is not equivalent to municipal law. "It is obvious that international law, unlike municipal law, operates in a decentralised political system. There is no world legislature, no international policies, and no International Court with compulsory jurisdiction."[25] Starke has expressed the view that international law is a "weak law." He writes : "This cumulative evidence against the position taken by Austin and his followers should not blind us to the fact that necessarily international law is weak law. Existing international legislative machinery, operating mainly through law-making conventions, is not comparable in efficiency to State legislative machinery."[26] But despite the weaknesses of the international legal system, the legal character of international law cannot be denied. Moreover, this weakness becomes manifest when we compare international law with Municipal Law. But this comparison is not happy and appropriate. International Law operates in a decentralized system whereas Municipal Law operates in a centralized system. International law must be judged in the context of system in which it operates. As aptly remarked by Judge Philip L. Jessup :[27] "Impotent to restrain a great nation which has no decent respect for the opinion of mankind, falling in its severest test of serving as a substitute for war, international law plods on its way, followed automatically in routine affairs, invoked, flouted, codified, flouted again but yet again invoked........... But can one say that the international law with which they deal has no reality"?[*] Indeed no one can deny the legal character of international law. As compared to municipal law it is definitely weak ; nevertheless it is law. As a matter of fact, as pointed out by J.L. Brierly, International Law is neither a myth on the one hand nor a penacea on the other, but just one institution among others which we can use for the building of a better international order."[28] As aptly remarked by Prof. Louis Henkin.[29] "Fortunately, international law exists and it works—not perfectly or always but well enough and often enough to make a considerable difference in the conduct of international law affairs. Although there is no one to determine and adjudge the law, there is wide agreement on the content and meaning of law and agreements, even in a divided world burgeoning with new nations." Moreover, as pointed out in the Ninth Edition of Oppenheim's International Law,[30] "Furthermore, international law may now properly be regarded as a complete system. By this is meant not that there is always a clear and specific legal rule readily applicable to every international situation, but that every international situation is capable of being determined as a matter of law, either by the application of specific legal rules where they already exist, or by the application of legal rules derived by the use of known legal techniques, from other legal rules or principles.[]

---

[24] (1900) 175 U.S. 677 at p. 700.

Last but not the least, most of the controversy about the legal character of International Law is due to the tendency of the jurists to compare it with Municipal Law. As indicated above, the comparison is not happy. Unlike Municipal Law, International Law operates in a purely decentralized system. Due to this peculiar reason, International Law is bound to be distinct from Municipal Law. International Law must be understood and appreciated in the peculiar system in which it operates. It is as good and effective as it can be under the circumstances and peculiar system under which it operates.

International Law and Municipal Law[]

It has been pointed out, "Although International Law is readily distinguishable in many respects from domestic law it is nonetheless a system of law possessing certain characteristcs peculiar to itself as well as certain others common to Municipal Law." It cannot be denied that the International legislative machinery operating mainly through law-making conventions is weak as compared to the legislative machinery of States because States enter into treaties and conventions on the basis of equality. Sovereign equality of States is the well-recognised and established principle. There is no power over and above the States. The International Executive and Judiciary are also weaker than their counterparts in the State system.

---

[25] Edward Collins International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 3.

[26] J.G. Starke, An Introduction to International Law, Eighth Edition (1977), p. 22.

[27] See "The Reality of Internaitonal Law", Foreign Affairs, Vol. 18 (Jan. 1940), p. 214.

[*] Asked in I.A.S. Exam. (1978), Q. No. 1. : For the answer of this question see matter discussed under the heading "whether International Law is a law in the true sense of the term or not"?

[28] Preface to The Law of Nations, Fifth Edition (1955).

[29] Louis Henkin, "Does Internaitonal Law Work?" The American Review, Vol. XV, (July 1971), p. 63.

[30] Oppenheim's International Law, Note 11 at pp. 12-13.

[] See Q. No. 1 of P.C.S. Exam, (1967) ; for further elaboration of the answer see also matter discussed under the heading "International Law is Really Law".

[] See also for CSE (1993) Q. 5(b).

There are however, certain similarities between the two. Like State Judiciary, in the international legal system also there is a court, International Court of Justice and under Article 59 of Statute of the Court its decisions are binding upon the parties to a dispute and in respect of that dispute. More than 47 States have conferred compulsory jurisdiction upon the court. Similarly, Security Council may be said to be the Executive of the International legal system. Under Article 94 of the Charter of the U.N., if a party to the dispute before the International Court of Justice fails to implement the decision of the Court the other party may bring the matter before the Security Council and the Council may make recommendations or decide the measures to be taken to implement the decision. However, it may be noted that apart from this, Security Council's main function is to maintain or restore international peace and security. Unlike State law, it does not possess powers to enforce law (i.e., international law) as such and this is probably the greatest weakness of international law. Thus international law possesses characteristics peculiar to itself as well as certain others common to municipal law. In the words of Palmer and Perkins, "International Law is largely but not altogether concerned with relations between States, whereas municipal law controls relation between individuals and the State. The two kinds of laws are similar in their resources—chiefly custom and express agreement—with, however, substantial differences in legislative machinery. They differ altogether in their judicial processes. Both are applied by national courts, which results in complete decentralization of the judicial function in international law and effective centralization in Municipal law. What is true of the judicial function is also true of the executive function. As in tort, in domestic law, traditional international law always depended for its enforcement upon the initiative of the injured party. Most municipal laws, on the other hand, are enforced by a responsible executive unknown to international law."

Theory and Reality in International Law*

In the international legal system there is a great difference between theory and reality. That is why, Emmanuel Kant has criticized International Law by remarking : ".....this pompous law of nations which is so eloquent in books and silent in the cabinets of diplomats ? There are those who assert that international law, in order to be worth, its salt must be based solely upon logic and principle. But international law, notwithstanding the reasoned theses of the commentators, consists, in the last analysis, of those principles upon which soverign nations can agree. Such agreement is seldom, if ever, reached without regard to the political process.[31] "Usually the international law aspects of international relations are co-mingled with political strategic, economic, geographical, social, and other elements and in consequence it may be difficult to determine the exact part played by international law. Account must be taken of these non-legal factors in analysing internaitonal incidents whch have taken place or in predicting what States will do in a given situation." [32]

One of the main reasons for the difference between theory and reality in International Law is the concept of sovereignty. Each State is sovereign and equal in the eye of law. There is no power over and above the State. Whenever the national interests of a State are affected, it resorts to the concept of sovereignty and hence its decision or action is based more on its own interests than on the rules of international law and it claims that even international law allows it to exercise its own discretion in such matter. For example, international law recognises the essentials of statehood of a State. It also recognises that certain legal consequences ensue when a State is recognised. But it depends upon the sweet will or discretion of a State whether to recognise or withhold recognition of a politically organised community which has emerged as a State. It is the recognising State itself which decides (so far as the relations between the recognising and the recognised States are concerned) as to whether a politically organised community has in fact attained statehood and this appraisal cannot be questioned. And obviously, in many cases, decisions of the recognising State are motivated by political considerations.

---

* See Q. No. 1(b), of I.A.S. Exam, (1975) ; and Q. No. 1(a) of I.A.S. (1975).

 Asked in I.A.S. Exam, (1963), Q. No. 1.

[31] "International Law and the Political Process", 38 United States Department of State Bulletin 832 (1958).

[32] "The International Law Focus in International Politics" in William W. Bishop, Jr., International Law ; Cases and Materials, Second Edition (Boston : Little, Brown and Company, 1962), p. 6.

At present it is generally recognized that the sovereignty of a State is neither indivisible nor unlimited. States have now agreed to the curtailment of part of their sovereignty in the interest of international community. This is true but in practice whenever the interest of a state is adversely affected it invokes the concept of sovereignty. Thus sovereign equality is one of the keystones of international legal system. Even the United Nations Charter provides that organisation is based on the principle of sovereign equality of all its members.[33]

Yet another example of the difference in theory and reality in International Law is the rules developed in connection with the relationship of International Law and Municipal Law. In principle most of the States recognise that customary rules of international law are part of their own domestic law but they have made this principle subject to so many exceptions that in practice whenever there is any conflict between a rule of International Law and a rule of domestic law, it is the latter which prevails over the former.[34] Relationship of law and power in international relations cannot be ignored and hence International Law, a normative order, should conform to the twin tests of meeting social needs and reflect true state of international practice among States." [35]

Distinction between Public International Law and Private International Law.*

The definition of Public International Law (or commonly known as International Law) has been discussed in detail earlier. At one time, International Law was defined as the body of rules which regulates relations among the states. One of the main distinctions then between Public and Private International Law was therefore said to be that while the former regulated relations among States, the latter regulated the relations of individuals. But in view of the expansion of the subjects of international law, old definition of Public International Law has become obsolete and inadequate. Public international law now regulates the relations among the members of International community which include individuals also.

According to Pit Cobbet, "Private International Law is the body of rules for determining questions as to selection of appropriate law, in Civil cases which present themselves for decision before the courts of one State or country, but which involve a foreign element, i.e., which affect foreign persons or foreign things or transactions that had been entered into wholly or partly in a foreign country, or with reference to some foreign system of law." Thus Private International Law is that branch of International Law which decides law applicable in the issue in disputes involving more than one nations and determines the court which will have jurisdiction to decide the issue. It is more popularly termed as 'conflict of Laws'.

Main points of difference between the Public and Private International Law are following :—

(i) Public International Law, for its major part, deals with States and to a lesser extent deals with the individuals, Private International Law deals with the individuals.

---

[33] This is provided in the principle of Article 2 which shows the importance of this principle in the international legal system.

[34] For further elaboration see Practices of States under the Chapter "Relationship between International Law and Municipal Law".

[35] See Charles De Visscher, Theory and Reality in Public Internaitonal Law (1968), p. 137.

* Asked in P.C.S. Exam. (1947), Q. No. 2(a).

(ii) Private International Law is a part of Municipal Law but so is not always the case with Public International Law. Only customary rules of International Law are considered to be part of the domestic law of a state.

(iii) Public International Law (at least rules having general application) is same for all the States whereas Private International Law may be different in different States.

(iv) Private International Law determines as to which Law will apply in a case having a foreign element. There is no such problem in the field of Public International Law. Public International Law is confronted with different type of problems whenever there is conflict between it and the internal law of a state. The problem arises as to which will prevail.

(v) Private International Law also determines the court which will have jurisdiction to decide the issue in question. In this respect also it differs from Public International Law.

(vi) According to Robert Phillimore, rights arising out of Public International Law are absolute and their breach constitutes a causes belli (i.e., whatever involves or justifies war). This view does not seem to be correct in the presence of the provisions of Kellog-Briand Pact and the U.N. Charter which have outlawed war. But Private International Law does not at all confer absolute rights.

(vii) International Law comprises mainly of the rules recognised by States in their relation with each other and mostly arises out of International customs and treaties. On the other hand, rules of Private International Law are framed by the legislature of a State and recognised and developed by State Courts.

In some exceptional cases rules of Private International Law may become rules of Public International Law when they are incoporated in the international treaties.[36] In such a case, if a state party fails to observe the rules of private international law, proceedings may be started against it for breach of an International obligation owed to another party. Even in those cases where rules of private international law cannot themselves be considered as rules of public international law their application by State as part of its internal law may directly involve the rights and obligations of the State under public international law, for example, matter concerning the property of aliens or the extent of the jurisdiction of a State.[37] According to Palmer and Perkins[38] as distinguished from Public International Law, 'Private International Law' "is a branch of the law which deals entirely with the relations of persons living under different legal systems. Occasions for the application of Private International Law arise when justice requires that law of some outside jurisdiction—not necessarily a foreign State—be applied in a particular case. For example, to cite a famous English situation, when couples left England to be married in Scotland where the marriage laws were less stringent, and question arose whether the validity of the marriage should be determined by English Law or by Scottish law. The English Courts held that the laws of Scotland should apply. Frequently the nationality of a person is the issue." [39]

Is International Law a mere Positive morality ?*

In order to know whether international law is a mere positive morality, it is necessary first to know what is a rule of morality and then, what is the difference between a rule of morality and a rule of law. As pointed out by Prof. Oppenheim : "A rule is a rule of morality if by common consent of the community it applies to conscience and to consience only : whereas, on the other hand, a rule is a rule of law, if by common consent of the community it will eventually be enforced by external power." [40] Thus a rule of morality is a rule which applies to conscience only and cannot be enforced by external power. A rule of law, on the other hand can be enforced by external power. There is now general agreement about the binding nature of international law whereas a rule of morality is not binding. International morality or ethics has been defined "as standards of 'right behaviour' that are based on personal judgments." Further : "Although attitudes about morality when widely shared, influence the development of international law, there is no recognised legal obligation to obey the norms of morality until they are accepted by authoritative decision-makers as international law." [41] Frederick Pollock has rightly observed : "If International Law were only a kind of morality, the framers of State papers concerning foreign policy would throw all their weight on moral arguments. But, as a matter of fact, this is not what they do. They appeal not to the general feeling of moral rightness, but to precedents, to treaties and to opinion of specialists."* According to Prof. H.L.A. Hart,[42] there are a number of different reasons for resisting the classificaiton of rules of international law as 'morality'. He points out the following reasons :

---

[36] See Schwarzenbergar : A Manual of International Law, 2nd Edn., p. 2.

[37] Oppenheim's International Law, note 11, at p. 7.

[38] Norman D. Palmer and Howard E. Perkins' International Relations—The World Community in Transition, Third Indian Edition (1970), p. 270.

[39] As stated by Prof. Edwin D. Dickinson, "there is a host of problems concerning the adjudication and regulation of matters of private right and duty which arise uniquely from the continuing movement of persons or things from one nation to another and form the increasing case with which relationships of agreement, family, property, enterprise, or the like may be consummated across national frontiers", Law and Peace (Philadelphia : University of Pennsylvania Press, 1951), p. 59 ; Adopted from Ibid.

* P.C.S. (1984) Q. 1(B) ; p.c.s. (1991) Q. 6 (B) ; UPPCS (2001) Q. 5(a) ; IAS (2006) Q. 5(a).

(1) "The first is that States often reproach each other for immoral conduct or praise themselves or others for living upto the standard of international morality. No doubt one of the virtues which States may show or fail to show is that of abiding by international law, but that does not mean that law is morality. In fact the appraisal of States conduct in terms of morality is recognizable different from the formulation of claims, demands, and the acknowledgement of rights and obligations under the rules of international law".

(2) "Claims under international law are not couched in such terms, though of course, as in municipal law, they may be joined with a moral appeal. What predominates in the arguments, often technical, which States address to each other over disputed matters of international law, are references to precedents, treaties and juristic writings, often no mention is made of mutual right or wrong good or bad." [43]

(3) "The rules of international law, like those of municipal law are often morally quite indifferent. A rule may exist because it is convenient or necessary to have some clear fixed rule about the subject with which it is concerned, but not because any moral importance is attached to the particular rules."

(4) "It is clear that in the practice of States certain rules are regularly respected even at the cost of certain sacrifices ; claims are formulated by reference to them ; breaches of the rules expose the offender to serious criticism and are held to justify claims for compensation or retaliation. These, surely, are all the elements required to support the statement there exist among States rules imposing obligations upon them." [44]

As pointed out earlier, a distinction is made between moral and legal principles and while the former apply to conscience only, the latter create obligations. For example, the International Court of Justice in South-West Africa Cases (Second Phase)[45] made it clear that the court "can take account of moral principles only in so far as these are given in a sufficient expression in legal form." But even the World Court cannot always ignore the role of morality and the court has time and again accepted the relationship between morality and international law. For example in the North Sea Continental Shelf Cases[46] the court observed : "whatever the legal reasonings of a court of justice, its decisions must by definition be just and therefore in that sense equitable. Nevertheless, when mention is made of a court dispensing justice or declaring the law, what is meant is that the decision finds its objective justification in considerations lying not outside but within rules, and in this field it is precisely a rule of law that calls for the application of equitable principles."

---

[40] International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 8.

[41] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 3.

* Asked in I.A.S. Exam, (1966), Q. NO. 1.

[42] The Concept of Law (Oxford, 1971), pp. 222-226.

[43] Ibid, at p. 223.

[44] Ibid. at p. 226 ; see also Frederick Pollock, Oxford Lectures (1890), p. 18.

[45] I.C.J. Reports (1966) p. 34.

[46] I.C.J. Reports (1966), p. 49.

Whether International Law is the vanishing point of jurisprudence ?*—Holland has remarked that International Law is the vanishing point of jurisprudence. In his view, rules of international law are followed by courtesy and hence they should not be kept in the category of law. According to him, rules of international law cannot be kept into the category of law because they lack sanction which is an essential element of municipal law. Austin also subscribes to this view, Justice V.R. Krishna Iyer, formerly member, Indian Law Commission has also remarked, "It is a sad truism that International law is still the vanishing point of jurisprudence." [47] This view is not correct. It is now generally agreed that Holland's view that international law is the vanishing point of jurisprudence is not correct. A majority of international lawyers not subscribe to this view. Holland's view is based on the proposition that there are no sanctions behind international law. Although it cannot be conceded that the sanctions behind international law are much weaker than their counterparts in the municipal law, yet it cannot be successfully contended that there are no sanctions at all behind international law. For example, if there is a threat to international peace and security, under Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter the Security Council can take necessary action to maintain or restore international peace and security. Besides this, the decisions of the International Court of Justice are final and binding upon the parties to a dispute.[48] A number of other sanctions exist under different international organisations such as ILO, ICAO, WHO, UPU. As pointed out in Ninth Edition of Oppenheim's International Law,[49] "An emerging system of sanctions for the enforcement of International law is discernible.........[50]. There are also certain other indications of a growing maturity in international order." Further, "there is similarly increasing acceptance that the rules of international law are the foundation upon which the rights of States rest, and no longer merely limitation upon the rights of states rest, and no longer merely limitation upon states' rights which, in the absence of a rule of law to the contrary, are unlimited."

ICAO, WHO, UPU. etc. have similar sanction and have their own ways and means to enforce law and ensure its observance. Last but not the least, public opinion is the ultimate sanction behind international law and for that matter any law.

Thus it is wrong to say that there are no sanctions at all in international law. As remarked by R.W.M. Dias, "The principal reasons why State obey international law appear to be fear and self-interest. Fear operates through war, reprisals, restoration, pacific blockade and naval military demonstration."[51] It cannot, however, be denied that the greatest shortcoming of international law is the absence of effective machinery to carry out sanctions. It may be noted,".......just because the simple truism which hold good for individuals do not hold for States, and the factual background to international law is so different from that of municipal law, there is neither a similar necessity for sanctions (desirable though it may be that international law should be supported by them) nor a similar prospect of their safe and efficacious use that no simple deductions can be made from the necessity of organized sanctions to municipal law in its setting of physical and psychological facts, to the conclusion that without them international law, in its very different setting imposes 'no obligations' is not binding, and so not worth the title of 'law'.[52]

Holland regards international law as the vanishing point of jurisprudence because in his view, there is no Judge or arbiter to decide International disputes and that the rules of international law are followed by States by courtesy. This view is far from truth in view of the developed and changed character of international law today. It is incorrect to say that international legal system is without a Court to decide international disputes. The establishment of the Permanent Court of International Justice under the League of Nations, has rightly been reckoned as a landmark for the development of international law because through it international legal system was provided with a judicial organ to resolve international disputes through judicial decision. The greatest proof of its utility and importance is the fact that its successor, the International Court of Justice, established under the U.N. Charter is based on the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice.

---

* Asked in P.C.S. Exam, (1972), Q. No. 1 ; for suggestions for strengthening International Law see "Suggestions for Improving International Law" discussed in this very chapter, see also for P.C.S. (1990) Q. 6(a) ; IAS (2001) Q. 5(a) ; IAS (2007) Q. 5(a).

[47] "Mass Expulsion As Violation of Human Rights", I.J.I.L. Vol. 13 (1973) p. 169.

[48] Article 59 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice.

[49] Brierly, Note 10 at pp. 11-12.

[50] Ibid., at p. 72.

[51] R.W.M. Dias, Jurisprudence (1970), p. 404.

[52] H.L.A. Hart, The Concept of Law (Oxford, 1971), at pp. 214-15.

It is true that the decisions of the International Court of Justice are not equivalent to the Municipal Courts. Nevertheless, the decisions of the International Court of Justice possess binding force and can be enforced under certain circumstances. They are binding upon the parties to dispute and only in respect of that disputes. The provision to this effect is contained in Article 59 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice. Besides this Articles 94 of the United Nations Charter provides that each member of the U.N. undertakes to comply with tne decision of the International Court of Justice in any case to which it is a party. Article 94 further provides that if any party to a case fails to perform the obligations incumbent upon it under judgment rendered by the Court, the other party may have recourse to the Security Council, which may, if it deems necessary, make recommendations or decide upon measures to be taken to give effect to the judgment.

Thus we see that the international legal system is not only provided with a judicial organ to resolve international disputes but its decisions are binding and can be enforced under the conditions and circumstances as stated above. So far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned, Article 36 (2) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice provides that the State may confer compulsory jurisdiction upon the court in all legal disputes concerning (a) the interpretation of a treaty ; (b) any question of International Law ; (c) existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of an international obligation ; and (d) the nature or extent of the reparation to be made for the breach of an international obligation. A number of States (47) have conferred compulsory jurisdiction upon the Court. Thus the Court exercises compulsory jurisdiction on a large number of international disputes. Moreover leaving apart a few exceptions, decisions of the Court have been respected and implemented.

As noted above, under Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter, the Security Council possesses wide powers to declare sanctions against the States who are guilty of violation of the provisions of the U.N. Charter relating to international peace and security. U.N. action in the Gulf War (1991) is a glaring example of the fact that International Law possesses not only sanctions but that they can also be effective. By annexing Kuwait, Iraq had openly violated International law. The Security Council of the U.N. passed a resolution asking Iraq to vacate and free Kuwait. On Iraq's failure to implement the said resolution, Security Council passed political and economic sanctions against Iraq. When even these sanctions failed, Security Council permitted America and its allied nations to use force for the implementation of resolutions of Security Council. Thus America and its allied nations forced Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait. Earlier, the United Nations had taken enforcement action under Chapter VII of the Charter in several cases such as in 1948 against North Korea and in 1961 in Congo. Reference may also be made to United Nations sanctions against Libya in Lockerbie case, i.e. bombing of Pan American (Flight) airliner in 1988 over Lockerbie (Scotland) killing 270 persons.

Besides United Nations, there are sanctions in other intergovernmental organisations such as International Labour Organisation (ILU), World Health Organisation (WHO), International-Tele-Communication Union (ITU), International Civil Aviation Organisation (ICAO), International Monetary Fund (IMF), World Trade Organisation (WTO) etc. For example, in case of a dispute relating to the obstruction in International Civil Aviation Organisation (ICAO), the decision of the Council of ICAO is binding. Similarly, International Labour Organisation (ILO) has a special mechanism by which it functions to evaluate and promote compliance and standards. This mechanism consists of the following : (i) Through the ILO's regularly reporting structure; (ii) Through special mechanism established to protect freedom of association; (iii) Commissions of enquiry; and (iv) Representatives under which procedure a committee is appointed by the Governing Body which then reviews the Committee's report. It need not be over-emphasized that unlike state or municipal law, public international law operates in a decentralised system, its sanctions are therefore distinct and different from that of municipal law.

Thus International Law is in fact a body of rules and principles which are considered to be binding by the members of international community in their intercourse with other. If a State violates rules of International Law, it can be enforced by an external power. In innumerable treaties States have not only accepted it to be binding but also confirm the fact that it is a law between themselves. They also accept international law by asking their officers, courts and nationals to act in accordance with obligations imposed by international law. The legal character of international law has also been recognized in the 1970. Declaration on the Principles of International law Concerning Friendly Relation and Cooperation among States. The Seventh Principle of this Declaration says, it is the duty of every state to fulfil in good faith its obligations under the generally recognized principles and rules of international law.[53] So is the case with the Declaration on the Enhancement of the Effectiveness of the Principle of Refraining from the Threat or Use of Force in International Relations adopted by the General Assembly of the U.N. on 18 November, 1987.

On the basis of above discussion it may be concluded that International Law is, in fact, law and it is wrong to say that it is the vanishing point of jurisprudence.[54]

Does International Law comprise of the Rules of International Comity ?

The International comity consists of "practices that are observed between States as a matter of courtesy or convenience". For example, Canada and America permit each other's nationals to enter their territory without passports, but they do not extend this privilege to other States. Their treatment regarding each other's diplomatic agents, on the other hand, is governed by the rules of International law. So is the case with India and Nepal. The rules of international comity are observed by State as a matter of courtesy or convenience whereas the rules of international law are observed by States because they are binding upon them. Edward Collins has aptly remarked : "the binding nature of International Law also distinguishes it from international comity, which consists of practices that are observed between States as a matter of courtesy or convenience."

Weaknesses of International Law

International Law is said to be a "weak law". The weaknesses of international law become evident when we compare it with Municipal law. Following are some of the weaknesses of international law :—

(1) The greatest shortcoming of international law is that it lacks an effective executive authority to enforce its rules.

(2) It lacks an effective legislative machinery.

(3) The International Court of Justice lacks compulsory jurisdiction in the true sense of the term.

(4) Due to lack of effective sanctions, rules of international law are frequently violated.

(5) The enforcement machinery of international law is very weak.

(6) A great limitation of International law is that it cannot intervene in the matters which are within the domestic jurisdiction of States.

(7) As compared to rules of State law, the rules of International Law suffer from greater uncertainty.

(8) International Law has, in many cases, failed to maintain order and peace in the world.

---

[53] See Oppenheim's International Law, note 11, at pp. 13-14.

[54] See also reasons for "International Law being really law" discussed earlier.

Despite the above mentioned weaknesses, it has to be noted, that international law is constantly developing and its scope is expanding. It is a dynamic concept for it always endeavours to adopt itself to the needs of the day.[55] Its survival and efficiency are due to its changing and adaptable character. As compared to Municipal Law, International Law works in a decentralised system. All States consider themselves independent and sovereign. It is really creditable that the rules of international law are considered binding upon the States because either through treaties or otherwise States have consented to surrender a part of their sovereignties. This is due to the facts of international politics, inter-dependence of States and the continuous growth of the concept of international or world community.

Suggestions for improving International Law*

(1) The International Court of Justice should be given compulsory jurisdiction, in the true sense of the term, over all international disputes.

(2) An International Criminal Court should be established to adjudicate cases relating to international crimes.

(3) International law should be properly codified.

(4) The machinery to enforce the decisions of the International Court of Justice should be strengthened.

(5) An international Police system should be established to check international crimes and to enforce the rules and principles of International law.

(6) An International Bureau of investigation and Prosecution should be established for investigation of matters relating to international crimes and the prosecution of international criminals.

(7) In order to make International Law changeable and adaptable in accordance with the changing times and circumstances, powers and the scope of the activities of the International Law Commission should be expanded.

(8) The United Nations Charter should be amended so as to authorise the U.N. to intervene in such matters within the domestic jurisdiction of the States as are of international concern or affect international community.

(9) Such activities of the U.N. should be encouraged as may develop the feelings of international brotherhood so as to ensure the encouragement of the development of International Community in the true sense of the term.

(10) Today international law regulates the conduct and relations of not only States but also international organisations and individuals. But there is a need to give impetus to the development of international law in these fields.

(11) The doctrine of judicial precedents should be applied in the field of international law. This will help to strengthen the international law.

(12) In order to strengthen the legislative machinery of international law, more law-making treaties and conventions should be made and there should be provision for their revision from time to time.

(13) The legislative activities of the General Assembly should be further encouraged.

(14) The legislative activities of International Organisations (apart from the U.N.) such as ILO, WHO, ICAO, ITO, UPU, etc. should be highlighted and emulated.

(15) Last but not the least, there must be basic recognition of the interest which the whole international society has in the observance of its laws. Breaches of the law must no longer be considered the concern of only the State directly and primarily affected."* In view of the growing interdependence of States upon each other, the international community in the real sense of the term has now emerged. In order to strengthen international law, it should be clearly recognised by all States that the observance of the rules of international law is in their own interest and hence they should ensure that there are no breaches of the rules of international law. In case there are any breaches of international law, the international community as a whole must be concerned with it. For example, if genocide is committed in any State or there are violations of human rights, it should not only be the concern of the State directly and primarily affected but it should be the concern of international community as a whole. It cannot be denied, that the concepts of Sovereignty and Domestic jurisdiction are the formidable obstacles in this basic recognition. For example, whenever when the U.S. raised the matter of alleged violation of human rights in Soviet Union (i.e., its treatment of dissidents) the latter took the plea of the principle of non-interference in internal matters. Nevertheless, it may be noted that it is now generally agreed that the 'concept of absolute sovereignty' has become outdated for once a State signs an international treaty and by ratifying it agrees to abide by it, it is deemed to surrender part of its sovereignty to that extent at least. The contents of the term 'domestic jurisdiction' are also variable. Any matter which is regulated by international law cannot be said to be matter within the domestic jurisdiction of a State. With the constant expansion of international law and covering of more and more fields day by day, the domestic jurisdiction of State is lessening. For example in view of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, International Covenant on Human Rights, etc., violations of human rights no more treated within the 'domestic jurisdiction' of a State. Thus slowly and gradually the international community is moving towards the goal of the basic recognition that breaches of international law are the concern of the international society as a whole. This is manifest from international concern of apartheid and other forms of racial discrimination, violation of human rights, etc. So is the case of co-operation and solidarity shown by the International community with Kuwait which led to the vacation of Iraqi aggression from Kuwait's soil. Reference may also be made to U.N. action in Somalia and Bosnia.

---

[55] See also Josef L. Kunz, "The Changing Law of Nations", A.J.I.L. Vol. 51 (1957), p. 77.

* See Q. No. 1 of P.C.S. Exam, (1972).

The above suggestions will make international law, to some extent, equivalent to a Municipal Law. At present, several of these suggestions may appear to be impracticable or even utopian but the growth of the feeling of internationalism and the development of international community may make some of them practicable. With the growth of internationalism and the feeling of universal brotherhood, international law will also become effective and powerful.

Sanctions in International Law

There is great controversy among the jurists in regard to the sanctions in international law. It has already been pointed out earlier that there are two extreme view-points in this regard. According to one view point, there are no sanctions at all behind the international law. In accordance with the second view point even if it is admitted that there are no sanctions behind the international law it can be included in the category of law because sanction is not an essential element of law. In between these two extreme views, some authors hold the view, and rightly too, that it is wrong to say that 'International law is without sanctions.'

---

* See for Q. No. 10 of I.A.S. Exam, (1983), See also criticism of Oppenheim's definition and Chapter entitled "Subjects of International Law and Place of Individual in International Law".

 See for I.A.S. Exam, (1975) Q. No. 8 (d) ; Q. No. 1(a) of I.A.S. (1974) and Q. No. 7 of I.A.S. (1964)—for observation of Gerald Fitzmaurice, See matter discussed under the heading "Self-Defence and Self-Preservation under the Chapter entitled "Intervention" ; UPPCS (2004) Q. 5 ; IAS (2009) Q. 8(a).

As aptly remarked by Josef L. Kunz, "Legal sanctions constitute the reaction of the legal community against a delict. In contrast to disapproval by the members of a community as a moral sanction, legal sanction are socially organized measures in contrast to the transcendental sanctions or religious norms, they are to be applied against or without the will of person against whom they are directed ; they are finally, to be applied by physical force, if necessary." [56]

In the view of Kelsen, the distinguishing feature of law is that it is a 'coercive order' ; the rules of law be connected with a sanction. From the view point even of the legal system, force must be either a sanction or delinquency. In the international field, sanctions exist in the form of war and reprisal. The difference between the municipal law of States and international law would consist in the degree of centralization as regards the use of force ; within the State, force is monopolized by the community, but in the society of State a legitimate use of force may be made by the subjects of law, the individual States.[57] As a matter of fact, it would be wrong to say that there are no sanctions at all behind international law although it is true that as compared to municipal law the sanctions of international law are far less effective. Starke has pointed out the following sanctions behind the international law—

(1) Under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, if there is threat to the international peace and security or an aggression has taken place, the Security Council can take necessary action to maintain or restore international peace and security. In this way, to some extent, the violation of international law can be checked and necessary action can be taken for maintenance of peace and security.

(2) The decisions of the International Court of Justice are binding upon the parties to the dispute. Article 94 of the United Nations also provides that if a party to the dispute does not follow the decision of the Court, the other party may approach the Security Council which can take necessary measures to ensure the implementation of the decision. However, it cannot but be admitted that the U.N. Charter does not contain any provision to maintain international law generally.

(3) Under Article 2(4) of the Charter, the members of the U.N. have undertaken that they shall respect the territorial integrity and political independence of each other and shall not use force against each other. There is only one example in the Charter wherein the members may use force. That is contained under Article 51 of the Charter which confers on the members the right of individual and collective self-defence. But even this right can be exercised only when an armed attack has taken place and is subject to overall supervision and control of the Security Council.[58]

But a pertinent question arises as to whether international law can be maintained without strong coercive mechanism? As aptly pointed out by Soviet authors,[59] "Such mechanism exist in principle, for example, the powers of the Security Council and Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter. They should, of course, be set in motion whenever necessary. However, in the longer run it is nevertheless impossible to count excessively on these mechanisms, the application of which is hampered in practice and which have so far proved to be only marginally effective." Further, "A reasonable world order, an order reflecting a balance of interests can be maintained with a minimum of coercion............ First of all, there arises in this context the matter of effective mechanisms for control over compliance with international treaties......... Another area in the efforts to strengthen law and order is the use and upgrading of the mechanisms of peaceful settlement of disputes.[60]

---

[56] "Sanctions in International Law", A.J.I.L., Vol. 54 (1960) p. 324.

[57] Torsten Gihl, The Legal Character and Sources of International Law (Stockholm, 1975), p. 61 ; Kelsen, General Theory of Law and State (1946), op. cit, pp. 328 et seq.

[58] For a detailed discussion on 'Self-defence'. 'Self-help' etc., See Chapter entitled "Intervention".

[59] Yuri Rybakov, Leonid Skotnikov, Alexander Zmeyevsky, "The Primacy of law in Politics" Int. Affairs (May, 1989) p. 57 at p. 59.

Thus International law is not without sanctions although these sanctions are not generally for the enforcement of international law in general. These sanctions are to maintain or restore international peace and security which is only a part of international law. As pointed out by Josef L. Kunz, "A more advanced international law must be based on the full recognition by states of the primacy of international law and enforceable sanctions both for the maintenance of peace and security and for the enforcement of international law in general by organs of international community". While welcoming the President of India to lay the Foundation stone of the building of Indian Society of International law, Judge Nagendra Singh aptly remarked, "According to our ancient concept of law the element of sanction provided by the authority of state is inherent in law itself to such an extent that without ostensible demonstration law has a halo of respect behind it and every one has to learn to ever respect it. Manu said : .... दंड धर्म विर्दुतधं This is equivalent to saying that law itself has an in-built element of respect and sanction behind it and wise human beings in their own interests need not search for authority to obey law as all laws are ordained to be obeyed. The position of International Law is somewhat like Manu's concept in this respect that there is no ostensible sanction or world authority in a budding state. However, respect flowing from inherent utility is so embedded in the very concept of that branch of law that it compels obedience to the precepts and tenets of international law." [61] It cannot be denied that international community does not possess any well-organised force or machinery to enforce international law generally. Despite this, whatever sanctions there are behind international law make impact upon the States and in practice States generally follow international law. "International order, far from perfect though it has, its own sanctions, seldeom imposed by force or command but as it were, natural sanctions slow to mature and gradual in effect but made compelling by the growing interdependence of the world." [62] In fact, "there exist among States rules imposing obligations upon them." [63]

According to Starke,[64] "If the word 'sanctions' to be taken in the larger sense measures, procedures, and expedients for exerting pressures upon a State to comply with its international legal obligations, then the abovementioned provisions of the United Nations Charter are not exhaustive of the sanctions which may become operative in different areas of international law." He cites several illustrations : (i) The Constitution of ILO lays down a procedure for dealing with complaints regarding failure of a member State to secure the effective observance of an International Labour Code. (ii) Article 14 of the Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961, provides that if a party to the Convention fails to carry out the provisions of the convention, the International Narcotics Control Board is entitled to call for explanations and if the explanation is unsatisfactory, the Board may call the attention of other competent U.N. Organs to the position, and may even recommend a stoppage of drug imports or exports or both to and from the country or territory in default. (iii) Under Articles 54-55 of the 1965 Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States, each contracting State is to recognise an arbitral award made pursuant to the convention as binding and is to enforce the pecuniary obligations imposed by the award as if it were a final judgment of a court in that State. (iv)

---

60. Ibid. at p. 59-60.
61. I.J.I.L. Vol. 24 (1984) pp. ix-x.
62. J.E.S. Fawcett, the Law of Nations (1961), p. 18.
63. The concept of Law (1961) p. 226 : Rahmatullah Khan has also aptly observed : "Nations obey international law not because of the fear of some brooding omnipresence in the sky threatening retribution to the recalcitrant because they feel obliged (for various reasons) to do so. And the consent of the constituent entities is continually decisive". "International Law—Old and New" I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975) p. 371 at p. 372.
64. Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (1989) pp. 28-30.

Acts by a particular State in violation of international law may sometime be regarded by other States as invalid and inoperative. Reference may be made to the Advisory opinion of the World Court on the Legal Consequences for States of the continued presence of South Africans in Nambia (South West Africa)[65] wherein the court held that South Africa's presence in Nambia was illegal and that the members of the U.N. were under obligation to recognise the invalidity of South Africa's acts in respect of Nambia and should refrain from such acts as may imply acceptance of the legality of its presence in, and administration of Nambia, or lending support to these.

Numerous other sanctions exist under the constituent instruments of different international organisations such as I.C.A.O., W.H.O., I.L.O., U.P.U., I.T.U. etc. These have been briefly discussed in Chapter 1 under the heading "Development of International Law by International organisations." In this chapter, it has already been pointed that there is a special mechanism by which the ILO functions to evaluate its standards. It may be added here that together the whole body of ILO Constitution and Recommendations which the ILO consider, still in effect is commonly known as International Labour Code. This Code and the Organisation have an impact far beyond the number of states which have ratified each Convention. In order to ascertain the organisation's impact, it is important to take into account that the member states which have not ratified Constitution yet have altered their laws or practice in response to the principles established by the ILO, often as a result of sophisticated ILO system of monitoring its standards. Furthermore, national courts, as well as national legislation also relies on the ILO's articulation of legal principles, especially as the area of collective bargaining and freedom of articulation on which the organisation developed a large number of precedents.

Reference may also be made here to Article 26 of ILO Constitution under which any of the members may file a complaint with the ILO office if it is not satisfied that any other member is securing the effective observation of any convention which both have ratified. The Governing Body may, if it thinks fit, refer the complaint to the Commission of Inquiry. After the Commission makes a report under Article 29, the Director-General shall communicate report to the Governing Body. Further, each of the governments within three months shall inform the Director-General whether or not it accepts recommendation contained in the report of the Commission and if not whether it proposes to refer complaint to the International Court of Justice. If Governing Board finds failure, it shall report to the General Conference. Finally if the matter is referred to the International Court of Justice, then under Article 31, the decision of the International Court of Justice in regard to the complaint or matters which has been referred to it in pursuance of Article 29 shall be final. Similarly, under Article 37 of ILO Constitution, any question or dispute relating to the interpretation of the Constitution or of any subsequent convention concluded by members shall be referred for the decision of the International Court of Justice. Advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice shall be binding upon any tribunal. Dispute settlement mechanism under the WTO also deserves mention here.

It has been aptly pointed out, "An emerging system of sanctions for the enforcement of international law is discernible,.........There are also certain other indications of a growing maturity in the international legal order. These include the recognition of certain rules that have the character of jus cogens which .... establishes that within the general body of rules of international law there exists superior legal rules, with which rules of a 'lower' order must be compatible." [66]

Apart from the above sanctions, other factors such as adverse public opinion, expediency, possibility of imposition of economic sanctions, fear of suspension or breaking of diplomatic relations, possibility of referring the matter or dispute to the U.N. or specialized agencies of the U.N., fear of suspension or expulsion from the Membership of

---

[65] I.C.J. Reports (1971), 16 at pp. 54, 56.

[66] Oppenheim's International law, note 11, pp. 11-12.

U.N. or other International Organisations, fear of punishment of war crimes, fear of payment of reparation etc. also operate as sanctions behind International law. Indeed the most important of these sanctions is public opinion which is the ultimate sanction behind international law, and for that matter behind any law.

Basis of International Law*

After having arrived at the conclusion that International Law is Law in the true sense of the term, it is necessary to see as to what is the true basis of international law. There are two main theories in this connection. They are : (1) Theories as to Law of Nature ; and (2) Positivism.

(1) Theories as to Law of Nature.—The jurists who adhere to this theory, are of the view that International Law is a part of the Law of Nature. In their view, States follow International Law, because it is a part of the Law of Nature. Explaining the view point of Natural Law Theorists, Starke has written : "........... States submitted to International Law because their relations were regulated by higher law, the 'law of nature' of which International Law was but a part." [67] In order to understand this theory, it is necessary to understand the meaning of 'Law of Nature'. In the beginning, Law of Nature was connected with religion. It was regarded as the divine law. The jurists of 16th and 17th centuries secularised the concept of Law of Nature. Much of the credit for this goes to the eminent jurist, Grotius. He expounded the secularised concept of the Law of Nature. According to him, natural law was the 'dictate of right reason'. His followers applied the law of nature as an ideal law which was founded on the nature of man as a reasonable being. International law was considered binding because it was in fact, natural law applied in special circumstances. Vattel, a famous jurist of 18th century also expressed the view that natural law was the basis of International Law. Pufendorf, Christian Thomasius, etc. are other prominent exponents of Law of nature.

Criticism.—The exponents of natural law are of the view that it is the basis of international law and has conferred binding force on international law. It may, however, be noted that each follower of the law of nature gives its different meaning. They use it as a metaphor. Different jurists give its different meaning such as, reason, justice, utility, general interest of international community, etc. Hence the meaning of law of nature is very vague and uncertain. Moreover, the main defect of this theory is that it is not based on realities and actual practices of the States.

Influence.—Despite the above criticism, the Law of Nature has greatly, influenced the growth of International Law. "Traces of 'Natural Law' theories survive today, albeit in a much less dogmatic form." [68] The ideal nature of the Natural Law has also greatly influenced the growth of international law.

(2) *Positivism. —Positivism is based on law positivum i.e. law which is in fact as contrasted with law which ought to be. According to the positivists, law enacted by appropriate legislative authority is binding. The positivists base their views on the actual practice of the States. In their view, treaties and customs are the main sources of International Law. The positivist's view was in vogue in the 18th century. Bynker-Shoek, one of the chief exponents of the Positivist School, wrote several books to popularise his views. In the view of the positivists, in the ultimate analysis, will of the States is the main source of International law. As pointed out by Starke,[69] "........International law can in logic be reduced to a system of rules depending for their validity only on the fact that States have consented to them." As pointed out by Brierly, "The doctrine of positivism

---

* See for I.A.S. Exam, (1975), Q. No. 3(a) and Q. No. 1 of (1973) : P.C.S. (1977), Q. 1 P.C.S. (1990) Q. 6(a).

[67] Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (1989) p. 22.

[68] An Introduction to International Law, Eighth Ed., p. 24.

 See for I.A.S. Exam, (1974), Q. No. 3(a) ; I.A.S. (1965) Q. No. 3 and I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 6. See also for P.C.S. (1977), Q. 1 ; C.S.E. (1981) Q. 5(a).

[69] Starke supra note 68 at p. 23 ; See also Ago, "Positive Law and International Law". A.J.I.L. Vol. 51, pp. 691-733.

 Asked in I.A.S. Exam, (1969), Q. No. 1.

teaches that international law is the sum of rules by which States have consented to be bound, and that nothing can be law to which they have not consented to be bound."* The concept of the will of State was first propounded by the German Philosopher Hegel. According to the positivists, international law is a body of rules which has been consented to by the States and accepted as binding by way of voluntary restriction or 'auto-limitation.' The Italian jurist, Anzilotti, one of the chief exponents of the Positivist School deserves a special mention. According to him, the binding force of international law is founded on a supreme principle or norm known, as pacta sunt servanda. In his view the basis of each rule of international law is pacta sunt servanda in some or the other way. The positivists admit that their view fails to explain the basis of customary international law. In their view, there is an implied consent in regard to customary rules of international law.

Criticism.—The positivist theory is based mostly on the actual practices of States. But this view has been subjected to a lot of criticism. It can be criticised on the following grounds :

(1) The concept of the will of State presented by the positivists is purely metaphorical.

(2) The view of the positivists that the whole of international law is based on the consent of the State is far from truth. As pointed out by an eminent author,[70] 'custom is said to be evidence of a general practice accepted by law'. It is not required that there should be any express recognition by States in order that this practice or international custom shall be binding upon them. The extreme positivist view which seeks to base all international law on the 'consent of states' has tried to establish that the rules of international custom are based on "tacit agreements" between states. But in reality it is not possible to prove that these rules come into existence in such a way. This is shown by among other things, the fact that a new State entering the community of nations at once becomes bound by the international customary rules and it is never suggested that any of these rules would not be binding on it. It never happens that the State consent is sought or that it enters into any agreement on the matter with the already existing States. On the other hand, the new State is not bound by any international convention already in force unless it expressly adheres to it. International custom constitutes general international law, a real law, for the society of States. From this it follows that the dictum pacta sunt servanda cannot be the 'basic norm' of international law, it is itself a rule of international custom.

(3) In practice, it is not always necessary to show that in regard to a particular rule of general international law, the State had given their consent.

(4) There are some principles of international law which are applicable on States although States did not give their consent for them. The principle propounded under Article 2(6) provides that the organisation shall ensure that States which are not members of the U.N. act in accordance with the principles (contained in Article 2 of the Charter) so far as may be necessary, for the maintenance of international peace and security.

(5) The norm 'pacta sunt servanda', "has been abandoned by most theorists, since it seems incompatible with the fact that not all obligations under international law arise from 'pacta', however widely that term is construed, so it has been replaced by something less familiar ; the so-called rule that States should behave as they customarily have." [71]

(6) "Even apart from its lack of accord with reality the theory that international law rests on agreements is problematic in another respect. Declarations of will are, of course, in themselves pure facts which have legal effects only because some rule of law gives them such effects."[72]

---

* Asked in I.A.S. (1976), Q. No. 1 ; For further elaboration of the answer see also Chapter 1.

[70] Torsten Gihl, The Legal Character and Sources of International Law (1957), at p. 75.

[71] H.L.A. Hart, the Concept of Law (1961), p. 228.

[72] Gihl, Supra note 70 at p. 60.

(7) According to the positivist view, treaties and customs are the only sources of international law* Grotius made distinction between the Jus Gentium, the customary Law of Nations (which he called Jus Voluntarium or Voluntary Law) and Jus naturrae or natural Law of Nations. He concentrated more on the natural Law and regarded voluntary law of less importance. The Grotians were somewhat between the Naturalists and the positivists. They maintained the distinction between natural and Voluntary Law of Nations but they considered positive or voluntary laws of equal importance to the natural laws. Thus, according to the Grotians, international law has originated not only from customs and treaties but also from natural law. This view, obviously, is not in conformity with the positivist view. The positivist view that treaties and customs are only sources of international law is also not in conformity with Article 38 of the Statute of International Court of Justice according to which "General Principles of Law Recognised by Civilized Nations" are also the sources of International Law. As pointed out Manley O. Hudson,[73] the provision relating to "the general principles of law recognised by civilized nation" serves a useful purpose in that it emphasizes the creative role to be played by the court. It confers such a wide freedom of choice that no fixed and definite content can be assigned to the term employed. It has widely hailed as a refutation of the extreme positive conception of international law.[74]

Influence and Contribution.—Despite the above-mentioned defects and criticism, a great merit of this theory is that it is based on the actual practice of the States. It emphasises that only those rules are the rules of international law which have been adopted by the States and are observed in practice. Yet another special feature of this theory is that it has encouraged realistic outlook in international law. In several cases concerning the customary rules of international law, the International Court of Justice has adopted the positivist attitude. The Asylum case,[75] the Anglo-Norweglan Fisheries case[76] and the Rights of the U.S. Nationals in Morocco cases,[77] deserve special mention in this connection. In the Asylum case, the International Court of Justice observed : "The party which relies on a custom of this kind must prove that this custom is established in such a manner that it has become binding on the other party. The Colombian Government must prove that this rule invoked by it is in accordance with a constant and uniform usage practised by States in question, and that the usage is the expression of a right appertaining to the States granting asylum and a duty incumbent on territorial States." **

True basis of International Law.—In the modern period no State can keep itself aloof from the affairs of the world. The means of transport and communication and other scientific inventions have brought the States of World closer to each other. The practices of States are, therefore, of great significance. As pointed out, the positivists have greatly encouraged the realistic outlook in international law have thus rendered a signal service. However no specific theory is capable of explaining the true basis of international law.[78] Indeed no single theory has received general agreement and sanctions. It appears as though there are as many theories as there are scholars.[79] According to Sir Cecil Hurst, no State can escape from the influence of international law. He has rightly pointed out : "International law is in fact binding on States because they are

---

* Asked in I.A.S. (1960). Q. No. 3 : see also for I.A.S. (1963) Q. No. 6.

[73] See The Permanent Court of International Justice, 1920-1942 (New York : The Macmillan Company, (1943), pp. 606-620 :

[74] Starke has also rightly observed : "From the theoretical standpoint, the provision for applying the 'general principles' has been regarded as (sounding the death-knell of positivism, inasmuch as it explicitly rejects the broad positivist view that custom and treaties are to be considered the exclusive sources of International Law", An Introduction to 'International Law' Edition (1977), pp. 39-40.

[75] I.C.J. Rep. (1950), p. 266.

[76] I.C.J. Rep. (1951), p. 116.

[77] I.C.J. Rep. (1952), p. 176.

 See also for C.S.E. (1992) Q. 5(C).

[78] See Starke, An Introduction to International Law, Eighth Edition (1977) pp. 34-35.

[79] See O. Schachter, "Towards a Theory of International Obligation" (1968) 8 Virginia JIL, 300, 300-305.

States."[80] Thus States obey international law because they are States. States obey international law because it is in their interest to do so. "The ultimate explanation of the binding force of all law is that man, whether he is single, individual or whether he is associated with other men in a State, is constrained in so far as he is reasonable being, to believe that order and not chaos is the governing principle of the world in which he has to live."[81]

Moreover as aptly pointed out in the Ninth Edition of Oppenheim's International Law,[82] "It is, however, in accord with practical realities to see the *basis of international law in the existence of an international community the common consent of whose members is that there shall be a body of rules of law—international law—*to govern their conduct as members of that community. In this sense 'common consent' could be said to be the basis of international law as a legal system." Further, "This 'common consent' cannot mean, of course, that all states must at all times expressly consent to every part of the body of rules constituting international law, for such common consent could never in practice be established.... The common consent that is meant is thus not consent to particular rules but to express or tacit consent of States to the body of rules comprising international law as a whole at any particular time."[83] Lastly, "The emergence of 'consensus' as an appropriate procedure for the adoption of many decisions at international conferences and in such bodies as the United Nations General Assembly has mitigated the consequences which would otherwise flow from rigid requirements of consent in an international community now numbering over 150 States, and has permitted the continued development of international law in accordance with the general consent of the international community.[84]

Some other theories. regarding the basis of International Law

Following are some other theories regarding the basis of International Law : (1) Theory of Consent ; (2) Auto-limitation Theory ; (3) Pacta Sunt Servanda ; and (4) Theory of Fundamental Rights. The first three theories have been derived from positivism and the fourth has been derived from 'Theories as to Law of Nature.' We will now briefly discuss these theories one by one.

(1) *Theory of Consent. —In the view of the supporters of this theory, consent of States is the basis of international law. States observe rules of international law because they have given their consent for it. Positivists have given much support to this view. The chief exponents of this theory are Anzilotti, Triepel, Oppenheim,[85] etc. This theory fails to explain the basis of customary international law. In the view of the supporters of this theory, States are bound to observe customary rules of international law, because they have given their implied consent for their acceptance. This theory has been subjected to severe criticism by many jurists, such as, Starke, Brierly, Kelsen, Fenwick, etc. Following are some of the points of criticism levelled against the theory :—

(i) As pointed out by Starke, in practice it is not necessary to prove that the other State or States have given their consent in regard to a specific rule of international law.[86] According to Prof. Smith, all States are bound by international law, no matter whether they have given their consent or not.[87]

---

[80] Sir Cecil Hurst, International Law : The Collected Papers, p. 9.

[81] J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition (1968), p. 56.

[82] See Note 11, p. 14 ; emphasis added.

[83] Ibid.

[84] Ibid, at pp. 15-16.

* See I.A.S. (1970), Q. No. 3 ; see also matter discussed under the heading "Positivism," see also for P.C.S. (1970), Q. No. 1, C.S.E. (1981), Q. 5(a).

[85] According to Oppenheim, "If law is............ a body of rules for human conduct within a community which by common consent of the community shall be enforced through external power, the common consent is the basis of all law." International Law, Vol. 1, Eighth Edition Edited by H. Lauterpacht, p. 15 ; Oppenheim further adds, "It will be noted that 'Common consent' is sociological rather than a legal explanation of the validity of the law. In the law the question still arises : Why is consent binding? Probably the answer to that question as the validity of the first source of law cannot itself be a legal one. Its validity cannot be proved as legal proposition ; it must be assumed by reference to what has been called the initial hypothesis ...." L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition (1970 Reprint), p. 6.

(ii) In regard to customary rules of international law, the basis of implied consent is far from correct. "The States are bound by general international law even against their will." [88] Professor Kelsen has cited the example of new States, which get rights and duties under international law immediately after becoming the subject of International law.

(iii) In the view of Fenwick, the theory of consent is not correct because it is against the principles and things which the States have been accepting since the beginning of international law.'[89]

(iv) Theory of consent fails to explain the case of recognition of new State. The granting of recognition is the act of other States and hence it would be wrong to say by getting recognition, the recognised State has given its consent in respect of international law.[90]

(v) According to Brierly the theory of consent cannot explain the true basis of international law even if we distort facts and try to fit them in the theory.

Thus we see theory of consent cannot explain the true basis of international law and can be severely criticised. As pointed out earlier, States follow international law for the simple reason that they are States. As an ordinary person has to obey municipal law, even against his will, similarly, States are bound to follow international law. To quote Sir Cecil Hurst again, "International law is, in fact, binding on States because they are States.[91] Thus, "consent can never be the ultimate force of legal obligation".[92] However, as noted earlier 'common consent' can be said to be the basis of international law as a legal system in the sense that we "see the basis of international law in the existence of an international community the common consent of whose members is that there shall be a body of rules of law—international law—to govern their conduct as members of that community." This 'common consent' is not consent to particular rules but to the "express or tacit consent of states to the body of rules comprising international law as a whole at any particular time."

(2) *Auto limitation Theory. —According to this theory, international law is binding upon States because they have restricted their powers through the process of auto-limitation and have agreed to abide by international law. This theory is also based on the view of the positivists. This theory lays great stress on independence and sovereignty of the States Jellinck is the chief exponent of this theory. The basis of this theory is this that each State has a will which is completely independent and free from external influences. But through the process of auto-limitation, State can restrict its powers and thereby limit its will. In short, States are not bound to follow international law because they are independent and sovereign but the States can make themselves bound by rules of international law by restricting its powers.

Criticism.—This theory has also been subjected to severe criticism by the jurists. This theory is based upon a presumption that there exists a State will in fact the will of the State is nothing but the will of the people who compose it. Besides this, auto-limitation is no limitation at all. The auto-limitation theory will imply that the State can free itself from self-imposed restriction at its will. In practice, this is not possible. Brierly, Friedmann and other jurists have severely criticised this theory. "First, these theories fail completely to explain how it is known that States 'can' only be bound by self-imposed obligations, or why this view of their sovereignty, should be accepted, in advance of any examination of the actual character of international law. Secondly, there is some incoherence in the argument designed to show that States, because of their sovereignty, can only be subject to or bound by rules which they have imposed upon themselves"[93] Prof. Hart further points out that this theory fails to explain the case of a new State. "Here the attempt to rest the new state's international law obligations on a 'tacit' or 'inferred' seems wholly threadbare. Secondly, it fails to explain the case of a State acquiring territory or undergoing some other change, which bring with it, for the first time, the incidence of obligation under rules which previously it had no opportunity either to observe or break, and to which it had no occasion to give or withhold consent." [94]

---

[86] Starke, Supra note 78 at p. 29.

[87] See H.A. Smith, Great Britain and the Law of Nations, Vol. I (1932), pp. 12-13.

[88] Hans Kelsen, Principle of International Law, 154.

[89] Charles G. Fenwick, International Law (Third Indian Reprint, (1971), p. 36.

[90] According to Prof. Hart, when a new State emerges, as did Iraq in 1932, and Israel in 1948, it is bound by the general obligations of International law including, among others the rules that give binding force to treaties. Here the attempt to rest the new State's International obligations on a 'tacit' or 'inferred' consent seems wholly threadbare so is also the case of State-acquiring territory, [The concept of law (1961), p. 221.]

[91] See Supra note 80.

[92] C. Wilfred Jenks, Law, Freedom and Welfare, p. 85.

* Asked in I.A.S. (1962), Q. No. 1, For answer see also matter discussed earlier under the heading "Positivism".

(3) Pacta Sunt Servanda.—In the view of Italian jurist, Anzilotti, the binding force of international law is based on the supreme fundamental norm or principle, known as pacta sunt servanda. This means that the agreements entered into by States will be respected and followed by them in good faith. This is a well-established and recognised custom of international law. This customary principle of international law has now been codified and finds mention is Article 26 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969. Article 2 provides that every treaty in force is binding upon the parties to it and must be performed by them in good faith. According to Anzilotti, this norm is the foundation of the binding force of international law. Like positivism, the principle of pacta sunt servanda is also based on the actual practice of States. It emphasises the importance of the agreement entered into by States and regards them as the basis of international law.

Criticism.—It cannot but be admitted that pacta sunt servanda is a very important principle of international Law ; States must respect the agreements entered into by them and follow the same in good faith. If it were not so, there would be anarchy and disorder in the international field. But to assert that the binding force of international law based only on the principle of pacta sunt servanda is far from truth. It fails to explain the binding force of customary rules of international law which are not based upon agreements between States. It has been rightly remarked[95] : "The realization that international customary law does not rest on agreements and that the tenet pacta sunt servanda is itself a rule of customary law led to new formulations of the basic norm. Kelsen himself has decided on a formula which takes into account of usage as the fact which is the origin of the rules of international law. 'States ought to behave as they have customarily behaved'." [96]

(4) Theory of Fundamental Rights.—* This theory is based on the naturalistic view point. According to this view-point, prior to the existence of State, man used to live in natural state and even in that state he possessed some fundamental rights, such as, independence, equality, right to self-preservation. Like man, State also possessed these fundamental rights because so far there is, no world institution over and above the States.

Criticism.—This, theory has been severely criticised by jurists. J.L. Brierly[97] has made the following criticism of the theory—

(1) According to this theory when a new State is admitted to the family of nations, it brings with it certain fundamental rights which are inherent. As a matter of fact, such rights are meaningless unless there is a legal system which confers validity on them.

(2) This theory cannot be commended because it is in favour of giving more freedom to the States and lays less emphasis on social relations and co-operation among the States.

---

93. Hart, Supra note 71, pp. 219-20 : Torsten Gihl has also remarked : ".... an (obligatiton derived from auto-limitation could never be anything but illusory", (The legal Character and Sources of International Law (1975), p. 57.

94. Supra note 71 at pp. 219-20.

95. Gihl, Supra note 70, at p. 162.

96. Kelsen, Theory of Law and State, p. 369.

* See for I.A.S. (1965), Q. No. 3.

97. See the Law of Nations, Sixth Edition (1963), pp. 50-51.

(3) Last but not the least shortcoming of this theory is that it regards certain fundamental rights, such as, independence, equality, etc, as natural rights. But as a matter of fact, these fundamental rights are as a result of historical development.

New trends regarding basis of obligation in International Law :

Since the beginning of modern international law, consent has been the basis of obligation under international law. Consent played such a predominant role that it was even extended to explain the basis of customary rules of international law. The positivists tried to establish that international customs were based on "tacit-agreements" between states. The unanimity rule was the prevailing rule for every conference and treaty. Only a party to treaty was bound by it. Though the unanimity rule still continued, the United Nations Charter introduced majority rule in all of its organs. In the course of time, General Assembly gained strength and became the most potent organ of the U.N. Though not originally envisaged, General Assembly even started legislative activities and passed a number of resolutions which were considered binding or having legal implications. Thus the fort of unanimity rule seems to be crumbling against the onslaught of majority rule in international organisations.[98] This change has necessiated a change in the theory of obligation in international law.

A unique feature of new international law is that it is found not only in law-making conferences but also in law creating conferences such as those of UNCTAZ, GATT, IBRD, IMB, OECD, OPEC etc. It has been aptly pointed out "the G.A. (i.e. General Assembly) resolutions constituted the "joint action' and the 'process' through which states and peoples persued their objectives. The point is, it would be naive to ignore such law creating resolutions—one may legitimately go a step further to state that given the current concerns of the world community and the versimilitude of joint action being taken, law making conventions and conferences are only tiny episodes in the drama of international law." Further, "And international law would cease to have any validity or relevance if it did not take cognizance of the processes through which the world community pursued its pressing concerns." [99]

One of the most important changes that has taken place is that many a decisions at international conferences and General Assembly of the U.N. are being adopted by 'consensus'. Though the unanimity rule has not been completely defeated, the basis of obligation in international law is changing from sovereignty oriented consent to community oriented consensus.[100] As Fawcett has remarked "we must wait on the future to see whether the requirement of consent of states in international law making can ever become independent of the treaty process and be satisfied by the vote in the General Assembly or an International conference convend by it. In the law of sea conventions at least, the treaty form has already begun to seem a grumbling appendix.[101] Further Resolution 1962 (XVII) which declared Legal Principles on outer space "may fairly claim to have furthered the progressive development of International Law called forth by Article 13(1) because it has formulated general principles of law of international conduct or authoritatively interpreted the United Nations Charter.[102] So is the case with the Resolution 2749(XXV) which declared Legal Principles governing the seabed and ocean floor and Sub-soil thereof beyond the limits of National Jurisdiction. Regarding such type of resolutions McNair has said that "while it is unsafe to generalise upon them, there is no reason or principle why they should not establish obligations.[103] "They are much more than a programme of desireable objectives, they are, an attempt to deduce some of the implications for International Law." [104] As regards Resolution 1962 (XVIII) before the conclusion of outer space Treaty, Prof. Jenks aptly remarked : "The authority of the Declaration of Legal Principles may be expected to grow with the passage of years. While, it is somewhat less than a treaty, it must already be regarded a rather more than a statement of custom.[105]

---

[98] See also C.W. Jenks "Some constitutional Problems of International Organisation, BYBIL, Vol. 22(1945) p. 11 at p. 34—

[99] Rahmatullah Khan, "International Law—Old and New" I.J.I.L., Vol. 15(1975) p. 371 at p. 374. See also Rosalyn Higgins The development of International Law through the Political organs of United Nations (1963) p. 2, Guenter Weissnerg "United Nations Movements towards World Law" ICLQ, Vol. 24 Part 3 (July 1975) p. 460, 461, Michel Virally, The sources of International Law" in Sorensen Manual of Public International Law p. 162.

[100] R.P. Anand, "International organisations and the functioning of International Law" I.J.I.L., Vol. 24 No. 1 (1984), p. 51 at p. 63.

[101] International Law and the Uses of Outer Space p. 14.

[102] Ibid at p. 13.

The International Court of Justice has also lent its support to the above-mentioned change (i.e. from sovereignty oriented consent to community oriented consensus) in the basis of obligation in international law. In the case concerning Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine Area (Canada/U.S.) [106] the world court aptly observed :

"Turning lastly to the proceedings of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea and the Final result of that Conference, the chamber notes in the first place that the convention adopted at the end of the conference has not yet come into force and that a number of states do not appear inclined to ratify it. This, however, in no way detracts from the consensus reached on large portions of the instrument, and above all, cannot invalidate the observation that certain provisions of the convention, concerning the continental shelf and the exclusive economic zone, which may, in fact, be relevant to the present case, were adopted without any objections.

In the chamber's opinion these provisions, even if in some respects they bear the mark of the compromise surrounding their adoption, may nevertheless be regarded as consonant at present with general international law on the question." [107]

In the case concerning the continental shelf (Libyan Arab Jamahiraya/Malta)[108] also the International Court of Justice took the same position. The Court observed.

"It is of course axiomatic that the material of customary international law is to be looked for primarily in the actual practice and opinion juris of states, even though multilateral conventions may have an important role to play in recording and defining rules deriving from custom or indeed in developing them.

Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the 1982 convention is of major importance, having been adopted by an overwhelming majority of states ; hence it is clearly the duty of the Court even independently of the references made to the convention by the parties, to consider in what degree any of its relevant provisions are binding upon the Parties as a rule of customary international law." [109]

This undoubtedly is a clear triumph of community oriented consensus[110] over sovereignty oriented consent. But the battle has not been finally won and the struggle is likely to a prolonged one. As a matter of fact, consent will continue to be a basis of obligation and there should be no objection to it. But in view of ever widening scope of international law it has become necessary to recognise the importance and utility of 'consensus' as a basis of obligation in international law. The theory of consent as the basis of obligation was developed by European states for their own interests. With the emergence of large number of states and the horizontal as well vertical expansion of international law, the traditional theory fails to cope with the interests and aspirations of international community as a whole and the changes that have taken place. It is, therefore, necessary to enunciate a dynamic and comprehensive theory of basis of obligation so that it may take into account the interests and inspirations of international community as a whole. The international lawyers and jurists can make a significant contribution in this connection.

---

[103] International Law and the Uses of Outer Space, p. 7.

[104] C.W. Jenks, Law, Freedom and Welfare, p. 33.

[105] C.W. Jenks, Space Law (Stevens, 1965) p. 185.

[106] Judgement dated 12 October, 1984.

[107] Ibid, para 94, emphasis added.

[108] Judgement of 3 June, 1985.

[109] Ibid, para 27.

[110] By the consensus we mean "a general attitude in favour of a position which may not necessarily be held by all the members of the international community." Obed Y. Asamoah, The Legal significance of the Declarations of the General Assembly of the United Nations (The Hague, 1969) p. 57.

15. Influence of Natural Law*

The origin of natural law can be traced to centuries before the birth of Christ. Probably no other principle or school of law took as much time in its development as the law of Nature. Moreover as aptly remarked by Dias : "no other firmament of legal or political theory is so bejeweled with stars as that of 'Natural law' for it has engaged the attention of some of the greatest, thinkers of all ages." Credit of giving birth to natural law must go to the Greeks. After the Greeks, Romans further developed it. The early and original law of Romans was called 'Jus Civile'. Later on, they developed another legal system called 'Jus gentium'. It was called 'Jus gentium' because it was thought to be the law of universal application. In the republican era of Rome 'Jus gentium' was reinforced by natural law or 'Jus naturale' as was commonly called. By Jus naturale the Romans meant, as pointed out by Brierly, 'the sum of those principles which ought to control human conduct, because founded in the very nature of man as a rational and social being"[111] The law of nature is the expression of what is just against what is merely expedient at a particular time and place ; it is what is reasonable against what is arbitrary ; what is natural against what is convenient and what is for the social good against the personal will." [112] Thus natural law was based on the rational and reasonable needs of man's nature. Most of the jurists admit that natural law greatly influenced International Law and gave it its binding force.

The writers and jurists of the middle age developed law of nature in accordance with the values and conventions of their age. In this period, natural law was linked with religion. For example, according to St. Thomas Acquinas, natural law is a part of the law of God which man seeks through his reason.

Roman Law in Europe in 16th century contributed much in the beginning in the development of modern International Law. It will be desirable here to refer briefly to the criticism of medieval conception of natural law. In this period it was believed that there existed rationality in the Universe. Besides being an exaggeration, the belief in this conception was not substantiated by the practice of the States. Secondly, according to the writers, of the medieval age, if there was a conflict between positive law and natural law, the latter would prevail. It was a very revolutionary idea and could not be accepted. Despite this criticism, it must be admitted that natural law emphasised the importance of purpose behind law. It stressed that law was not the body of meaningless rules or principles to be enforced by the Courts. In fact, law existed to achieve definite objectives.

In 18th and 19th centuries, the positivists were in vogue. The poitivism was based on the actual practice of States. It was the period of the decline of the Natural Law. The positivists denied the existence of any purpose behind the law. According to the positivists, people would be bound to obey law if it was created by appropriate legislative authority or sovereign irrespective of its being reasonable or unreasonable. They called this law, law positivum, or positive law i.e. the law in fact. Thus in the view of the positivists, in the conflict of the positive law and natural law, the former will prevail.

Twentieth century saw the revival of the Natural Law. Positivism was subjected to severe criticism. Once against faith in Natural law was reaffirmed. However, the conception of Natural Law underwent significant changes in this period. Basing their views on Kant and Hegel, the modern writers adopted Natural law in accordance with times and circumstances. The chief exponents of this movement were Stammler and Koheler. For example, Stammler admitted that Natural law could be adopted to the changing times and circumstances although its fundamental principles remained unchangeable. He, therefore, propounded the theory of "natural law which with a variable content." In the recent times, Prof. Fuller of America has emerged as a great exponent of natural law. He has propounded the theory of "inner morality of law". In other words, there is an inner morality of law and there is a definite purpose behind law. Law is not a body of meaningless rules and does not exist for its own sake. Law exists or is created to achieve some purpose.

---

* See for Q. No. 2 of I.A.S. Exam., (1971).

[111] See J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations (1963), p. 17.

[112] J.E.S. Fawcett, The Law of Nations (1968), p. 26 ; see also P.E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (1971), pp. 177-178.

The concepts of Natural Law developed from time to time have greatly influenced the growth of international law. In the words of Sir Henry Maine, "the grandest function of the 'law of nature' was discharged in giving birth to modern international law." Starke has also remarked : "Traces of natural law, theories survive today albeit in a much less dogmatic form." [113] There are many traces of the influence of natural law on international law. For example, the development of human rights, system of punishment of war crimes, etc. are all due to the influence of natural law. Thus the idealist character natural law has greatly influenced the international law. It may, however, be noted that natural law kept itself aloof from the actual practice of States. This was the main defect of natural law. It was this reason that was responsible for the decline of natural law.

---

[113] Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (1989) p. 22.

CHAPTER 4

SOURCES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW*

Formal and Material Sources

As pointed out by Starke, "The material sources of international law may be defined as the actual materials from which an international lawyer determines the rule applicable to a given situation."[1] "The term 'source' refers to methods or procedure by which international law is created."[2] A distinction is made between the formal sources and material sources of law. As pointed out by G. Fitzmaurice they may also be described as, respectively, as direct and indirect, as proximate or immediate and remote or ultimate. Material sources may also be described the "origins" of law while the material, historical or indirect sources represent the stuff out of which the law is made, that is to say, they go to form the content of the law, the formal, legal and direct sources consist of the acts or facts whereby this content is clothed with legal validity and obligatory force. The essence of the distinction, therefore, is between the thing which inspires the content of law, and the thing which gives that the content its binding character as law. "The former are those legal procedures and method for the creation of rules of general application which are legally binding on the addressee. The material sources provide evidence of the existence of rules which, when proved, have the status of legally binding rules of general application."[3] Further, "The sources of international law must not be confused with the basis of international law; this, ..., is to be found in the common consent of the international community. The sources of law, on the other hand, concern the particular rules which constitute the system, and the processes by which he rules become identifiable as rules of law. The sources of the rules of law, while therefore distinct from the basis of the law, are nevertheless necessarily related to the basis of the legal system as a whole." [4] The sources of international law may be classified into five categories—

(1) International conventions;
(2) International customs ;
(3) General Principles of Law Recognized by civilized Nations ;
(4) Decisions of Judicial or Arbitral Tribunals and Juristic works ;
(5) Decisions or Determinations of the Organs of International Institutions.

The above-mentioned third source 'General Principles of Law Recognised by Civilized Nations' was first mentioned in Article 38 of the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice. It was retained in Article 38 of the statute of the International Court of Justice which mentions the following sources of international law : (1) International conventions ; (2) International customs; (3) General principles of law recognized by civilised nations; and (4) Judicial decisions and the teachings of most highly qualified publicists of the various countries as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law. The above-mentioned Fifth source, i.e., Decisions or determinations of the Organs of International institution does not find mention in Article 38 of the statute of the court but it has now become a well-recognized source.

(1) International Conventions

In the modern period, international treaties are the most important source of international law. This is because the reason, inter alia, that states have found in this source a deliberate method by which to create binding international law. Article 38 of the statute of the International Court of Justice lists 'international conventions whether general or particular, establishing rules expressly recognized by the contesting States' as the first source of international law. As pointed out by Manely O. Hudson, the term 'conventions' is used in a general and inclusive sense. It would seem to apply to any treaty, convention, protocol, or agreement, regardless of its title or form. A convention may be general, either because of the number of parties to it, or because of the character of its contents; it may be 'particular' because of the limited number of parties, or because of the limited character of its subject-matter. Whenever, an International Tribunal decides an international dispute then its first endeavour is to find out whether there is an international treaty on the point. In case there is an international treaty, the decision of the court is based upon the provisions of that treaty. According to Article 2 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of the Treaties, 1969, "A treaty is an agreement wereby two or more States establish or seek to establish relationship between them governed by international law". But this definition is narrow and does not seem to be correct. As correctly pointed out by Prof. Schwarzenberger, "Treaties are agreements between subjects of international law creating a binding obligation in international law." However, it would be wrong to say that Vienna Convention does not show its awareness to this fact for Article 3 provides that the fact that the present convention does not apply to international agreements concluded between states and other subjects of international law, or between other subjects of international law, or to international agreements not in written form, shall not affect :

---

* See for P.C.S (1971), Q. No. 1; C.S.E. (1984) Q. 5 (e); P.C.S. (1983) Q. 1 (a) ; UPPCS (2002) Q. 8 (A); IAS (2008) Q. 5 (a).

 See also for IAS (2008) Q. 5(a).

[1] J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (Butterworth, 1989), Starke's International Law, Eleventh, Edition, Butterworths (September, 1994) p. 28.

[2] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 16.

[3] Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Second Edition (Clarendon Press Oxford, 1973), p. 1.

[4] Oppenheim's International Law, Vol. I, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Ninth Edition, Longman Group UK Limited and Mrs Tomoko Hudson, 1992, p.23.

 See also for P.C.S. (1978) Q. 1, P.C.S. (1995) Q. 5(a).

(a) the legal force of such agreements ;

(b) the application to them of any of the rules set forth in the present convention to which they would be subject under international law independently of the convention ;

(c) the application of the convention to the relations of states as between themselves under international agreements as to which other subjects of international law are also parties.

Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969 has 114 parties as of April, 2014.

Reference may be made here to Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties between States and International Organisations or between International Organisations (21 March, 1986). Article 1 of this convention provides that the present convention applies to : (a) treaties between one or more states and one or more international organisations; and (b) treaties between international organisations. Further, Article 6 provides that the capacity of an International Organisation is governed by the rules of that organisation. Moreover Article 26 of this convention reiterates the principle of Pacta Sunt Servanda. It provides that every treaty in force is binding upon the parties to it and must be performed by them in good faith.

International treaties may be of the two types : (A) Law-making treaties and (B) Treaty contracts :

(A) Law-making treaties.—The provisions of law-making treaty are directly the source of international law. The development of law-making treaties received an impetus from the middle of 19th century. The main reason for this was that in view of the changing circumstances, customs, which were hitherto the most important source of international law, were proving to be inadequate. Consequently, States regarded it necessary and expedient to enter into treaties and thereby established their relations in accordance with the changing times and circumstances. Law-making treaties may again be divided into following two types :—

(a) Treaties enunciating rules of universal international law.—United Nations Charter is the best example of such type of treaty.

(b) International treaties which lay down general principles.—These treaties are entered into by a large number of countries. 1958 Geneva Conventions on the law of the Sea and Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969 are good examples of such type of treaties.

Law-making treaties perform the same functions in the international field as legislation does in the State field. Law-making treaties are the means through which international law can be adapted to in accordance with the changing times and circumstances and the rule of law among the States can be strengthened. Treaty process is also a useful means to develop universal international law. But an international treaty can enunciate universal principle only when it receives the support of the essential States.[5] For example a law-making treaty which does not receive the support of nations, such as, Russia, Britain, America, France and China, cannot effectively enunciate general or universal rules.

(B) *Treaty contracts.—As compared to law-making treaties, treaty contracts are entered into by two or more States. The provisions of such treaties are binding on the parties to the treaty. Such treaties also help the formation of international law through the operation of the principles governing the development of customary rules. This may happen when a similar rule is incorporated in a number of treaty contracts. Beside this a treaty enter into by a few States is subsequently accepted by many other States as they enter into similar treaties. Finally, "A treaty may be of considerable evidentiary value as to the existence of a rule which has crystallised into law by an independent process of development." [6]

2. International customs

International customs have been regarded as one of the prominent sources of international law for a long time. It "is the oldest and the original source, of international as well as of law in general." [7] It is only in the modern period that the importance of customs has suffered a setback. However, even today it is regarded as one of the important sources of international law. Customary rules of international law are the rules which have been developed in a long process of historical development.

Article 38(b) of the Statute of International Court of Justice recognises 'International Custom, as evidence of general practice accepted as law', as one of the sources of international law. In order to understand the meaning of 'custom', it is necessary to know the meaning of the word 'usage'. The words 'custom' and 'usage' are often used as synonymous. In fact, there is difference between the usage and custom, and they are not synonyms. Usage is in fact the early stage of custom. By usage we mean those habits which are often repeated by the States. As pointed out by Starke, where a custom begins, usage ends. Usage is an international habit which has yet not received the force of law. In the words of Starke, "Usage represents the twilight stage of custom, custom begins where usage ends. Usage is an international habit of action that has yet not received full legal attestation." Usages may be inconsistent and opposed to each other. But this can never be the case with the custom. When States in their international relations start behaving in a particular way in certain circumstances, it is expected that in the similar circumstances they will behave in the same way. This is called the usage. But when this usage receives the general acceptance of recognition by the States in their relations with each other, there develops a conception that such a habit or behaviour has become right as well as obligation of the States and in this way usage becomes the custom. As aptly remarked by Viner,[8] "A custom, in the intendment of law, is such usage as that obtained the force of law."

It is not necessary that the usage should always precede a custom. It is also not necessary that a usage must always become a custom. In certain cases a usage may become a custom, in certain other cases it may not become. In this connection Torsten Gihl[9] has summarised his conclusions in the following words :—

---

[5] Leo Gross, "Sources of Universal International Law" in Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law" (1972) p. 189 at p. 196.

* See also for I.A.S. (1959) Q. No. 4.

[6] Starke, note 1, at p. 46.

 See also for C.S.E. (1980) Q. 7(a) P.C.S. (1994) Q. 5(a) ; IAS (2007) Q. 6(a).

[7] Oppenheim's International Law, note 4, at p. 25.

[8] Adopted from Starke, note 1, at p. 41; Brierly has also written that "Custom, in its legal sense means something more than mere habit or usage; it is a usage felt by those who follow it to be obligatory one", 'The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition (1963), p. 59; see also Josef L. Kunz, The Nature of Customary International Law, A.J.I.L. Vol. 47 (1953), p. 662 at p. 667.

 Asked in I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 69 (a).

(i) In certain cases usage gives rise to international customary law, in other cases it does not. But there is no rule of international law, or indeed any rule at all, which determines when usage shall give rise to custom.

(ii) Together with usage (as a purely factual phenomenon) there are a number of other purely factual phenomenon, State interests, powers, factors, general opinion, historical events, etc., which in various combinations contribute to the creation of international custom, and custom can arise even without any usage. The coming into existence of a customary rule is an historical process which, in certain cases at least, can be demonstrated by purely historical methods, but there is no rule of law which determines when these factors shall give rise to international custom.

(iii) When a usage is combined with opinio juris sine necessitatis, a rule of customary law exists, and it is probably justifiable to say that a usage reflects a customary rule if it is connected with a practically universal opinio juris.

Thus when a general usage in international sphere, or State practice, is connected with opinio juris et necessitatis international customary law exists. This is a statement about a fact and as such almost a truism since a usage of this kind is a general practice accepted as law by, definition a custom. As pointed out by the International Court of Justice in North Sea Continental Shelf Cases,[10] for a state practice to constitute opinio juris not only must the acts concerned amount to a settled practice, but they must also be such, or be carried in such a way, as to be the evidence of a belief that this practice is rendered obligatory by the existence of a rule of law requiring it. The need for such a belief i.e., the existence of a subjective element, is implicit in the very notion of the opinio juris sine necessitatis. The States concerned must therefore feel that they are conforming to what amounts to a legal obligation.

For deducing this subjective element, bilateral or multilateral treaties, resolutions of General Assembly of the U.N., international conferences and statements of State representative etc. may be seen.

*Generation by Treaty of Customary Rules of International Law .—A provision of a treaty may also generate a rule of customary International Law. In North Sea Continental Shelf case[11] the International Court of Justice observed that provisions in treaties can generate customary law and may be, in the words of the Court; of a "norm-creating character".[12] In the view of the World Court, the 'norm-creating process' is a perfectly possible one and does from time to time occur; it constitutes indeed one of the recognised methods by which new rules of customary international law may be formed." [13] According to the Court, the first three articles of the Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, 1958, are of norm-creating-character.[14] But a treaty provision can generate customary international law only when the provision concerned is "of a fundamentally norm-creating character such as could be regarded as forming the basis of a general rule of law." In the present case the Court was construing Article 6 of the Convention which lays down 'equidistance' principle for demarcation of continental shelf between two coastal States. According to the Court, Article 6 was not intended to be a 'norm-creating character'. One of the reasons given by the Court was that the 'principle of equidistance' was prefaced by the words 'in the absence of agreement'. As pointed out by a writer[15] : "The World Court's decision in the North Sea Continental Shelf cases,[16] is a major contribution to that branch of the theory of customary international law dealing with norm creation by means of a treaty. The Court articulated a new methodology for determining which provisions in treaties can form the basis of universally binding customary law. As the spreading network of international convention becomes more fine-meshed the substantive rules of international customary law may be expected to conform more and more closely to the provision in these conventions. The World Court has implicitly recognized this process in many prior opinions, but it was not until continental shelf decision that the link between treaty and custom was focussed with precision......... The Court thus recognizes the fact that the conclusion of a treaty is a step of international significance taken by two or more States that would normally have constituted a component of customary law. Not only is there a definite meeting of the minds in a treaty (as we infer from an act involving two or more States that constitutes practice for the purposes of customary law); but also there is the clear articulation of a rule of law that gives the treaty a special impetus towards formulating a general rule. A great many rules of customary international law, perhaps even the majority, had their origin in treaties, and the World Court itself in several cases has used treaties for evidence of rules of law held binding upon non-parties."

---

[9] The Legal Character and Sources of International Law, (1957), pp. 82-83.

[10] I.C.J. Rep. (1969) pp. 3, 44.

* See also for P.C.S. (1980), Q. 7 ; C.S.E. (1996) Q. 5(a).

[11] I.C.J. Rep. (1969), p. 3.

[12] Ibid, at p. 43.

[13] Ibid, at p. 42.

[14] Ibid, at pp. 40, 43. For the provisions of Articles 1, 2 and 3 see matter discussed under "continental shelf" in Chapter on "The Law of the Sea".

[15] Authority D' Amato "Manifest Intent and The Generation by Treaty of Customary Rules of International Law", A.J.I.L., Vol. 64 (1970), pp. 892, 899.

Ingredients or elements of custom*

Following are the main ingredients of an international custom:—

(i) Long Duration.—Long duration is generally said to be an essential ingredient of a custom. This is particularly true of a custom in Municipal Law. In Municipal Law, a custom is required to be ancient and immemorial. But this is not necessary for an international custom. Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice directs the World Court to apply 'international custom, as evidence of a general practice accepted as law'. Emphasis is not given on a practice being repeated for a long duration. What is more important is the practice of States accepting the practice concerned as law. In the field of international law, customs have emerged in a short duration, for example, custom relating to sovereignty over air space and the continental shelf.

(ii) Uniformity and consistency.—The custom should also be uniform and consistent. In the Asylum case,[17] the International Court of Justice observed that the rule invoked should be 'in accordance with a constant and uniform usage practised by the States in question, and that this usage is the expression of a right appertaining to the State granting asylum and a duty incumbent on the territorial State.' This follows from Article 38 of the Statute of the Court which refers to international custom 'as evidence of a general practice accepted as law'. According to Mannley O, Hudson, "The elements necessary are the concordant and recurring action of numerous States in the domain of international relation, the conception of each case that such action was enjoined by law, and the failure of other States to challenge that conception at the time". It may, however, be noted that complete uniformity is not necessary. Nevertheless, there must be substantial uniformity.

In its judgment of 27 June 1986 in the case concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua[18] while referring occasional violations of the principle of non-intervention, the International Court of Justice observed :

"It is not to be expected that in the practice of states the application of the rules in question should have been perfect, in the sense that states should have refrained, with complete consistency, from the use of force or from intervention in each other's internal affairs. The court does not consider that, for a rule to be established as customary, the corresponding practice must be in absolutely rigorous conformity with the rule. In order to deduce the existence of customary rules the court deems it sufficient that the conduct of states should in general, be consistent with such rules and that instances of state conduct inconsistent with a given rule should generally have been treated as breaches of that rule not as indication of the recognition of a new rule." [19]

---

[16] (1969), I.C.J. Rep. 3 ; 63 A.J.I.L. 591 (1969); 8 Int. Legal Materials 340 (1969).

* See for I.A.S. (1961), Q. No. 5 ; UPPCS (2004) Q. 7.

[17] I.C.J. Rep. (1950), at pp. 276-277.

[18] I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 14.

(iii) Generality of Practice.—Although universality of practice is not necessary, the practice should have been generally observed or repeated by numerous States.

(iv) Opinio juris et necessitatis.—According to Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, international custom should be the evidence of général practice "accepted as law". In the view of Brierly, "In applying the forms of evidence......... in order to establish the existence of an international custom what is sought for is general recognition among States of a certain practice obligatory." [20] In the North Sea Continental Shelf cases[21] the World Court observed, "Although the passage of only a short period of time is not necessarily, one of itself, a bar to the formation of a new rule of customary international law on the basis of what was originally a purely conventional rule an indispensable requirement would be that within the period in question, short though it might be, State practice, including that of States whose interests are specially affected, should have been both extensive and virtually uniform in the sense of the provision invoked; and should moreover have occurred in such a way as to show a general recognition that a rule of law or legal obligation is involved". Thus, "......... customary practice, even when it is general and consistent, is not customary law unless, opinio juris is present, that is to say, unless the practice is recognized as being required by international law. It is this sense of legal obligation, as distinguished from motives of fairness, convenience, or morality, that underlies customary law".[22]

Customary rules of international law have developed as a result of (1) Diplomatic relations between States; (2) Practice of international organs; (3) State laws, decisions of State courts and State military or administrative practices, and (4) Treaties between States.

It is an important matter to see as to how international custom will be applied in international law. There are two leading cases on the point :

(a) West Rand Central Gold Mining Company Ltd. v. R[23].—In this case a test regarding the general recognition of custom was laid down. The Court ruled that for a valid international custom it is necessary that it should be proved by satisfactory evidence that the custom is of such nature that it has received general consent of the States and no civilized State shall oppose it.

In case concerning Military and Para-Military Activities in and Against Nicaragua,[24] the World Court observed :

"If a state acts in a way prima facie incompatible with a recognized rule, but defends its conduct by appealing to exceptions or justifications contained within the rule itself, then, whether or not the state's conduct is in fact justifiable on that basis, the significance of that attitude is to confirm rather than to weaken the rule."

(b) Right of passage over Indian territory case [Portugal v. India].[25]—In this case the International Court of Justice pointed out that when in regard to any matter or practice, two States follow it repeatedly for a long time, it becomes a binding customary rule. The facts of this case are as follows—

> This case deals with the question relating to the right of Portugal to send its nationals and military through the Indian territory. Until 1954 Portugal possessed the right of passage through Indian territory which was in between Dadra and Nagar Haveli and Daman. The right was however subject to control and regulation

---

[19] I.C.J. Reports 1986 at p. 98.

[20] J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition, p. 61; emphasis added.

[21] I.C.J. Rep. (1969), p. 3 at p. 43 ; emphasis added; See also Lotus case, P.C.I..J, Series A, No. 10, p. 28.

[22] See also case concerning Military and Para-Military Activities in and against Nicaragua. I.C.J. Reports 1986 p. 14 at pp. 108-109.

[23] (1905) 2 K.B. 291. For facts of this case see Chapter on "State Succession".

[24] I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 14 at p. 98.

[25] I.C.J. Rep. (1960), p. 6.

by India. In between October, 1953 and July, 1954, certain incidents took place; the relation between India and Portugal worsened and Portugal claimed that India was exercising excessive control. In July 1954, the people of Dadra (which was a Potuguese Colony) revolted against the Portuguese Government. It naturally had certain repurcussions over the border areas of Indian territory. Consequently, the Government of India suspended the right of passage of Portugal over this area. India contended that it had become necessary due to the special circumstances that had arisen. Portugal took this matter to the International Court of Justice. The International Court of Justice had to decide whether India was entitled to exercise control over the way and whether Portugal could send its military or armed forces through the passage ? The Court had also to give its verdict on the point whether India acted contrary to its obligations ? It may be noted that the claim of Portugal was based on the treaty of 1779. The International Court of Justice decided that Portugal was not entitled to send its armed forces through the way which fell within the Indian territory. The Court ruled that India did not act contrary to its obligations. The Court, however, ruled that the Treaty of 1779 was a valid treaty and Portugal was entitled to get passage through Indian territory in consequence of the provisions of the said treaty. The decision is important in so far as that the International Court of Justice ruled that if under a treaty a State gets right of passage through the territory of another State and if it continues for a long time, then it gains the force of law and thereby imposes the obligation upon he State affected to continue to give right of such passage. It may be noted here that on 31st December, 1974, a treaty was signed between India and Portugal wherein the latter recognised the full sovereignty of India over Goa, Daman and Diu, Dadra and Nagar Haveli.

As pointed out by Brownlie, this case "raised an issue of bilateral relations, the existence of a local custom in favour of Portugal in respect of territorial enclaves inland from the port of Daman (Damao). In this type of case the general law is to be varied and the proponent of the special right has to give affirmative proof of a sense of obligation on the part of the territorial sovereign opinio juris is here not to be presumed on the basis of continuous practice and the notion of opinio juris merges into the principle of acquiesenco". It may further be noted that in Asylum case (1950), also the International Court of Justice held that where a local or regional custom is established in such a manner it has become binding on the other party".

Situation when same principle is found in customary law and is also codified in a treaty.—This was one of the matters, inter alia, considered by the International Court of Justice in the Military and Paramilitary Activities in and Against Nicaragua.[26] In this case the court was considering the question whether United States' reservation to its acceptance of Court's jurisdiction effectively excluded disputes relating to certain multilateral treaties if claims were also based on rules of customary international law incorporated in those treaties. In the instant case the court found that this identity of content in treaty law and in customary law did not exist in the case of the rule invoked. While clarifying the position of law the world court observed :

"...... even if the customary norm and treaty norm were to have exactly the same content, this would not be a reason for he court to hold that the incorporation of the customary norm into treaty-law must deprive the customary norm of its applicability as distinct from that of treaty norm."

Further, "more generally, there are no grounds for holding that when customary international law is comprised of rules identical to those of treaty law, the latter 'supervenes' the former, so that the customary international law has no further existence of its own."

*Importance of custom as a source of International Law and Evaluation.—There has been a marked decline in the importance of customs as a source of international law in modern times. This is mainly due to the fact that the process of the development of a new custom is very slow.[27] However, in modern times also the development of new custom is possible and at times customs have developed with accelerated speed. Principles relating to sovereignty over air space and continental shelf are its glaring examples.[28] But, in view of the accelerated speed of the changes in international community, custom has now become an inadequate means for bringing about the changes and development of international law.[29] Thus, the development of a custom is very slow and as compared to it, rapid changes can be effected through treaties and conventions so as to adopt international law in accordance with the changing times and circumstances.[30] The four Geneva conventions on the Law of the Sea, 1958 and now the U.N. Convention on Law of the Sea 1982, to quote only a few examples, bear testimony to this fact.

---

[26] I.C.J. Rep. (1986) at p. 94.

* See for I.A.S. (1978) Q. 2. For answer see also matter discussed above regarding custom as a source of International law ; UPPCS (2004) Q. 7.

The Soviet Union regards custom as an inadequate means for the development of international law. In one of his articles,[31] Tunkin has expressed the view that the development of custom also is based on the agreement between States. Consequently, customary rules are binding only on those States who have given their consent for them. According to the Soviet view, therefore, agreement between States is the only adequate means for the development of International Law.[32]

In South-West Africa case[33] Judge Tanaka observed : "briefly, the method of generation of customary international law is in the stage of transformation from being an individualistic process to bring a collectivist process. This phenomenon can be said to the adoption of the traditional creative process of international law to the reality of the growth of the organised international community. It can be characterised, considered from the sociological view point, as a transaction from a traditional custom making to international legislation by treaty." Thus in the modern times the importance of custom as a source of law has greatly reduced, with the simultaneous rise in importance of treaties and conventions, for the development of international law.

But as pointed out by Edward Collins,[34] "International organizations also contribute to the development of customary international law by providing a clear, concentrated forum for State practice. Particularly in the General Assembly of the United Nations, where more than 106 (now 185) member States are represented, the Statements and the votes of representatives on legal matters provide evidence of existing customary law, as is illustrated by the discussion on, and the adoption of, the resolution affirming the principles of the Nuremberg Charter and Judgment. Still other resolutions amount to 'an interpretation of the rules and principles which the Charter already contains and which are in consequence binding upon member States, authoritative by reason of the standing of the United Nations.[35]

3. General Principles of Law recognized by civilized states*

Para (1) (C) of Article 38 of the Statute of International Court of Justice lists General Principles of Law Recognized by Civilised States as the third source of international law.

---

[27] See J.L. Brierly, Supra Note 8, p. 62.

[28] Oliver, J. Lissitzyn ; International Law Today and Tomorrow (New York, 1965), p. 105.

[29] Ibid.

[30] Leo Gross, "Sources of Universal International Law" in Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, Edited by R.P. Anand (1972), p. 189 at pp. 196-197.

[31] See G.I. Tunkin, "Remarks on the Juridical Nature of Customary Norms of International Law", California Law Review, Vol. 49 (1961), p. 421.

[32] In his words, "......... agreement between States lies at the basis of the process by which customary norms of International Law are created.

[33] I.C.J. Rep. (1966), p. 6 at p. 248.

[34] International Law in a Changing World (1969), at pp. 427-28.

[35] Michel Virally, "The Sources of International Law", in Sorensen ; Manual of Public International Law, p. 162.

* See for I.A.S. (1966), Q. No. 3 : I.A.S. (1964), Q. No. 3 ; and I.A.S. (1972), Q. No. 1 P.C.S. (1984) Q. 1 (b) ; P.C.S. (1991) Q. 6(a) ; IAS (2003) Q. 5 (c).

In the modern period, it has become an important source. It "constitutes an important landmark in the history of international law inasmuch as the State Parties to the statute did expressly recognise the existence of third source of international law independent of custom or treaty." [36] This source helps international law to adapt itself in accordance with the changing times and circumstances. As pointed out by G. Von Glahn, renowned author of international law, two views are prevalent about the phrase 'general principles of law recognized by civilized nations'. According to one view the phrase includes such, general principles (such as : both sides of a dispute should be given a fair hearing and no one can sit in judgement in his own case) which are found in domestic Jurisprudence and can be applied to international legal questions. The other view regards the phrase as linked to natural law as interpreted during recent centuries in the western world. According to this view general principle of law recognised by civilized nations have emerged as a result of transformation of broad universal principles of law applicable to all the mankind into specific rules of "international. However law of nature represents at best a vague and ill-defined source of international law, the former or the first view about the general principles of law is generally prevalent today. By general principles of law recognized by civilized States we mean those principles which have been recognized by almost all the States. "Owing to 'the gaps in international law' it was felt that the competence of the Court could not be confined to making judgments according to positive international law, i.e. according to custom and conventions but on the other hand, it was not designed to give free rein to the law-making activity of the court and the court had to content itself with applying principles of law which could be established as common to the municipal law of all civilized nations and were therefore positive law, though not positive international law.[37] In the Lotus case,[38] the Permanent Court of International Justice also observed : "The Court considers that the words 'principles of international law,' as ordinarily used can only mean international law as it is applied between nations belonging to the community of States".

It may be noted here that a principle of law which is recognised by domestic law of a large number of States does not automatically become a 'principle' of international law. It becomes a principle of international law only when it is recognised as such by the World Court. Judge Lauterpacht has, therefore, rightly remarked that the main function of the 'general principles of law' has been that of a safety-valve to be kept in reserve rather than a source of frequent application. The World Court resorts to the application of this source only when in a case before it, there is neither an international convention nor a custom in respect of the dispute involved. Thus "Article 38, paragraph 1(c) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice .... places on record one of the main sources of the rules of public international law. Indeed, it describes the inexhaustible reservoir of legal principles from which the tribunals can enrich and develop public international law." [39]

"By general principles of law we mean 'those rules or standards which we find repeated in much the same form in the developed systems of law, either because they have a common origin, as in Roman law, or because they express a necessary response to certain basic needs of human association. Examples are : the rule of pacta sunt servanda, that contracts must be kept ; the principle that reparation must be made for damage caused by fault ; the right of self defence for the individual against attack on his person or family and the community against clear and present danger ; and the principle that no man may be a judge in his own cause, and that he who has to judge must hear both the sides." [40] Further, "we must emphasise that general principles of law, as systems of law, or those derived from them, but can be traced also in Islamic law, customary laws in Africa, religious law in India, and traditional laws in China and Japan.[41] Thus, "General principles of law recognised by civilized nations are indeed ensemble of those general principles which underlie, antedate, vary from and form the model of municipal rules of law, which are same in all jurisdictions and aim at justice in every case.[42] In the view of Judge Chagla, principles of international law can be taken from the municipal law if they have received universal acceptance and are not inconsistent with any rule of international law.[43]

---

[36] Oppenheim's International Law, note 4, pp. 38-39.

[37] Torsten Gihl, The Legal Character and Sources of International Law (Stockholm, (1957), p. 86).

[38] P.C.I.J., Ser, A. No. 10, p. 16.

[39] Lord McNair, "The General Principles of Law Recognized by Civilized Nations" BYBIL, Vol. XXXIII (1957), p. 1 at p. 6; See also John Hazard, "The General Principles" 52 A.J.I.L. (1958), p. 85; Wolfgang Friedmann, "The Uses of 'General Principles' in the Development of International Law', A.J.I.L. (1963), p. 279; Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice, "The Law and Procedure of the International Court of Justice 1954; 'General Principles and Sources of International Law' BYBIL, Vol. XXXV (1969), p. 193, G.G. Fitzmaurice, The Law and Procedure of the I.C.J. General Principles and Substantive Law". BYBIL, Vol. XXVII (1950), p. 1.

Res Judicata, estoppel, etc. are examples of the general principles of law recognized by civilized States. These principles are such as have received recognition by almost all the States. They have, therefore, been included as the general principles of international law. General principles of law recognized by civilized States include procedural as well as substantive principles provided that they have received general recognition of civilized States. The development of general principles of law recognized by civilized States as an important source of law has given a death-knell to the positivism.

Following are some of the important cases relating to the general principles of law recognized by civilized States :—

(a) R. v. Keyn.[44]—In this case the Court ruled that international law is based on justice, equality and conscience which has been accepted by long practice of States.

(b) United States v. Schooner.—In this case Justice Storey of United States of America ruled that International law should be based on the general principle of law recognized by civilized States. He was giving decision relating to abolition of system of slavery.

(c) In the case of diversion of water from Muese.[45]—The Permanent Court of International Justice applied res judicata and estoppel.

(d) Chorzow Factory (Indemnity) Case.[46]—In this case, the Permanent Court of International·Justice applied the principles of res judicata and also held that one who violates a rule is liable to make reparation.

(e) Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions Case.[47]—In this case, the Court applied the general principle of subrogation.

(f) Case concerning the Temple of Preah Vihear.[48]—In this case, the International Court of Justice recognised and applied the principle of estoppel.

(g) Barcelona Traction case, Preliminary Obligation.[49]—In this case International Court of Justice applied the principle of estoppel.

(h) Frontier Dispute (Burkina Faso v. Mali)[50].—In 1983 Burkina Faso and Mali entered into an agreement to refer their Frontier Dispute to the International Court of Justice. During the agreements Mali contended that that form of equity ought to be kept in mind which is an inseparable part of the interpretation of International Law. Though

---

[40] J.E.S. Fawcett, The Law of Nations, London, 1968 pp. 24-25.

[41] Ibid, at p. 25; See also B. Cheng, "General Principles of law as a subject for International Codification" C.L.P. Vol. IV, 1951, p.35 at p. 37; Vladimir Paul, General Principles of Law in International Law, I.J.I.L., Vol. 10, 1970, p. 324 at pp. 347-49.

[42] B. Cheng, Supra Note 41 at p. 47.

[43] Right of Passage Over Indian Territory Case, I.C.J. Rep. (1957), p. 177.

[44] (1876) Ex. D. 63.

[45] (1937) P.C.I.J., Series A.B. Case No. 70.

[46] Pub. P.C.I.J., (1928), Series A, No. 17.

[47] Pub. P.C.I.J. (1964), Series A, No. 2.

[48] I.C.J. Rep. (1962), p. 6.

[49] I.C.J. Rep. (1964), p. 6.

[50] I.C.J. Reports (1985) p. 6.

Burkina Faso did not object to the said contention, it said that it was not clear as to what would be its practical objective in this case because in the delimitation of boundary, there is no equivalence of equity principles. The Chamber of International Court of Justice held that it can take the help of that equity which both the parties have accepted or given consent to.

The International Court have recognised as general principles : (i) good faith; (ii) responsibility ; (iii) prescription ; (iv) in the absence of any express provision to the contrary, every Court has right to determine the limits of its own jurisdiction ; (v) a party to a dispute cannot himself be an arbitrator or judge ; (vi) res judicata ; and (vii) in any judicial proceeding the Court shall give proper and equal opportunity of hearing to both parties.[51] Since these principles have been recognised and applied by the Courts many a times, B. Cheng has, and rightly too, suggested that these and such other principles should be codified.[52]

In regard to the general principles recognised by civilized nations, the Soviet view is very narrow. According to Kazimierz Grzybowski, "... in a world consisting at this time of two opposed world systems, there are no such general principles except those established by international agreement as part of international law." [53] This view does not seem to be correct because if this view is accepted, the International Court will have no right in respect of recognition of general principles. With the breaking up of Soviet Union and end of communism in Russia, cold war has ceased and hence this view has lost its importance. J.L. Brierly has rightly written that general principles of law is such a source which the Courts have referred in past also and its inclusion in Article 38 (1) (c) of the Statute of International Court of Justice shows clearly that the positivist doctrine, according to which International law is a body of rules on which the States have given consent, has been rejected.[54] "From the theoretical standpoint, the provision for applying the 'general principles' has been regarded as 'sounding the death-knell, of positivism, in as much as it explicitly rejects the broad positivist view that customs and treaties are to be considered the exclusive sources of international law." [55] Thus by recognising general principles of law recognised by civilized States, dynamism of international law and the creative function of the International Court have been ensured. Indeed, it "enables rules of law to exist which can fill the gaps or weaknesses in the law which might otherwise be left by the operation of custom and treaty, and provides a background of legal principles in the light of which custom and treaties have to be applied and as such it may operate to modify their application." [56]

4. Decisions of Judicial or Arbitral Tribunals and Juristic Works*

*International Judicial Decisions.—In the modern period International Court of Justice is the main International Judicial Tribunal. It was established as a successor of the Permanent Court of International Justice. It may, however, be noted that the decision of International Court of Justice does not create a binding general rule of international law. Article 59 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice makes it clear that the decisions of the court will have "no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular case". Earlier decisions of the Court are not binding on the Court itself and the Court is free to deviate from its earlier decisions. However, ordinarily the Court does not deviate from its earlier decisions and it changes its earlier decisions only in very special circumstances. Thus while in principle it does not follow the doctrine of precedent, in practice, it ordinarily follows it. So far as the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice is concerned, it is not binding at all. But it clarifies the rule of international law on a particular point or matter. According to Article (38)(1) (d), subject to the provisions of Art. 59 judicial decisions are "subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law". Thus judicial decisions, unlike customs and treaties, are not direct sources of law, they are subsidiary and indirect sources of International law.

---

[51] B. Cheng, Supra Note 41, at pp. 40-50.

[52] Ibid, at p. 53.

[53] Soviet Public International Law (A.W. Sijthoff Leyden, (1970), p. 30.

[54] The Law of Nations Sixth Edition (1963), p. 63.

[55] Starke, note 1 at p. 35.

[56] Oppenheim's International Law, note 4, at p. 40.

* IAS (2001) Q. 5 (c).

 See for I.A.S. (1974), Q. No. 1(b) ; C.S.E. (1982) Q. 5(a) ; C.S.E. (1993) Q. 5 (a)

State Judicial Decisions.—State judicial decisions may become rules of international law in the following two ways :—

(a) State judicial decisions are treated as weighty precedents. In the words of Chief Justice Marshall of the Supreme Court of America, "The decisions of the court of every country show how the law of the nations in the given case is understood in that country will be considered in adopting the rule which is to prevail in that case." [57]

(b) Decisions of the State Courts may become the customary rule of international law in the same way as customs are developed.

Decisions of International Arbitral Tribunals.—In the view of some jurists the decisions of International Arbitral Tribunals cannot be treated as source of international law. These jurists have, rightly too, pointed out that in most of the arbitral cases, arbitrators act like mediators and diplomats rather than as judges. The Kutch Award (1968) bears testimony to this fact. Consequently, their decisions should be treated as source of International law. Generally the said criticism is correct. It may, however, be noted that some of the decisions of the Permanent Court of Arbitration are treated as weighty precedent and can be regarded as source of International law. Judge Lauterpacht has aptly written, "One of the reasons usually given for its (i.e. Permanent Court of Arbitration) inadequacy was that the awards rendered by its tribunals were not legal in form and substance; that they tend to confuse law with a diplomatic solution aiming at pleasing both parties. It may be difficult to substantiate that charge. An analysis of the awards given by tribunals under the aegis of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, before and after the first world war, must reveal that their decisions were legal awards in form and substance." [58]

Juristic works.—Although juristic works cannot be treated as an independent source of international law, yet the view of the jurists may help in the development of law. The views of the jurists are not direct sources of international law. But they sometimes become instrumental in the development of international customs. According to Article 38 of the International Court of Justice, the works of highly qualified jurists are subsidiary means for the determination of the rules of international law. The importance of the works of the jurists has been stressed by Justice Gray in Paquete Habana.[59] In the words of Justice Gray, "...... Where there is no treaty and no controlling executive of legislative act or judicial decision, resort must be had to the customs and usages, of civilized nations and as evidence of these, to the works of jurists and commentators who by years of labour, research and experience have made themselves peculiarly well-acquainted with the subjects which they treat. Such works are resorted to by judicial tribunals not for the speculations of their authors concerning what the law ought to be but for trustworthy evidence of what the law really is". This case deals with seizure of fishing vessels, its cargoes and capture of sailor's during the state of blockade.

The Paquete Habana and the Lola were two fishing vessels with Spanish flags on them. In 1898, during the war between America and Spain, the warships of America blockaded the northern coast of Cuba, which was then a colony of Spain. The American warships seized these fishing vessels and in order to punish them started proceedings against them in the District Court of America. The District Court declared the fishing vessels and its cargoes as prize. The owners of the ship preferred an appeal in the Supreme Court of America against the said order. The Supreme Court of America reversed the decision of the lower court and ruled that the claimants be given the money derived from the sale of vessels, cost of the case and compensation. On the basis of the precedents and the established rules of international law, the court concluded that the fishing vessels and unarmed sailors who pursued their work honestly and peacefully,

---

57. Thirty Hoghsheads of Sugar, Bentzon v. Boyle, (1815) 9 Cranch 191 at p. 198.

58. Sir Hersch Lauterpacht, The Development of International Law by the International Court (1958), pp. 5-6.

59. (1900) 175 U.S. 677 at p.700.

could not be seized or apprehended during the state of blockade. International Law exempts such fishing vessels and their sailors from seizure during the state of blockade.

5. Decisions or determinations of the organs of International institutions*

Before the establishment of League of Nations, International Customs and International Conventions were recognized as the main source of International Law. In addition to these main sources, juristic works and decisions of judicial and arbitral tribunals were regarded as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law. The statute of PCIJ under Art. 38 incorporated these sources and also introduced one new source namely "General principles of law recognised by civilized nations". Article 38, however, did not at all mention decisions or determinations of organs of International institution as source of law. The reason for this was quite obvious that by this time International organisations had not assumed such an important role as they have done now.

The evolution of International organisation represents a significant stage in the history and development of International law. International organisation in its wider sense, is the process of organising complexity of International relations. In a narrow sense, it is an International institution based on multilateral international agreement entered into by sovereign states, its organs having autonomy of will, having permanent organs and having distinct entity or personality separate from its total of its membership. Even before the establishment of the League of Nations, some experiments were made for development of international organisations. They can be classified into three stages. The concert of Europe, a loose association of great powers of Europe, represents the first stage and may be said to contain seeds of present Security Council. The second stage is represented by two Hague Conferences (called Hague system) which contains the seeds of present General Assembly of United Nations. Third stage is represented by the establishment of public international unions such as Universal Postal Union and International Telegraph Union (Both of these are now specialized agencies of U.N..), which contains the seeds of present International secretariat and specialized agencies. The League of Nations may be described as the first comprehensive experiment in the development of International organisation which sought to combine all the above-mentioned three different aspects of international organisation. It has been rightly remarked that League of Nations pioneered all aspects of international organisation. The U.N. has simply further developed, elaborated and perfected these systems.

After the establishment of U.N. and of course the establishment of dozens of inter-governmental organisations which were brought into relationship with the U.N. and called specialized agencies of U.N. International Organisations have become a part and parcel not only of international life but also of national life. Their impact is clearly evident on every aspect of our life. For example if there is a scarcity of foodgrains, F.A.O. comes to the rescue of nations and their people ; if there is a health problem i.e. spread of diseases etc. W.H.O. comes to our rescue; in respect of problems of workers and labourers, there is I.L.O. which has assumed such a significant role in this field that its conventions taken as a whole, are called International Labour Code, which is said to be generally binding on all states; there is ICAO which regulates relations of states in respect of International Civil Aviation and the Council of ICAO is competent to decide any dispute relating to obstruction to International Civil Aviation. ICAO Jurisdiction case, India v. Pakistan (1972) is a glaring example of this.

In fact after the establishment of U.N., most of the development of international law and its codification has taken place through the instrumentality of international organisations. General Assembly, one of the principal organs of U.N., has established International Law Commission which not only surveys the whole field of international law but also prepares drafts and make recommendations to these aspects to General Assembly. The General Assembly in its turn adopts its recommendations and recommends the holding of international conferences for adopting international conventions on different topics. A large number of international conventions have been adopted in this way during last three decades. The I.C.J. which has rendered signal service for development of international law is in fact a judicial organ of U.N. Art. 92 of Charter, says : "The ICJ shall be the principal judicial organ of the U.N. It shall function in accordance with the annexed statute, which is based upon the Statute of PCIJ and forms an integral part of the present charter."

---

* See also for C.S.E. (1993) Q. 5(a).

In view of these strong reasons, the decisions and determination of organs are now recognised as an important source of international law. Although they do not find mention in Art. 38 of Statute of ICJ but ICJ itself has recognised it in number of cases. For example, in Certain expenses of U.N. the ICJ held that the expenses incurred by U.N. in Suez and Congo crisis could be apportioned among the member states of U.N. by General Assembly. It may be noted here that in both these crises, U.N. armed forces were sent under Uniting for Peace Resolution (1950). The ICJ thus, though indirectly, upheld the validity for Uniting for Peace Resolution. Similarly in South-West Africa Cases (1966) Judge Jessup of ICJ remarked that numerous resolutions of General Assembly condemning apartheid was declared an International crime by International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of Apartheid adopted in 1973, (which came into force in 1976), the World Court had declared it as violative of international law and obviously this decision was based on resolutions of General Assembly. As pointed out in the Ninth Edition of Oppenheim's International Law,[60] "The fact that the International Court of Justice, in its numerous judgments and opinions relating to international organisations, has always been able, without remarking upon the incompleteness of Article 38, to dispose of the questions arising for decision, is a strong argument for suggesting that their activities are for the moment at least still properly regarded as coming within the scope of traditional sources of international law......... while at present this can be regarded as merely providing a different forum for giving rise to rules whose legal force derives from traditional sources of international law, there may come a time when the collective actions of the international community within the framework provided by international organisations will acquire the character of a separate source of law." In the view of Starke,[61] organs of international institutions may lead to the development of international law in the following ways :

(i) In international matter their decisions are the intermediate or final steps in the development of customary rules. For example, it was ruled by Security Council of the United Nations that if any member absent from the Security Council meeting then it will not be deemed to be a veto. This decision has helped in the development of the international custom on this point. Similarly, the Security Council can decide whether matter is procedural or important. Such decisions may help in the development of an international custom on the point.

(ii) The resolutions of the organs of international institutions may be binding on the members in regard to the internal matters of the institution.

(iii) Organs of international institution can decide the limits of their competence.

(iv) Sometimes the organs of international institution may make the interpretation of the different provisions of their constitutional instruments. This decision becomes a part of the law of international institution which in its turn becomes a part of the international law.

(v) Some organs of international institutions are empowered to give quasi-judicial decisions. European Economic Community deserves a special mention in this connection. Organs of international institutions submit some matters to the Committee of Jurists for their opinion. The opinion of the Committee of Jurists is of great significance and may help in the development of customary rule of international law.

(vi) An organ of international institution may refer a matter to the International Committees of Jurists for its opinion or for investigation of a legal problem. The opinion of such committees "bear some weight and authority."

---

[60] See note 4, at p. 46.

[61] Starke, Supra Note 1 at p. 53; see also Openheim's International Law, note 4, at pp. 47-50.

In case concerning Military and Para-Military Activities in and against Nicaragua,[62] the International Court of Justice relied on resolutions passed by international organisations, inter alia, and cited them as evidence of the existence of customary rules. Thus, as evidence of customary rule prohibiting the use or threat of force in international relations, the court cited the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the U.N. As evidence of customary rule of non-intervention, the court cited the said Friendly Relations Declaration, the Declaration on the Inadmissibility of Intervention. As evidence of a customary right of self-defence, the court cited the Friendly Relations Declaration and the General Assembly's definition of Aggression (1974).[63]

Reference may also be made here to the decisions of the U.N. Administrative Tribunal. In the case of Effect of Awards of Compensation Made by the United Nations Administrative Tribunal,[64] the International Court of Justice held that the Tribunal was independent and truly judicial body pronouncing final judgments without appeal within the limited field of its functions and not merely an advisory or subordinate organ. Its judgments were therefore binding on the U.N. organisation and also upon the General Assembly (which established the Tribunal). In other subsequent two cases, namely, Application for Review of Judgment No. 158 of the United Nations Administrative Tribunal and Application for Review of Judgment No. 273 of the United Nations Administrative Tribunals also the International Court of Justice upheld the decisions of the Tribunal.

Ex aequo et bono

After enumerating the sources of International law in Article 38 (1), Article 38(2) of the World Statute qualifies Article 38(1) by providing : "This provision shall not prejudice the powers of the court to decide a case ex aequo et bono, if parties are agree thereto." Thus, as pointed out by Manely O Hudson, "In a case where the parties are agreed that it may decide ex aequo et bono, the provision in the Statute would seem to enable the courts to go outside the realm of law for reaching its decision. It relieves the courts from the necessity of deciding according to law. It makes possible a decision based upon considerations of fair dealing and good faith, which may be independent of or even contrary to the law. An International Tribunal can decide a dispute ex aequo et bono, and go outside the realm of law only if such power has been conferred on it by mutual agreement between the parties.[65]

Some other sources of International Law

Besides the above sources of International law, following are some of the other subsidiary sources of international law :

(1) International Comity.—The mutual relations of nations are based on the principle of comity. In other words, when a State behaves in a particular way with other States, the latter have also to behave in the same way. According to Prof. Oppenheim, international comity has helped in the development of international law.

(2) State Paper.—In the modern period almost all the civilized States have diplomatic relations with each other. They send letters to each other for mutual interests. These letters are sometimes published. A study of these letters sometime reveals that certain principles are repeatedly followed by States in their mutual intercourse. Sometimes these State Papers help in the solution of a conflict or controversy. In the famous case of The Caroline (1841), the note of Mr. Webster, Secretary of State of the U.S. deserves a special mention here. In his note Mr. Webster said that for intervention on the ground of self-defence, the necessity must be "instant, overwhelming leaving no choice of means and no moment for deliberation". Since then it has been recognized as a rule of international law. "Occasionally an international controversy clears up a disputed legal

---

[62] I.C.J. Reports, 1986, p. 14.

[63] See Michael Akehurst, "Nicaragua v. United States of America", I.J.I.L., Vol. 27 (1987), p. 357 at pp. 358-359.

[64] I.C.J. Rep. (1954) p. 47.

[65] See Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali), ICJ (1985) Rep. 6.

point or advances the application of principles that have before received little more than an otiose assent." [66]

(3) State guidance for their officers.—It is mostly seen that a number of matters of the Governments of respective States are resolved on the advice of their legal advisers. These advices are also, therefore, sometimes treated as sources of international law.

(4) Reason.—'Reason' has occupied a special position in all the ages. In modern period also it occupies an important place. It has performed a special role in the development of international law. Whenever there is no rule of international law to guide the court, the matter is resolved on the basis of reason.[67] By reason, we mean the judicial reason through which principles are discovered to face the new situations which are considered valid by the jurists. When there is no treaty or particular rule of international law to resolve any question, the court applies judicial reason. As pointed out by Pollock, "The law of nations is founded on justice, equity, convenience, and the reason of the thing and confirmed by long usage.[68]

The view of Pollock seem to be correct in view of the conditions prevalent before the second world war because then most of the rules of International Law were in the form of customs and hence the court could take the help of justice, equity, convenience and the reason of the thing to decide a dispute. The position has, however, changed after the second world war when States entered into a large number of treaties to regulate their relations in different fields. When clear provisions of law are incorporated in treaties, the scope of applying the principles of equity, justice, convenience and the reason of the thing diminishes. The importance of these principles, however, does not completely end because whenever the question of interpretation of any provision of a treaty arises or where there is some ambiguity, the court interprets it on the basis of the principles of equity, justice, convenience, and the reason of the thing. The court gets an opportunity of applying these principles particularly when there is some ambiguity about the meaning of any provision.

(5) *Equity and Justice.—In the Barcelona Traction case,[69] Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice emphasized the need for a body of rules and principles of equity in the field of international law. "Equity" is used here in the sense of considerations of fairness, reasonableness, and policy often necessary for the sensible application of the more settled rules of law. Strictly, it cannot be a source of law, and yet it may be an important factor in the process of decision. Equity may play a dramatic role in supplementing the law or appear unobtrusively as a part of judicial reasoning. The principle of the 'exception' whereby existing rules are qualified to meet special cases, is a form of equity which takes on the form of judicial legislation." [70] Further, "equity, in the present context, is encompassed by Article 38(1)(c) of the statute, and not by Article 38 (2) which provides: "This provision......... shall not prejudice the power of the court to decide a case ex aequo et bono if the parties agree thereto". This power of decision ex aequo et bono involves compromise, conciliation, and legislation in a friendly settlement, whereas equity, in English sense is applied as a part of the normal judicial function." [71]

In North Sea Continental Shelf Cases,[72] the International Court also observed : "Whatever the legal reasoning of a court of justice, its decisions must definitely be just, and therefore in that sense equitable. Nevertheless, when mention is made of a court dispensing justice or declaring the law, what is meant is that the decision finds its objective justification in the consideration lying not outside but within the rules, and in this field it is precisely a rule of law that calls for the application of equitable principles. There is subsequently no question in this case of any decision ex aequo et bono such as would only be possible under the conditions prescribed by Article 38 paragraph 2, of the court's statute." [73]

---

[66] Lawrence, Principles of International Law, Seventh Edition, p. 109.

[67] In such a situation, it is the duty of jurist to resolve the dispute or conflict on the basis of reason, [See the case of the Eastern Extension, etc. Telegraph Co. Ltd., Nelson's Report, p. 75 quoted in Cory's Arbitration, p. 2261.]

[68] See Pollock, Essay in the Law, p. 64.

* See for I.A.S. (1967), Q. 1 : For answer see also matter discussed above under the heading "Reason".

[69] I.C.J. Rep. (1970), p. 3 at p. 5.

[70] Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Second Edition (1973), p. 26.

[71] Ibid, at p. 27.

[72] I.C.J. Reports, 1969, p. 3 printed at I.J.I.L., Vol. 10 (1970), pp. 67-99.

In the modern times more attention is being given to the principles of equity and justice.[74] It has been pointed out[75] that there is some evidence of the application of the principles of equity and justice. Three such areas were demonstrated in the North Sea Continental Shelf cases.[76] (1) The Practice of States in their International Relations; (2) International Customary Law and (3) the Administration of Justice.

The principles of equity and justice make their contribution in the international law-making[77] and in the codification and development of international law.[78] The principles of equity and justice have been referred again and again in the context of new International Economic Order and new law of the Sea. Following suggestions and conclusions given in a article[79] deserve mention here : (1) The role of equity in international law is a pervasive one, specific areas of application includes: (a) international customary law, (b) the administration of justice; (c) the settlement of disputes, judicial and non-judicial; (d) the practice of states ; (e) international diplomacy; (f) the structure and functioning cf international institutions; and (g) international law-making. (2) There does not exist any universal or widespread agreement regarding the precise meaning of equity......... (3) In the international system, equity as applied to a particular case, situation or circumstance, would usually turn out to mean in effect the view of a decision maker or a consensus of decision-makers as to what is reasonable and just in the particular case, situation or circumstance. (4) A principal objective of international society is to build a more equitable and just society. Law-making should reflect this principal objective of international society and should therefore be guided by the principles of equity and justice......... (5) Governments refer to equity as a flexible general standard. Its invocation is often in general terms and the consequences of its application are not set out in detailed form......... (6) The International Law Commission and the Sixth Committee are also guided by this spirit in their codification and development of International law. However, the International Law Commission, with the support of the Sixth Committee, attempts to go one stage further and to translate this spirit into actual rules. (7) In some instances equity is resorted to where it has proved difficult to agree on a more specific or precise formulation......... Recourse to formulations couched in the language of equity can help to produce agreements and in this sense equity is an important tool of international legislation."

Indeed, "Equity as a legal concept is a direct emanation of the idea of justice." This was observed by the International Court of Justice in Continental Shelf case (Thunisia/Libyen Arab Jamahuriya) and was afifrned in Frontier Dispute case (Burkina Faso v. Mali)[80].

Thus although equity, and justice have not been enumerated as sources of International law in Article 38(1) of the statute of the International Court of Justice, they play an important role in the international law-making and in the codification and progressive development of international law.

---

[73] North Sea Continental Shelf Cases, I.C.J. Reports, 1969, p. 3 printed at IJIL, Vol. 10 (1970) p. 94: See also Advisory opinion in the case of Judgements of the Administrative Tribunal of the I.L.O. upon complaints against UNESCO, I.C.J. Reports 1956, at p. 100; Corfu Channel case, I.C.J. Rep. 1949, p. 249.

[74] See B.G. Ramcharan, "Equity and Justice in International Law-Making". I.J.I.L. Vol. 15 (1975), p. 47; See also B. Cheng, "Justice and Equity in International Law". Current Legal Problems, Vol. 8 (1955), pp. 185-211; G. Schwarzenberger, "Equity in International Law", Year Book of World Affairs, Vol. 26 (1972), pp. 346-369.

[75] See Ibid, at p. 47.

[76] I.C.J. Reports 1969, p. 3.

[77] Ramcharan, note 73, at p. 48.

[78] Ibid, at pp. 49-55.

[79] Ibid, at pp. 61-62.

[80] I.C.J. (1985) Rep. 6.

Resolution and Declarations of General Assembly of the U.N. as the Source of Universal International Law.[81]—There is a great controversy in regard to the legal significance of the resolutions and declarations of the General Assembly of the United Nations. Some jurists are of the view that they are only of political significance and have no legal importance.[82] On the other hand, some jurists hold the view that under certain special circumstances they may have legal implications and some of them may even have binding effect.[83]

Ordinarily, it may be said, as Judge Jessup[84] pointed out, that the resolutions of the General Assembly are not of true legislative character, Judge Jessup has, however, pointed out that if on a particular subject many similar resolutions are passed (as on apartheid), then they indicate the contemporary international standard and the court is bound to take them into consideration while giving its decision.[85] Besides this, those resolutions which are of law-making character, serve as an important link in the development of new principles of international law.[86] Ian Brownlie has also written that the resolutions of the General Assembly are not binding upon the members but when they are related to the general rules of international law and are passed by the majority of States, they become the evidence of the view of the States.[87]

The decisions taken by the General Assembly prove to be helpful in the development of International law. These decisions are in the form of recommendations and resolutions and some of them are never implemented yet they are helpful in the agreement between States and contribute in preparing the necessary environment for the development of the rules of International law.[88] The resolutions and declarations of the General Assembly have capacity to become the sources of Universal International law.[89] In Reservation to Convention on Genocide,[90] Judge Alvarez aptly remarked, "......... they (i.e., resolutions of the General Assembly) have yet not acquired a binding character, but they may acquire if they receive the support of public opinion......" Further, "in short, the Assembly .... is tending to become an international legislative power. In order that it may actually become such a power, what is needed that governments and public opinion should give it support......". "As pointed out by Rosalyn Higgings, "Collective acts of States, repeated by and acquiesced in by sufficient numbers with sufficient frequency eventually attain the status of law." [91]

Thus we see that the resolutions and declarations may serve as important means for the development of International law. They prove to be greatly helpful in the process of treaty-making and agreements between States on various subjects. They have the capacity to become sources of Universal International law and if wisely used, they can prove to be very effective in the development of international law. In the words of Manfred Laches,[92] the then President of the International Court of Justice : "A new phenomenon in international life is the activity of this Assembly itself. I refer to your resolutions. Among the 3,000 adopted in 27 years, not a few have made history. They have become a stepping stone, a stage in the political and legal process, a factor in the development of International law." Examples of some of the important law-making resolutions of the General Assembly, according to Brownlie, are : the resolution which affirmed the principles of international law recognized by the judgment of the Nuremberg Tribunal, the resolution on prohibition of the use of nuclear weapons for war purposes, the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to colonial countries and peoples, the Declaration on permanent Sovereignty over Natural Resources and the Declaration of Legal Principal Governing Activities of States in the Exploration and use of outer-space.[93] Declaration on principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the U.N. (1970). Declaration on Inadmissibility of Intervention (1965), Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), Declaration of Principles Governing the sea-bed and ocean floor and the sub-soil thereof (1970) etc. are resolutions which belong to the same category.[94] "All these declarations are not ordinary international treaties or conventions and were not subject to ratification. Nevertheless, there is a wide consensus that these declarations actually established new rules of international law binding upon old States. This is not treaty making but a new method of creating customary international law.[95] Finally, "In a rapidly changing world the United Nations has found a method albeit restricted by the rule of unanimity or quasi-unanimity, to adopt the principles of its Charter and the rules of customary international law to the changing times with an efficiency which even its most founders did not anticipate." [96]

---

[81] See also S.K. Kapoor, "Significance of U.N. General Assembly Resolution", II S.C.J. (1972), p. 8.

[82] See J. Castaneda, Legal Effects of U.N. Resolutions (New York, N.Y., 1969), pp. 3-8.

[83] See for example, D.H.N. Johnson, "The Effect of the Resolution of the General Assembly of the U.N." BYBIL, Vol. 32 (1955-56), p. 97.

[84] See Judgment of Judge Jessup in South West African Cases (Second Phase), I.C.J. Rep. (1966), p. 6 at pp. 432, 441.

[85] Ibid., at p. 441.

[86] Leo Gross, "The United Nations and the Role of Law", Int. Orgn. (1956), p. 537 at p. 557.

[87] Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, p. 11.

[88] See BYBIL (1965-66), p. 201.

[89] Leo Gross, "Sources of Universal International Law", Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law (1972), p. 189 at p. 209.

[90] I.C.J. Rep. (1961), p. 15 at p. 59 : see also Richard A. Falk, on "the Quasi Legislative Function of the General Assembly", A.J.I.L., Vol. 60 (1966), pp. 782-791.

[91] Rosalyn Higgins, The Development of International Law Through the Political Organs of United Nations (London; Oxford University Press, 1963), p. 2, ; see also Michel Virally, "The Sources of International Law" in Sorensen, Manual, of Public International Law, p. 162.

[92] From his commemorative speech delivered at a special meeting of the U.N. General Assembly on 12 October, 1973, appearing in I.J.I.L., Vol. 14 (1974) p. 1 at p. 5.

Order of use of sources of international law

After having discussed the different sources of international law, the next important point that deserves our attention is the order in which these sources of international law are to be used. An authoritative order of the use of sources of international law is given in Article 38 of the Statute of International Court of Justice. The sources of international law have been mentioned in the said Article in the following order : (a) International Conventions, (b) Customs, (c) General principles of law recognized by civilized nations, (d) Judicial decisions and juristic opinion as subsidiary means for the determination of rules of law. The wordings of Article 38 suggest that sources are to by applied in the order in which they are mentioned and therefore treaties will take precedence over the other sources. But as pointed out by Manley O. Hudson, "Yet Article 38 did not establish a rigid hierarchy. In applying a provision in a convention, the court may have to take into account the customary law prevailing when the convention was entered into, or general principles of law, as well as judicial precedents. A distinction may also have to be drawn between the categories listed, for they are not on an equal footing while it is possible to apply conventional or a customary rule of law, it seems more proper to say that general principles of law, judicial precedents, and juristic writings have only the nature of sources from which an applicable rule may be deduced."[97]

In Nicaragua v. U.S.A.[98] the World Court by majority has taken the view that the sources of international law are not hierarchical but are necessarily complimentary and inter related.

---

[93] Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law (1973), p. 14.

[94] See Louis B. John, "The Development of the Charter of the U.N. : The Present State" in the State of International Law and Other Essays (Kluwer—The Netherlands—1973), p. 39 at pp. 50-54.

[95] Ibid at p. 52.

[96] Ibid at p. 53

[97] See Manely O. Hudson. The Permanent Court of International Justice, 1920-1942 : (New York : The Macmillan Company, 1943), p. 606.

[98] I.C.J. (1986) Rep. 14.

CHAPTER 5

HISTORY AND DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW INCLUDING SCHOOLS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW

Origin*

International Law as we find today is the product of the experience of the civilized countries of the world and the continuous growth of many centuries. "Rules which may be described as rules of International Law are to be found in the history both of ancient and medieval worlds ; for ever since men began to organise their common life in political communities they have felt the need of some system of rules, however rudimentary, to regulate their inter-community relations."[1] According to Prof. Oppenheim, "It (i.e. International law) is in its origin essentially a product of Christian civilization and began gradually to grow from the second half of the Middle Ages." [2] The claim of the European scholars that the credit of giving birth to International Law as we know today, goes to the European countries, is not correct.[3] : "The allegation of Western Jurists, Oppenheim and others that International Law originated in Europe and is the creation of Western civilization is falsified by a study of the original texts of the "Ramayana' (and of the 'Mahabharata')." [4] "It leads us nowhere to hold that modern international law is only three or four centuries old. Such an attitude is not only too legalistic, but is clearly disproved by the present practice which do take account of history." [5] In India too there can be found in the work of Kautilya in the fourth century B.C. elaborate rules for the conduct of diplomacy, as a means of avoiding conflicts, and the reception and treatment of diplomats." [6] A study of the Ramayana reveals that in the Ramayana period relations of the sovereign rulers were based on the definite rules of International law and these rules were recognised by all sovereign rulers. In his view : "These very principles are the foundation of modern international Law." [7]

Although it is true that the International Law had attained a sufficient stage of development in ancient India, yet it must be conceded, that "......... as a definite branch of jurisprudence the system which we know as International Law is modern, dating from the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, for its special character has been determined by that of the modern European State system, which was itself shaped in the ferment of renaissance and the reformation." [8]

So far as the origin of the International Law is concerned, almost all the civilized States have made their contributions in its development. In this connection the contribution of Jews, Romans, Greeks, Hindus and Muslims deserves a special mention. A brief discussion of their contribution is being given below.

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1978), Q. 1.

[1] J.L. Brierly : The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition (1963), p. 1.

[2] International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 6 ; see also P.E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (1971), p. 33.

[3] See Nagendra Singh, "India and International Law" in Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law (1972), p. 25.

[4] S.S. Dhawan, "The Ramayana II International Law in the Age of the Ramayana" National Herald Magazine, Sunday, January 21, 1971, p. 1.

[5] J.J.G. Syatauw, Some Newly Established Asian States and the Development of International Law (1961), p. 223 : see also Ibid., pp. 224-25.

[6] J.E.S. Fawcett, The Law of Nations (1968), p. 16.

[7] See Supra Note 4.

[8] J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition (1963), p. 1 ; see also Q Wright, "The Foundations for a Universal International System" in Asian States and the Development of Universal Law (1972), p. 145 at p. 162.

Contribution of Jews, Greeks, Romans, Hindus and Muslims

Jews.—A study of the ancient history reveals that the Jews had relations with other countries. Their relations with other countries were regulated and governed by certain rules. The famous slogan of the Jews "Love the Stranger for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." It is clear from this slogan that they believed in internationalism. But since they believed in monism in respect of religion, they did not treat those nations on the basis of equality which believed in dualism or plurality of Gods. The Jews strictly followed the treaties entered into by them with other countries and conferred privileges and immunities upon the diplomatic envoys. Thus the Jews made some contribution in the development of International Law in the ancient period.

Greeks.*—It is clear from the study of ancient history that when most of other States of the world were backward and less civilized, the Greek civilization was quite advanced and the Greeks had achieved great advancements in different fields. Socrates, Plato, Aristotle and other Philosophers of Greece enlightended the world through their ideas and philosophies. Greeks lived in small city-States. The mutual relations of these States were regulated and governed by some definite rules and principles. They had formulated definite laws of war and peace. They used to resolve their dispute through arbitration. Prior declaration was made before the commencement of war. There was also provision for the exchange of prisoners of war but there was a custom of ransom for the release of some types of prisoners. The Greeks had formulated many laws relating to war. Oppenheim has rightly remarked that the Greeks had shown to the world how sovereign States could live in mutual co-operation with each other like a single community.[9] It may, however, be noted that the Greeks had more talents for development of art and philosophy than for the development of law. Nevertheless, the Greeks philosophy, ideas and their practices indirectly contributed to the development of International Law.

Romans.—As compared to the Greeks, Romans were endowed with far greater talents for the development of International Law. Although, modern International Law is ordinarily regarded as dating from the 16th and 17th centuries, it cannot be denied that the Romans contributed much to the development of modern International Law. In its early period, Rome was a small city-State and had relations with other States. These relations were based on the rules of International Law. Subsequently the Roman Empire greatly expanded yet the Romans always considered themselves bound by laws and rules on the basis of laws.

Romans deserved the credit for developing the laws of war. According to them, there were two types of war—just and unjust. Main grounds of waging just wars were (i) Attack on Roman territories; (ii) Disregard or the violation of the privileges of ambassadors ; (iii) Contravention of Treaties ; and (iv) Assistance to enemy States by friendly countries of Rome. According to Romans, the modes of termination of war were (i) Through Treaty of Peace ; and (ii) Through conquest and annexation of the conquered territories. Similarly, the Romans had divided the treaties into three categories (i) Treaty of Friendship ; (ii) Treaty of Alliance ; (iii) Treaty of Hospitality. The Romans strictly adhered to the provisions of the treaty and in their view prior intimation was necessary for termination of Treaties. Thus the Romans made significant contribution in the development of International Law. "The position of Roman Law in Europe in 16th century has important bearing on the beginning of International Law." [10]

Hindus.—As pointed out earlier, some of the rules of International Law were in quite a developed stage in ancient India. A thorough study of the Ramayana, Mahabharata, Manusmriti, Kautilya's Arthashastra will justify the truthfulness of this statement. "The students of International Law will learn from a study of Balmiki Ramayana that the relations between sovereigns in the age of the Ramayana were governed by a Code of conduct based on principles which were recognised and observed by all the sovereigns ; they were rarely violated, and any attempt by an individual sovereign to violate them was condemned by the sovereign's own counsellors. These very principles are the foundation of modern International law."[11] Bhagvat Gita, which is regarded a pious religious text-book by Hindus, has not only classified just and unjust wars but has also made a vivid discussion of them. A study of Bhagvat Gita also reveals that the declaration of war before its commencement was essential. The duties of the State in administrative and external matters have been vividly discussed in Kautilya's Arthashastra. According to Kautilya, just as well as unjust means could be used in wars. The study of the Ramayana and Mahabharata reveals that during that period diplomatic agents enjoyed many privileges and immunities. International Law relating to diplomatic agents was in its developed stage, Manu had propounded many principles and rules in his Code, popularly known as Manu's Code. In his view, wars could be either just or unjust. According to him, to fight and die in a just war was a good deed indeed. In the view of Manu, deceit or poisonous weapons were prohibited in war. To kill wounded or sick soldiers in war was contrary to the rules of war. There were also definite rules relating to the treatment of prisoners of war. Thus, International Law was in a developed stage in India. Thus it may be rightly concluded that Hindus contributed much to the development of International Law.[12]

---

* See for I.A.S. (1954), Q. No. 2.

[9] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition by H. Lauterpacht, p. 75.

 See for I.A.S. (1954), Q. No. 2.

[10] J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations, Sixth Edtion (1963), p. 19.

Muslims.—The Muslim rulers of India had relations with other nations. They received the ambassadors of other States and entered into treaties with them. They had formulated some rules which governed relations with Muslim States. The Muslim rulers recognised the distinction between combatants and non-combatants and had formulated rules for according protection to women and children during war. They observed their treaties in good faith.

Development of International Law during 16th and 17th centuries

As pointed out by Brierly "............as a definite branch of jurisprudence the system of which we know as International Law is modern, dating only from sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, for its special character has been determined by that of modern European State System, which was itself shaped in the ferment of the Renaissance and the Reformation." He has, therefore, rightly added that, "some understanding of the main features of this modern State system is, therefore, necessary to an understanding of the nature of International Law."[13] The Middle Ages witnessed many obstacles in the growth of strong centralised Governments. The two main such obstacles were Feudalism and the Church. Feudalism was a formidable obstacle to the growth of the national State. The other strong influence which retarded the growth of State in the Middle Ages was the Church. However, rapid changes were taking place. A great landmark in this connection was the Treaty of Westphalia of 1648 which ended the thirty years' war of religion and was the beginning of the acceptance of new political order in Europe. Political developments were leading to the separateness and irresponsibility of every State. Meanwhile, there were certain counter-factors leading to intimate and constant relations of states with one another. According to Brierly,[14] the following were such causes : "(1) the impetus to commerce and the new route to Indies ; (2) the common intellectual background fostered by the renaissance ; (3) the sympathy felt by co-religionists in different States of one another, from which arose a loyalty transcending the boundaries of State ; (4) the common feeling of revulsion against war, caused by the savagery with which the wars of religions were waged." Further, "All these causes co-operated to make it certain that the separate

---

[11] See Supra Note 4.

[12] For a detailed study see Nagendra Singh, India and International Law (S. Chand & Co., New Delhi, 1969).

[13] J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition, p. 1.

[14] Ibid. at p. 6.

State could never be accepted as the final and perfect form of human association, and that in the modern as in the medieval world it would be necessary to recognise the existence of a wider unity. The rise of International Law was the recognition of this truth. It accepted the abandonment of the medieval idea of a world State and took instead as its fundamental postulate the existence of a number of States, secular, national and territorial ; but it denied their absolute separateness and irresponsibility, and proclaimed that they were bound to another by the supremacy of law. Thus it re-asserted the medieval concept of unity, but in a form which took account of the new political structure of Europe." [15]

Grotius, the Father of Modern Law of Nations*

Hugo Grotius was born in Holland in 1583. At the age of fifteen, he took the degree of Doctor of Laws at the University of Leyden. In 1609, his first work, Mare Liberum was published. In this book he strongly argued for freedom of the sea-going. This was very significant because at that time maritime powers were appropriating different parts of the sea. Thereafter, Grotius went to Paris and lived there for ten years and in 1625 published his most famous work, De Jure Belli ac Pacis (i.e. on the Law of War and Peace). This work earned for him permanent fame. An enlarged edition of this work was issued by him in 1631. As pointed out by Oppenheim, "The science of modern Law, of Nations commences from Grotius's work, De Jure Belli ac Pacis, because in it a fairly complete system of International Law was for the first time built up as an independent branch of the science of law." [16] De Jure Belli ac Pacis has following four main characteristics : (i) In the first place, Grotius advocated that States should also be subject to the same rules which regulate the individuals ; (ii) secondly he formulated the 'law of peace' which subsequently became the basis of his whole system ; (iii) thirdly he contended that States violating the law may be punished by other States, (iv) fourthly in his view natural law (i.e., right reason) was the basis for determining rules for the rightful conduct of States.[17]

Much of the credit of secularising the concept of natural law goes to Grotius. He expounded the secularised concept of the law of nature. According to him natural law was the "dictate of right reason." [18] "While Grotius did not ignore positive law, which he called 'voluntary law', he kept it distinct from the rules which he took from natural law and he felt it to be of minor importance. He did not originate the concept of natural law, for that was very old but his formulation of the rules of State conduct he felt rested upon or sprang from natural law upon such acceptance by other legal writers dominated thinking on international law for two centuries." [19] Grotius's work, De Jure Belli ac Pacis, became very famous also because of the time in which it was published and the circumstances that were prevailing at that time. There were a number of independent States in Europe. These States had certain common interests and aims which knitted them into a community of States. "Since a Law of Nations was now a necessity, since many principles of such a law were already more or less recognised and appeared again among the doctrines of Grotius, since the system of Grotius supplied a legal basis to most of those international relations which were at the time considered as lacking such a basis. The book of Grotius obtained such a world-wide influence that he is correctly styled the "Father of the Law of Nations." [20] But as rightly pointed out by Brierly, "Few books have won so great a reputation as the De

---

[15] J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition, pp. 6-7.

* See for I.A.S. Exams, (1974), Q. No. 1(d) ; (1972), Q. No 2 ; (1967) Q. No. 2 ; (1959) Q. No. 1 ; (1957) Q. No. 1 ; see also for P.C.S. (1988) Q. 10 (b).

[16] International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 89.

[17] See Cornelius Van Vallenhoven, "Hugo Grotius", Encyclopaedia of the Social Sciences (New York : The Macmillan Company, 1937), VII, p. 177.

[18] He defined natural law in the following words : "The dictate of right reason, indicating that an act, from its agreement or disagreement with the rational and social nature of man, has in its moral turpitude or moral necessity and consquently that such an act is either forbidden or commanded by God the author of nature."

[19] Norman D. Palmer and Howard C. Perkins, International Relations (Third Indian Edition, 1970), pp. 279-80.

[20] Oppenheim, Supra Note 16, at pp. 84-85 ; emphasis added.

jure belli ac pacis, but to regard its author as the 'founder' of international law is to exaggerate its originality and to do less than justice to the writers who preceded him ; neither Grotius, nor any other single writer, can properly be said to have 'founded' the system. The reputation of the book was not wholly due to its own merits though these are great ; it was partly due to the time and circumstances of its publication. When he wrote it in 1625 Grotius was already so eminent that anything from his pen would have attracted attention." [21]

According to Judge Lauterpacht, there are a number of factors which in a sense, are external to the substance of Grotius's teaching and which had a share in securing its contemporaneous success and its place in the succeeding centuries. He points out the following four reasons : (1) The timeliness of the publication of his book, De Jure Belli ac Pacis, (2) De Jure Belli ac Pacis was the most comprehensive and systematic treatise on international law ever published up to that date. (3) Thirdly, substantial portion of the treatise was devoted to matters which had little to do with international law for example the treatise to a great dealt with constitutional law, the theory of state, and the basis of legal and political obligation and jurisprudence. But this very circumstance proved 'weighty contributory factor' in the success which the treaties achieved. It must, however, be noted that though International Law properly forms merely a part, it definitely is the important of the treatise. (4) Lastly, the contemporaneous success of the treatise was to some extent due to the great reputation which Grotius had at that time already earned. It may also be noted as pointed out by Lauterpacht, "principal and characteristic features of De Jure Belli ac Pacis are identical with the fundamental and persistent problems of international law and that nearly in all of them the teaching of Grotius has become identified with the progression of international law to a true system of law both in its ethical content.

Grotius was also indebted, to some extent, to his fore-runners such as Lagnamo, Prof. of Law in the University of Bologna, Belli (1502-1575), Brunus (14-1-1563), Vitorial (1480-1546), Ayala (1548-1584), Suarez (1548-1617) and Gentilis (1552-1608). Italian jurist, Gentilis deserves a special mention here. His works, Legationibus and Commentationes de Jure Belli, were published in 1588 and 1589, respectively. "Gentilis's book, De Jure Belli, supplies, as Professor Holland shows, the model and the framework of the first and third book of Grotiu's De Jure Belli ac Pacis, 'The first step'—Holland rightly says—"towards making International Law was taken, not by Grotius, but by Gentilis." "Although Grotius owes much to Gentilis, he is nevertheless the greater of the two, and bears by right the title of 'Father of the Law of Nations." [22] As compared to Gentilis's contribution for the development of International Law that of Grotius is far greater. To conclude in the words of Oppenheim,[23] "Grotius, as a child of his time, could not help starting from the Law of Nature, since his intention was to find such rules of Nations as were eternal, unchangeable and independent of the special consent of the single States... the system of the Law of Nature which Grotius built up and from which he started when he commenced to build up the Law of Nations, became the most important and gained the greatest influence as the Father of the Law of Nations.

Whatever may have been the changing fortunes of the doctrine of Law of Nature, the fact remains that for more than two hundred years after Grotius, jurists, philosophers and theologians firmly believed in it. But for the system of the Law of Nature and the doctrines of its prophets, modern Constitutional Law and the modern Law of Nations would not be what they actually are. The Law of Nature supplied the crutches with whose help history has taught mankind to walk out of the institutions of the Middle Ages into those of modern times."*

---

[21] Brierly, See supra note 13 at p. 28.

[22] Oppenheim, Supra Note 16, at p. 91.

[23] Ibid, at pp. 92-93.

* See for P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 1 ; I.A.S. (1958), Q. No. 1.

Development of International Law during 18th century—Contribution of Naturalists and Positivists.*

17th and 18th centuries are conspicuous for giving birth to three different schools of International Law, namely, the Naturalists, the Positivists and the Grotians.

Contribution of Naturalists and Postivists.—The views of the naturalists and positivists and their contribution for the development of International Law have been discussed in detail in Chapter 2 under the heading 'Basis of International Law.' So please see the discussion under the said heading for a critical discussion of the contribution of Naturalists and Positivist.

Grotians.—As pointed out earlier, Grotius was an eminent jurist and contributed much to the development of International Law. He has the credit of secularsing the concept of natural law. He defined natural law as "the dictate of right reason, indicating that an act, from its agreement with the rational and social nature of man has in it moral turpitude of moral necessity, and consequently that such an act is either forbidden or commended by God, the author of nature."

Grotius contributed much for the development of International Law. The followers of Grotius were called Grotians. The more famous among them were Vattel and Christian Wolf. According to Grotians, International Law has originated not only from natural law but customs and treaties are also its sources. Thus, according to Grotians, International Law is the product of natural law as well as customs and treaties. As pointed out by Oppenheim, "The Grotians stand midway between the Naturalists and Positivists. They keep up Grotius's distinction between the natural and voluntary Law of Nations, but in contradistinction to Grotius, they consider the positive or voluntary of equal importance to the natural, and they devote, therefore, interest to both alike." [24]

Distinction Among the Naturalists, Positivists and Grotians

Naturalists were those writers who were of the view that Law of Nations is only a part of the Law of Nature. They deny that there is any positive Law of Nations. In their view, States obey International Law which is nothing but Law of Nature (applied in different circumstances) which is higher law. The most prominent naturalists who deserve a special mention were Pufendorf, Christian Thomasius, Francis Hutcheson, Thomas Rutherforth and Jean Jacques Burlamaqui. According to Pufendorf, no positive Law of Nations having the force of law exists. The Positivists, on the other hand, contended that it was the positive Law of Nations which had real force of law. According to them, positive Law of Nations was the outcome of custom and International Treaties. During the seventeenth century, the positivists could not exert much influence. Positivism became very popular in the eighteenth century. During the seventeenth century, naturalists and Grotians were in vogue. The Positivists claimed to have based their theory on the actual practice of States and laid emphasis on law positivum, i.e. which is law in fact. They emphasized law which is as distinct from law which ought to be. In their view, therefore, law enacted by appropriate legislative authority is binding. The prominent Positivists of the eighteenth century were Cornelius, Moser and Martens.

As regards the Grotians, as it has been pointed out earlier that they stood in between the naturalists and the positivists. They maintained the distinction between the natural and voluntary Law of Nations as expounded by Grotius but in contradistinction to Grotius, they gave equal importance to natural and the positive or voluntary Law of Nations. In their view, International Law is the outcome of the Law of Nature as well as custom and International Treaties. Thus they had shared certain things with both the Naturalists and the positivists but differed with them in so far as they gave equal importance to the natural and voluntary Law of Nations. The most prominent among the Grotians were Christian Wolff (1679-1754) and Emerich de Vattel (1714-1767).

---

* See for P.C.S. (1965), Q. No. 7(d).

[24] See Supra Note 16, at p. 98

 See for I.A.S. (1960), Q. No. 1 ; For further elaboration see also "Theories As to Law of Nature" and "Positivism Discussed in Chapter 2".

It may be noted that in the nineteenth century it was the positivism which triumphed. As pointed out by Oppenheim, "When the nineteenth century opens, the three schools of the Naturalists, the Positivists and the Grotians are still in the field, but positivism gains slowly and gradually the upper hand ...... positivism was victorious at the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth. In denying the validity of sources of International Law other than the will of States it constituted yet another manifestation of the extreme doctrine of State sovereignty which, at that time, was typical of the science of law and of politics. So uncompromising was the positivist attitude that it denied the character of science to any other than the purely positive Law of Nations." [25] It may, however, be noted that "......rigid positivism can no longer be regarded as being in accordance with existing International Law. Probably ...... the Grotian school comes nearest to expressing correctly the present legal position." [26] Thus there seems to be a revival of the Law of Nature. Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice by recognising 'General Principles of Law Recognized by Civilized Nations as a source of International Law has sounded a 'death-knell' of rigid positivism.

Transformation of 'European International Law' into Law of Nations or International Law.* —As noted earlier, modern international law is determined by modern European System. In the beginning, International Law regulated the relations of a few old Christian States of Western Europe and comprised of the customs recognised and treaties entered into by such States. Later on other Christian States joined the Family of Nations and hence during that time it was often called 'European Law of Nations'. In the next stage, certain Christian States outside Europe joined the Family of Nations. America was the most important of such States. Most of such States were previously the colonies of European States. In the next stage of the development of international law, certain non-Christian States joined the Family of Nations. The admission of Turkey into the Family of Nations marked the beginning of this stage. "With the reception of Turkey into the Family of Nations in 1856 International Law ceased to be a law between Christian States only." [27] Turkey was received into the Family of Nations expressly through Article 7 of the Treaty of Paris, 1856. But it was not until 1923 that Turkey was recognised as full-fledged member of the Family of Nations. After Turkey, other non-Christian states including Japan and India joined the family of Nations. The last stage of the development of International Law in this respect was witnessed after the First World War when a number of non-Christian States along with the Christian States joined the League of Nations. Several other non-Christian States such as Egypt, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, and Syria took part in San Francisco Conference. At present no distinction is made between Christian and non-Christian States. Since 1945 (when U.N. Charter was signed and ratified by 51 States) the Family of Nations has more than trebled. The U.N. now comprises of 166 States which may swell to 174 in a near future.

Development of International Law during 19th and 20th centuries :

There were many factors which led to the development of Law in 19th and 20th centuries. The relation of the State and their mutual contacts had greatly increased during the said period and many rules and principles were formulated on the basis of the practice of States and the needs and requirements of the changing times and circumstances. We will discuss them under the following headings :—

(1) Congress of Vienna, 1815.—The Congress of Vienna, 1815, was a landmark event for the development of International law. It was the first important European conference where many rules of International law were formulated, e.g. rules relating to International rivers, classification of diplomatic agents, etc.

(2) Declaration of Paris, 1856.—The Declaration of Paris was a law-making treaty in which many rules relating to the naval warfare were laid down. Attack on undefended

---

[25] Oppenheim, See supra note 16, at pp. 106-7.

[26] Ibid. at p. 107.

* See also for I.A.S. (1956), Q. 1 ; For answer see also matter discussed under the heading 6, Emergence of Large Number of New States in Chapter 1 and Chapter on "Subjects of International Law."

[27] Oppenheim, note 16, at p. 49.

people during naval war was prohibited. It was also laid that enemy ships could be sunk or otherwise destroyed during war but before doing so, precautions should be taken to save the life of the crew of the ship.

(3) Geneva Convention, 1864.—Many rules relating to the wounded and sick members of the armed forces during land warfare were laid down in Geneva Convention of 1864. Killing of wounded soldiers was prohibited and rules were made for providing certain facilities to them.

(4) Hague Conferences of 1899 and 1907.—Hague Conferences of 1899 and 1907 are rightly reckoned as great landmarks relating the development of International Law. They resulted in the adoption of several conventions on various subjects of International concern. These conferences emphasized the settlement of International disputes through peaceful means. Many rules of International Law relating to land warfare and naval warfare were formulated. Bombardment over undefended people was declared illegal. Endeavour was also made to determine the limits of armaments and to achieve ultimately disarmament. Duties and rights of neutral States during naval war were also clearly laid down. Yet another great contribution of the Hague Conferences was the establishment of the Permanent Court of Arbitration. It was a landmark event in the history of the development of International Law. It contributed much in the development of International Law. It contributed much in the attainment of the objective of International Law to settle international disputes through peaceful means.

(5) The League of Nations.—After the First World War, the nations of the world felt the need of an International organisation which might be able not only to regulate amicably the mutual relations among the nations but could also prevent future wars. The League of Nations was established under the Treaty of Versailles, 1919. The League of Nations, for the first time, imposed certain restrictions upon the nations' right to resort to war at their will. The Covenant of the League of Nations provided, that before resorting to war, they would first settle their disputes through arbitration, judicial settlement, or enquiry by council. It was also provided that even if their disputes were not solved through these means, they would not go to war until the lapse of three months after such failure. It was further laid down that a member of the League going to war in violation or disregard of the provisions of the Covenant would be deemed to be the enemy of the whole League of Nations. Yet another great achievement of the Legaue of Nations was the establishment of the Permanent Court of International Justice which contributed much to the progressive development of International Law. The covenant of League of Nations was in fact a law-making International Treaty. It was the auspcious beginning of a good trend. "Since the establishment of League of Nations the development of International law has been accomplished primarily through the creation of International organisations by law-making treaties and the conclusion of law-making treaties through International organisations."[28]

(6) Treaty of Locarno of 1925.—France, Britain, Germany and Italy, etc., concluded the Treaty of Locarno whereby Germany, France and Belgium undertook the obligation of not using force in the settlement of their boundary disputes. The parties to the treaty also expressed their resolve to settle their disputes through peaceful means. Germany, however, refused in 1936 to follow the provisions of this Treaty.

(7) Kellog-Briand or Paris Pact of 1928.—This pact was a landmark in so far as the parties to it renounced war as an instrument of their national policy for the settlement of international disputes. It was a very significant International event for regulation over war.

(8) Geneva Convention, 1929.—This convention was signed by 47 States of the world. Many rules relating to the treatment of prisoners of war were laid down in this convention. Reprisal against prisoners of war, cruelty towards them and collective penalties against them were prohibited. Rules were also formulated for providing medical and other facilities to the prisoners of war.

(9) Second World War.—Almost all the above-mentioned rules of International Law were flagrantly violated during the Second World War which turned into a 'total war'. It, however, sowed the seeds of a future world organisation because the devastating effects and hair-splitting experiences of the war once more compelled the nations of the world to make their attempts afresh to establish an International organisation which may ensure lasting peace to the world and establish rule of law in the International field. Consequently, the Second World War indirectly led to the eventual establishment of the United Nations.

---

[28] Edward Collins, International Law in Changing World (1969), p. 426.

(10) *The United Nations.—The United Nations Charter came into force on October 24, 1945 and thus the United Nations was established. In the beginning the number of its members was only 51 which has now swelled to 193. The United Nations is an International treaty which regulates the mutual relations of its members. The development of International Law received a great impetus under the United Nations. Article 13, Paragraph 1 (a) of the Charter provides that the General Assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of promoting international co-operation in the political field and "encouraging the progressive development of International Law and its codification". For this purpose, the General Assembly established the International Law Commission which conducts study and research in different aspects of International Law and submits its reports to the General Assembly. At an early stage attempts were made to set a dividing line between the 'progressive development' and 'codification.' But as remarked by Manfred Lachs, President of the International Court of Justice in his commemorative speech delivered at special meeting of the U.N. General Assembly on 12th October, 1973... "it has become clear that the two processes—progressive development and codification—far from being mutually exclusive, in fact merge. It was found, as was bound to happen, that in some domains the distinction established between the two activities could hardly be maintained."[29] Further "the International Law Commission has performed its task with great distinction. Declarations have been enunciated, important principles have been formulated, new conventions have been drafted, and the ways and means for making evidence of customary law more readily available received the attention of the Commission also."[30] It has also prepared draft articles of several conventions and treaties which have been eventually adopted. It has thus creditably performed the task of assisting the General Assembly in "encouraging the progressive development of International Law and its codification." The more important of such treaties and conventions are Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961, Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969, Vienna Convention on State Succession in respect of Treaties, 1978, U.N. Convention Against Removal of All Sorts of Discrimination Against Women, International Convention on Protection and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons (including Diplomatic Agents), 1973, International Convention on Representatives of International Institutions, 1975,. International Convention on State Property, Archives and Debts, 1983, U.N. Convention on the Law of Sea, 1982, International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, International Convention for the Suppression of Financing of Terrorism, 1999, International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism, 2005.

Thus after the establishment of the United Nations the development of International Law has been effected mainly through multilateral law-making treaties. The chief objective of International Law is to establish the rule of law in International field and to ensure the maintenance of international peace and security. It is possible only when it adopts itself to the changing times and circumstances. In the words of Edward Collins : "It is equally clear that if International Law is to serve this purpose effectively, it must be continuously developed by revision in content, expansion of scope and improvement of the securing compliance, so that it is kept in accord with the changing needs of the international community." To conclude in the words of Manfred Lachs. "...... it is true that only gradually international law has acquired new dimensions. It has followed man's foot-steps throughout his journey in time and space. It has followed him in his explorations when he crossed oceans and landed on new shores. Such ventures brought Europeans into contact with alien civilizations, giving rise to confrontations, inter alia, concerning the nature of the law of nations as seen through different eyes. Owing to the great strides in relations between States, in science and technology, international law has extended its rules until it embraces today all nations in their contracts and into whatever domains and dimensions their activities extend."[31]

---

* See also for C.S.E. (1996) Q. 5(b).

[29] "The Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the International Law Commission", I.J.I.L. Vol. (1974), p. 1 at p. 2.

[30] Ibid, at p. 3.

Review of International Law during the Second Millennium

N.B.—For this please see Chapter 1 entitled "Introduction"

Challenges before International Law during the Third Millennium—

N.B.—For this also please see Chapter 1 entitled "Introduction".

Schools of International Law

The main Schools of International Law which deserve mention are following :

(1) Natural Law School, (2) Grotian School, (3) Positivist School, (4) The so-called Anglo-American and Continental School of Thought in International Law.

(1) Natural Law School.—The view points of naturalists has already been discussed earlier under the heading "Distinction Among Naturalist, Positivists and Grotians'

[N.B.—For a further discussion please see also matter discussed above under the heading "Theories as to Law of Nature" and "influence of Natural Law" in chapter 2 entitled, "Definition, Nature and Basis of International Law"].

(2) Grotian School.—This has been briefly discussed earlier under the heading "Grotians" but it needs further elaboration here. The main features of Grotian tradition, as summarised and explained by Lauterpacht in one of his articles are following :

(i) The subjection of totality of International relation to the rule of law.—The central theme and the main characteristic of Grotians' treaties that Grotius conceives of the totality of the relations between states as governed by law.

(ii) The acceptance of the Law of Nature as an indepedent source of international law.—According to Grotius, law which was binding upon states is not solely the product of their express will. He advocated and emphasized the Law of Nature as an independent source of international law. By securing the concept of law of nature, Grotius enhanced authority and dignity by making it an integral part of international law. "By doing this, he laid, more truly than any writer before him, the foundation of international law."

(iii) The affirmation of the social nature of man as the basis of law of nature.—According to Grotius, the social nature of man was the basis of the law of nature. He defined natural law as the dictate of right reason, indicating that an act, from its agreement or disagreement with the relation and social nature of man has in its moral turpitude or moral necessity, and consequently that such an act is either forbidden or commanded by God, the author of nature.

(iv) The recognition of the essential identity of States and Individual.—At the end of the nineteenth century, Weslake, observed : "The society of States ...... is the most comprehensive form of Society among men, but it is among men that it exists. States are its immediate men ultimate members. The duties and rights are only the duties and rights of men who compose them." But it was Grotius who was the first to have recognised the essential identity of states and individuals and advocated that rules and principles applicable upon individual should also be applied upon states.

(v) The rejection of the reason of state.—Yet another characteristic feature of Grotius teaching was his denial of the 'reason of State' as a basic and decisive factor of international relations.

(vi) The distinction between just and unjust Wars.—Grotius denied the states of the absolute right of war for he emphasized the distinction between just and unjust wars. According to him, a just war is one which is fought for a just cause. It need not be overemphasized here that Grotius deserves full credit for emphasizing this distinction between just and unjust war which was later on further developed under the Covenant of the League of Nations, the Pact of Paris of 1928 and finally, the charter of the United Nations.

---

[31] "The Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the International Law Commission", I.J.I.L. Vol. 14 (1974), p. 1 at p. 4.

(vii) The doctrine of qualified Neutrality.—The distinction between just and unjust war led Grotius to enunciate the doctrine of qualified neutrality. According to Grotius, "It is the duty of those who keep out of war to do nothing whereby he who supports a wicked cause may be rendered more powerful, or where by the movements of him who wages an unjust war may be hampered." These duties, however, did not include the positive obligation to assist actively the state fighting a just war. Thus, as remarked by Lauterpacht, "with the drastic limitation of the right of war as adopted in the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the General Treaty for the Renunciation of War, the law restored the historic foundations of qualified neutrality as taught by Grotius."

(viii) The binding force of promises.—Grotius emphasized the binding force of promises and held the view that obligation to abide by pacts of the essence of social contract. In modern terminology, it is referred as pacta sunt servanda but it is pointed out that the ultimate source of legal obligation cannot logically, be explained in terms of law, Grotius held the view that law of nature was the binding force of the Law of Nations.

(ix) The fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual.—Though it appears alien to the spirit of this teaching, Grotius must be given some share on the development of the concept of fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual. He advocated the right of the individual to refuse to carry arms in an unjust war and championed his claims such as right of expatriation, the rights of economic freedom, right to have plebiscite for transfer of part of national territory.

(x) The idea of peace.—Though he did not deny the right of the state to wage war, he advocated the idea of peace and proposed various methods for the settlement of disputes such as negotiation and arbitration.

(xi) The tradition of idealism and progress.—Grotian tradition is a tradition of idealism and progress. "He initiated or gave support to progressive ideas in various fields in the sphere of international relations. He was one of the first to assist the suppression of crime by urging extradition of criminals as a matter of legal duty. He did more than any of the other founders of international law in developing theory and elucidating the practice of diplomatic immunities. He supplied the basis of modern law of state responsibility founded on fault as distinguished from absolute liability and thus helped to displace the undiscriminating and a chronic practice of reprisals as a normal means of redressing grievances. He urged, and laid down as a rule of law, the principle of freedom of navigation on international rivers and canals. His share in the evolution of the principle of the freedom of the seas needs no elaboration. In all these matters his teaching became part of international practice, wholly or in part. In others, although it has remained a mere postulate or reason, it is not without significance."

To quote Judge Lauterpacht again, "Some of these elements of the Grotian tradition have now become part of the positive law ; others are still an aspiration. But they explain why Grotius's work has remained an abiding force and not merely an episode, however important, in the literature of international law, they explain why writers and statesmen have turned to Grotius not only as a source of the evidence of the law as it is, but also as a well-spring of faith in the law as it ought to be : Grotius did not create international law. Law is not made by writers : What Grotius did was to endow international law with unprecedented dignity and authority by making it part not only of a general system of jurisprudence but also a Universal moral code ...... De Jure Belli ac Pacis is pre-eminently a treatise which must be judged not by reference to its method but by its influence on the doctrine and on the practice of the Law of Nations : It satisfied the craving in jurist and layman alike, for a moral content in the law. In stressing and, on the whole, maintaining the distinction between law and morality, it vindicated the place of the Law of Nations in legal science : Last but not the least—it became identified with the idea of progress in international law."

The followers of Grotius were called Grotians. The contribution of the Grotians and their distinction with the Naturalistis and Positivists has been discussed briefly earlier in this chapter under the headings "Grotians and Distinction Among the Naturalists, Positivists and Grotians."

(3) Positivist School of law.—The positivists believe in law postivum i.e. law which is fact or that law enacted by appropriate legislative authority is law which exists in fact and is binding. They emphasize law which is in fact as distinct from law which ought to be, the chief characteristic of Law of Nature. Applied to international law, positivists defend the existence of a positive Law of Nations as the outcome of custom or international treaties. A brief reference may be made here to Richard Zourche (1590-1660), Professor of Civil Law at Oxford and a Judge of the Admiralty Court. His book which appeared in 1650 and called the first manual of the positive Law of Nations, earned for him the title of 'Second founder of the Law of Nations'. As pointed out by Oppenheim, "The stand point of Zouche is totally different from that of Grotius in so far as, according to him the customary Law of Nations is the most important part of that law, although as a child of that time, he does not at all deny the existence of a natural Law of Nations ...... The distinction between the natural Law of Nations, chiefly treated by Grotius, and the customary or voluntary Law of Nations, chiefly treated by Zouche gave rise in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries to three different schools of writers on the Law of Nations—namely, the 'Naturalists' the 'Positivists' and the 'Grotians'." Further, "The 'Positivists' are the antipodes of the Naturalists. They include all those writers who, in contradistinction to Hobbes and Pufendorf, not only defend the existence of a positive Law of Nations as the outcome of custom or international treaties, but consider it more important than the natural Law of Nations, the very existence of which some of the Positivists deny, thus going beyond Zouche. The Positivist writers had not much influence in the seventeenth century in which the Naturalists and Grotians carried the day, but their time came in the eighteenth century."

[N.B.—For further discussion see also matter discussed above under the heading, Distinctions Among the Naturalists, Positivists and Grotians." See also matter discussed under the heading 'Positivism' in chapter 2].

(4) The so-called Anglo-American and Continental Schools of thought in International Law.—Some writers have expressed the view that there exist in international law two different schools of thought, the Anglo-American and the continental. Lord Hailsham, the then Lord Chancellor, Prof. Pearce Higgins, Sir John Fischer Wiliams, and Prof. Brierly subscribed to this view which became prevalent in some countries, particularly, England and America. The writers who subscribed to this view in fact based their view on the difference between the Anglo-American and continental practice in respect of certain specific matters relating to the Law of Peace, Law of Peace and doctrines of Municipal Law of possible relevance in International Law.

As regards the Law of Peace, clear examples of topics in respect of which difference existed were those relating to jurisdiction over foreign ships in national waters and jurisdiction over aliens. In respect of the jurisdiction over foreign ships Judge Lauterpacht has rightly observed that the divergence in this respect has been shown to be "a matter of form rather than of substance." Further, "The lawyer surveying this part, of international law will be impressed both by large measure of uniformity with which its rules are understood, and applied throughout the world and by the fact that such differences as exist, far from being reducible to a clash of Anglo-American and continental ideas, over their origin and preservation to altogether different reasons." While in some European Countries like France and Italy, the jurisdictional immunities of diplomatic envoys or public ships are granted on the basis of the question whether the activities in question are of public or private character. But this practice is not followed in Germany. On the other hand, courts in Britain and America do not consider the character of the State activity in question as relevant. As regards jurisdiction over aliens in respect of crimes committed abroad, English and American law do not assume jurisdiction but jurisdiction is assumed by the law of Italy, Turkey, China and Mexico. However, Germany, Spain, France, the Netherlands etc. follow Anglo-American practice in this respect. Therefore it is not proper to say that Anglo-American practice is different from the continental countries.

As regards the Law of War, it is pointed out that differences exist in respect of matters such as blockade and enemy character. According to the practice prevalent in Britain and America, a blockade, breaking vessel was liable to seizure when the master had actual or constructive knowledge of the blockade. On the other hand, in continental countries an actual attempt to break the line of blockade was considered necessary for the infliction of punishment. But in the course of World War most of these differences disappeared as the result of reprisals frequently resorted to, the doctrine of continuous voyage and the extension of the list of contraband goods. Yet another example of the difference pointed out is in respect of enemy character. In U.K., U.S. Japan, Netherlands and Spain, both nationality and domicile were considered relevant for determining enemy character. On the other hand, enemy character was determined on the basis of nationality of the owner in France, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Italy and Russia. But as pointed out by Lauterpacht, "in view of the character of the measures adopted by Great Britain by way of its reprisals and otherwise, the question of enemy character lost much of its importance in relation to liability to capture, it remained important in regard to municipal legislation concerning trading with enemy. It was in this respect that both France and Great Britain, the representative countries of the 'two schools' abandoned their respective position held before the war and cumulative the two tests."

To conclude in the words of Judge Lauterpacht, "...there is no substance in the view that there exist two schools of international law, the Anglo-American and continental either in regard to specific question of International law, or in respect of differences in those questions of municipal law which are of possible relevance in international law, or in the matter of general approach and method. The work of international tribunals shows that international judicial settlement, far from being impeded by the alleged existence of 'two schools of thought' is not actually confronted with the problem. An analysis, ... of the work of the Permanent Court of Justice in general and as the dissenting opinion and observation appended to the Judgments and Advisory Opinions, and observations would show that the question has not arisen there at all."

CHAPTER 6

CODIFICATION AND PROGRESSIVE DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL LAW*

Meaning and definition :

By the term codification we ordinarily mean the process reducing the whole body of law into Code in the form of enacted law. It generally connotes a systematic arrangement of the rules of law which are already in existence. According to Sir H. Lauterpacht, "......The task of codifying International Law, if it is to mean anything, must be primarily one of bringing about an agreed body of rules already covered by customary or conventional agreement of State." [1] But this is the narrow meaning of the term 'Codification.' In its wider sense, it may also mean modification of the existing rules of law ; so as to keep them pace with time and adapt them in accordance with the needs of time. "There is a school of thought which holds that codification in the proper sense of the word can only mean writing down of already existing rules ; though it usually has to be conceded that in practice even a strict codification in this sense may involve the making of few minor changes in the law...... To adopt too strict a definition of the process involved is therefore to defeat the very ends for which the machinery is to be employed." [2] "Codification means any systematic statement of the whole or part of the law in written form, and that it does not necessarily imply a process which leaves the main substance of law unchanged, even though this may be true of some cases. In other words, codification properly conceived is itself a method of the progressive development of law." [3] "...The two processes—progressive development and codification, far from being mutually exclusive, in fact merge." [4]

Reference may also be made here to Article 15 of the Statute of the International Law Commission which provides that "the expression "progressive development of International Law" is used for convenience as meaning the preparation of draft conventions on subjects which have not yet been regulated by international law or in regard to which the law yet has not been sufficiently the very ends for which the machinery is to be employed." [2] Therefore, "Codification of International Law" is used for convenience as meaning the more precise formulation and systematization of rules of international law in fields where there already has been extensive State practice, precedent and doctrine. It may be noted that "Mere codification without the element of progressive development would defeat the very purpose of law-making by introducing a static concept of law. Thus it is now well recognized by all codifying institutions to consider equally the developmental aspect while engaged in the codification of the law. In fact progressive development is the very life and blood of codification...... In short, therefore, the first essential ingredient of codification is furnished by the aspect relating to 'progressive development' which must always remain the very pith of this theme. This must necessarily be so if the legislative function has at all to be performed for the international community so essential for the maintenance of world public order." [5]

---

* See for P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 4 ; P.C.S. (1971), Q. No. 2 and P.C.S. (1964), Q. No. 3(a).

[1] Codification and Development of International Law, A.J.I.L. Vol. 49 (1955), p. 16 at p. 22.

[2] R.Y. Zennings, "The Progressive Development of International Law and its Codification, BYBIL, Vol. XXIV (1947), p. 301 at p. 302.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Manfred Lachs, "The Twenty-Fifth Anniversary of the International Law Commission", I.J.I.L. Vol. 14 (1974), p. 1 at p. 2 ; see also R.S. Pathak, Law Commission in the Codification and Progressive Development of International Law", I.J.I.L. Vol. XVII (1977), p. 1 at p. 2.

[5] Judge Nagendera Singh, "Codification and Progressive Development of International Law : The Role of the International Court of Justice." I.J.I.L., Vol. 18 (1978), p. at pp. 2-3.

History of codification.—The history of codification dates back to the end of the 18th century when the idea of codification of international law was conceived by Bentham. Before him an unsuccessful attempt was made by the French Convention to draw up a declaration of the Rights of Nations in 1792.

Declaration of Paris, 1856.—The Declaration of Paris occupies a place of significance in the development of International Law. This Declaration was signed by Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Turkey, Prussia and Sardinia after the end of the Cremean War in 1856. This declaration laid down the principles relating to (a) abolition of privateering ; (b) non-capture of neutral goods except contraband of war, under enemy flags ; (c) Blockade to be binding must be effective ; and (d) except contraband of war, enemy goods cannot be captured under neutral flag.

Codification by individual writers.—Some individual writers also contributed to the codification of International Law. The first important attempt in this connection was made in 1861 by an Austrian jurist, Alfons Von Domin-Petrushnveez who for the first time showed the possibility or the codification of International Law. In 1863, Prof. Trancis Liber of Columbia University Law School, New York, attempted to codify the laws of war. Besides this, Swiss Jurist Bluntshii in 1868, David Dudley Field in 1872, Levi in 1887, Italian Jurist Paspuale Fiore in 1890, E. Duplexis in 1906 and Jerome Internescia in 1911 published their Codes of International Law. Moreover Oppenheim, Hall, Phillimmore and Hyde also deserve the credit of bringing out the rules of International Law in a systematised form of a Code.

The Two Hague Conferences.—The First Hague Conference, which was convened by Emperor Nicholas II of Russia in 1899 resulted in the adoption of following two conventions in the form of a Code : (a) Convention on the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes ; and (b) Convention on the Laws and Customs of War on land. These conventions proved to be great milestones in the field of codification of International Law. Being encouraged with the results of the First Hague Conference, the Second Hague Conference was convened in 1907. This conference produced as many as thirteen conventions relating to warfare and neutrality in war on land and sea, the status of enemy merchantmen at the outbreak of war, bombardment by naval forces, conversion of merchantships into men-of-war. This conference was attended by 44 States.

Declaration of London.—A naval conference was held in 1909 at London to draw up an agreed list of contraband goods. The agreement reached was incorporated in a Declaration known as Declaration of London, 1909. But it never came into force as it was not ratified. It lost all its importance on account of the development of First World War, 1914, into a total war.

Codification under the League of Nations.—The work of codification of International Law received a great impetus under the League of Nations. "It was left to the League of Nations, to approach in a systematic manner the problem of codification properly called." [6] The League Council appointed a Committee of sixteen Jurists in 1924 to report to Council subjects which were ripe for codification. The Committee recommended that the following subjects were ripe for codification : (1) Nationality ; (2) Territorial waters ; (3) State responsibility for damage done in their territory to the persons or property of foreigners ; (4) Diplomatic immunities and privileges ; (5) Procedure of International Conference and Procedure for the conclusion and drafting of treaties ; (6) Exploitation of the products of the sea ; and (7) Piracy. On the recommendation of the said Committee, the Assembly decided that a conference should be held at Hague for the purpose of codifying the topics of (a) nationality ; (b) territorial waters ; and (c) responsibility of States for the damage done to foreigner in their territories. The Committee of experts did not cease its work ; it continued its work and reported in 1928 to the Council that the following two topics were also ripe for codification : (1) Law relating to functions and competence of Consuls ; and (2) the competence of courts regarding foreign States.

---

6. L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 60.

The Hague Codification Conference of 1930.—Hague Conference of 1930 may be said to be the first conference on the codification of International Law. Three committees were set up for each of the topics, i.e. nationality, territorial waters and responsibility of States for the damage done to foreigners in their territories. No general agreement could be reached in regard to territorial waters and responsibility of States for the damage done in their territories to the property and person of foreigners. But the Committee on nationality adopted several conventions on questions relating to the conflict of Nationality Laws and Statelessness.

Codification under the United Nations.*—Article 13(1) (a) of the U.N. Charter lays down that the General Assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of "promoting international co-operation in the political field" and "encouraging the progressive development of International Law and its codification." "The most important task of codification is the systematisation and the progressive development of this amorphous and relatively unorganised body of law. It is surely evident that the implementing of Article 13 of the Charter is a task of urgency and importance of which yield place to none of the other problems that face the international law today." [7] The U.N. General Assembly took the task of "encouraging the progressive development of international law and its codification" in all seriousness. On December 11, 1946, the General Assembly appointed a committee for the progressive development of International Law and its codification. In 1947, the General Assembly decided to set up an International Law Commission, an International Law Commission was elected and it met on April 11, 1949. As provided under Article 1 of the Statute of the International Law Commission, the Commission shall have for its object the promotion of the progressive development of international law and its codification. The distinction between the two terms has been explained earlier. The Commission also considers proposals and draft multilateral conventions submitted by the Members of the U.N., the principal organs of the U.N. other than the specialized agencies, or official bodies established by inter-governmental agreement to encourage the progressive development of International Law and its codification and transmitted to it for that purpose by the Secretary-General.[8] It is provided that the Commission shall survey the whole field of International Law with a view to selecting topics for codification having in mind existing drafts whether governmental or not. When the Commission considers that the codification of a particular topic is necessary or desirable, it shall submit its recommendations to the General Assembly. The Commission shall give top priority to requests to the General Assembly to deal with any question.[9] Further, Article 24 provides that the Commission shall consider ways and means for making the evidence of customary international law more readily available, such as, the collection and publication of documents concerning State practice and of the decisions of national and international courts on questions of international law, and shall make a report to the General Assembly on this matter.

International Law Commission consists of 34 members elected for a period of five years.

Work of the International Law Commission.—"The establishment of ILC represented a turning point in the 'codification movement', understood as the movement for the systematic presentation of international law in the form of written rules representing a restatement of existing rules of international customary law or the formulation of new ones." [10] On November 21, 1947, the General Assembly directed the International Law Commission : (a) to formulate the principles of International Law recognised in Charter as well as in the judgment of the Nuremberg Tribunal ; (b) to prepare a draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind ; (c) to prepare a draft declaration on the rights and duties of States ; and (d) to suggest the desirability and possibility of establishing an international judicial body for the trial of genocide and certain other crimes. The Commission began its work in 1949 and since then it has done commendable work in respect of the codification of International Law. It decided to give priority to the following three topics : (i) Law of Treaties ; (ii) Arbitral Procedure ; and (iii) Law Relating to the High Seas.

---

* See for I.A.S. (1966), Q. No. 11 ; P.C.S. (1978), Q. No. 1.

[7] Zennings, see Supra Note 2, at p. 329.

[8] Article 17(1) of the Statute of the International Law Commission (I.L.C.).

[9] Article 18 of the Statute of the I.L.C. 1 ; C.S.E. (1987) Q. 5 (a).

 See for P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 1.

[10] Carl—August Fleischhauer, "The United Nations and the Progressive Development and Codification of International Law". I.J.I.L., Vol. 25 (1985) p. 1.

By the year 1971, the Commission submitted final drafts or reports relating to : (1) Regime of the High Seas ; (2) Regime of Territorial waters ; (3) Nationality (including statelessness) ; (4) Law of Treaties ; (5) Diplomatic Intercourse and Immunities ; (6) Consular Intercourse and Immunities ; and (7) Arbitral Procedure. In addition to this, the Commission has also worked on the following topics : (1) Draft Declaration on Rights and Duties of States ; (2) Formulation of the Nuremberg Principles ; (3) Draft code of offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind ; (4) Question of Definition of Aggression,[11] (5) Question of International Criminal Jurisdiction ; (6) Question of Reservation of Multilateral Treaties ; (7) Extended Participation in General Multilateral Treaties concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations ; (8) Nationality including Statelessness ; (9) Special Missions ; (10) Representatives of States of International organisations ; (11) Prevention and Punishment of crimes against Diplomatic Agents and other Internationally Protected Persons ; (12) The Most-Favoured-Nation clause ; (13) State Responsibility ; (14) Succession of States in Respect of Treaties ; (15) Succession of States in Matters other than Treaties ; and (16) The Law of Non-Navigational Uses of International Watercourses.

It may be noted here that although the Commission has dealt with a large number of topics as noted above, since 1949 its major contribution has so far been in the fields of the (i) law of treaties, (ii) law of diplomatic and consular relations, and (iii) the law of Sea. In addition to this, in pursuance to Article 24 of the Statute as noted above, the Commission made useful recommendations on making the evidence of customary international law more readily available, pursuant to which the United Nations Juridical Year Book has been published since 1963 as well as U.N. Legislative Series, and Report of International Arbitration Awards. These publications along with the Year Book of the International Law Commission itself serve as rich source-material.[12] The more important of the subjects presently under the consideration of the Commission are—(i) The Most-favoured Nation Clause ; (ii) State Responsibility ; (iii) Succession of States in Matters other than Treaties ; and (iv) Law of Non-Navigational uses of International water-courses.[13]

It may also be noted that the term of earlier Commission expired on 31 December, 1976 and on 17 November, 1976, the General Assembly elected by secret ballot the entire membership of 25 legal experts of the new Commission for five years beginning from 1st January, 1977. Dr. S.P. Jagota of India was also elected as one of the members of the Commission.[14] On 18 November, 1981, the General Assembly adopted a resolution (36/39) enlarging the membership of the Commission from 25 to 35, according to the following pattern : (a) eight nationals from African states ; seven nationals from Asian states ; three nationals from East European states ; six nationals from Latin American states ; and eight nationals from Western Europe or other states. In fact, "...... the International Law Commission has performed its task with great distinction. Declarations have been enunciated, important principles have been formulated, new conventions have been drafted and the ways and means for making evidence of customary law more readily available received attention of the Commission also......... The work of the Commission has been of great importance to the world Court (i.e., International Court of Justice), for in administering law and justice the Court has frequently relied upon it." [15] [11] The definition of aggression was finally adopted in 1974 ; For a discussion of the definition of Aggression see Chapter on "The Security Council".

---

[12] S.P. Jagota, "The Role of the International Law Commission in the Development of International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 16 (1976), p. 459 at p. 461.

[13] Ibid at p. 463 ; U.N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIII No. 8 (Aug.-Sept., 1976), pp. 49-50 ; Richard D. Kearney, "The Twenty-fifth Session of the International Commission", A.J.I.L., Vol. 68 (1974), pp. 454-74.

[14] U.N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIII, No. 11 (December 1976), p. 57.

"The record of ILC activities over 36 years of its existence includes no less than 13 multinational conventions adopted on the basis of drafts worked out in the ILC by specially convened United Nations conferences or, in two cases, by the sixth committee. The ILC conventions comprise such landmark instruments as the 4 Geneva Conventions on the Law of the Sea, 1958, the Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 1961, on Consular Relations, 1963 and on the Law of Treaties, 1969." [16]

Fifty-seventh session of the Commission was held from 2 May to 3 June and 11 July to 5 August, 2005. The Agenda of the this session was as follows :—

1. Organisation of the work of the session;
2. Diplomatic protection;
3. Responsibility;
4. Shared natural resources;
5. Unilateral acts of state;
6. Reservation to treaties;
7. Expulsion of Aliens;
8. Effects of armed conflict on treaties;
9. Fragmentation of international law—Difficulties arising from the diversification and expansion of international law;
10. Progress, procedures and working methods, Commission and its documentation;
11. Co-operation with other bodies;
12. Date and Place of 58th Session;
13. Other business.

Throughout the year the Commission has maintained a close relationship with the International Court of Justice. The Commission is informed by the President of the Court of its recent activities and of the case currently before it and the members of Commission are given opportunity to have an exchange of views with the President of the Court.

Fifty-eighth session of the Commission was held from May 1 to 9 June and July 3 to August 11, 2006.

Recent Conventions and Treaties.—Geneva Conventions on the Law of Sea, 1958, Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations (1961), 1965, Convention on Settlement of Investment Disputes between the States and Nationals of other States, Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, 1969 are some of the landmarks in the field of codification and progressive development of International Law. Besides these, Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, 1963, Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes against Internationally Protected Persons, 1973, International Covenants on Human Rights, 1966, Convention on Registration of Objects Launched into Outer Space, 1974, International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, 1966, International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid, 1973, the Vienna Convention on the Representation of States in their Relations with International organisations of universal character (1975) ; Vienna Convention on the Succession of States in Respect of Treaties (1978) ; U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea (1982) ; Vienna Convention on State Property, Archives and Debts, 1983 ; Convention on the Development, Production and Stockpiling of Bacteriological and Toxin Weapons and Their Destruction, 1971; U.N. Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989; U.N. Convention on Bio-Diversity, 1992; U.N. Convention on Forestry, 1992; U.N. Convention on Climate Change, 1992; International Convention for the Suppression of [15] Manfred Lachs, "The Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the International Law Commission", I.J.I.L., Vol. 1 (1974), p. 1 at pp. 3-4.

---

[16] Note 10, p. 2.

Terrorist Bombings (1997); International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism (1999); International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism (2005) etc. also deserve a special mention. Moreover, for the progressive development and codification of International Trade Law, a United Nations Commission has been established.[17] These Conventions and Treaties had provided the International system with a legislative machinery which, though not equivalent to Municipal Legislative system, yet to some extent, may be said to be the counterpart of the legislative machinery of State legal system. As aptly remarked by Javier Perez De Cuellar, Secretary-General of the United Nations, "......the magnitude of the achievements of the U.N. in codifying, and progressively developing international law has no precedent in history. On land and sea, as well as in outer space, the United Nations, in the past 70 years, has helped to construct a legal network to regulate a wide range of international activities and to set forth international laws, rights and duties."[18]

Merits and Demerits of Codification

Merits of Codification :

(1) One of the defects of International Law is obscurity and uncertainty. Codification not only makes rules clear and certain but also reconciles conflicting and divergent views.

(2) Codification will be helpful in filling numerous gaps existing in International Law and also by providing for rules where there is none.

(3) Yet another merit of codification is that it will bring uniformity in the International legal system.

(4) Codification will also go a long way to end or at least greatly minimise the disagreement and confusion that prevails on many important matters.

(5) Codification will enhance the efficacy of International Law by increasing its binding force.

(6) The International Court of Justice and other Tribunals will find it easier to apply and enforce codified International Law.

(7) It will be easier and convenient to amend the codified International Law so as to keep it at pace with the tide of time.

Demerits of Codification :

(1) Codification is detrimental for the natural growth and future development of International Law. This defect can be remedied by a regular and scientfic revision of codes in order to incorporate changes in international conditions.

(2) Yet another disadvantage of codification is that it makes the system of law too rigid and unadaptable to new situations.

(3) Codification also makes the law too formal and conservative. This defect can be removed by progressive interpretation of International Law.

(4) New controversies arise due to codification.

(5) It gives rise to controversies in interpretation because of the hair-splitting tendency of Judges to interpret the law.

(6) International Law still being in its infancy, only a partial codification is possible.

(7) Last but not the least disadvantage of codification is that customary rules still form the bulk of International Law and many of them are not yet fully settled.

It may be noted that "Codification has ceased to be a technical task which can be entrusted to lawyers, it has become a political matter, a task of law creation, and in the absence of any International organ of legislative powers, the contents of the Code can be settled only if the representatives of the Governments can be made to agree upon them".[19] [17] As written by J.A.C. Gutteridge : "The Commission......will have an important part to play in the progressive development of International Law and its codification in the field of International trade, as well as its unification'. The United Nations in a Changing World (Manchester University, 1969), p. 85.

---

[18] "The Role of the United Nations in World Affairs", International Affairs (Moscow, October 1988), p. 88 at p. 89.

Conclusion.—A critical perusal of the advantages and disadvantages of codification, will lead as to irresistible conclusion that the advantages outweigh the disadvantages. Codification will make the law certain, simple, intelligible and, above all easily accessible to all. Many of disadvantages of codification may be removed by carefully planning and regular and scientific revision of the Code to incorporate changes in international conditions. "The objective of codification announced in the Charter of the United Nations can be attained without great difficulty in respect to certain less important relations of States, where the conflict of interests is not acute. In respect of other relations much will depend upon the mutual confidence that may result from the successful operation of collective security." [20] "Products of codification, even if initially approved or accepted only by a limited number of Governments, constitute a positive and tangible achievement and a starting point for a gradual extension of their operation." [21] In the clarification, development and codification of public International Law, and United Nation's performance already exceeds the entire record of the nineteenth century plus that of the League of Nations." [22] It has been aptly remarked,[23] "The role of 'codification' and 'progressive development' assumes profound significance also because of the complex nature of growing international relations, which call for particular formulation and enactment. The articulate and specific instruments of law-making bilaterial or multilateral treaties, constitute the effective vehicle for regulating international or transnational interests concerning communications, health, conservation of resources, labour and social matters, marine resources and space law.[24] 'Codification, and 'Progressive' development therefore, play an important and vital role in the promotion of world peace, International development and progress. To conclude in the words of Judge Nagendra Singh "In the international field there is no law-making chamber or a legislature as such in the sense as it exists in the municipal shpere of the State and hence the function of codification in the inter-State context has not only the objective of scientfic determination of the law but also its formulation to meet the new needs of its Universal acceptance as required by the ever-changing demands of the world society of Sovereign States. Thus unlike codification in other fields it has to be admitted that as far as Codification of International Law is concerned it has to be substantially legislative in character. The process of codification must essentially embrace the need to change the law and to induce government to accept the revision of old laws and the formulation of new ones." [25]

---

[19] J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition (1963), p. 80.

[20] Fenwick, International Law, (Third Indian Reprint, 1971), p. 105.

[21] H. Lauterpacht. "Codification and Development of International Law", A.J.I.L. Vol. 49 (1955), p. 16 at p. 39.

[22] P.E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (Princeton New Jersey, 1971), p. 180.

[23] R.S. Pathak, "The Role and means of Codification and Progressive Development of International Law", I.J.I.L. Vol. 17 (1977), p. 137 at p. 145.

[24] See Wolfgang Friedmann : The Changing Structure of International Law, 1964, pp. 122-123.

[25] Judge Nagendra Singh, supra, note 5 at p. 2.

CHAPTER 7

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN INTERNATIONAL LAW AND MUNICIPAL LAW[*]

Certain theories have been propounded to explain the relationship between International Law and Municipal Law. Following are some of the prominent theories in this connection : (1) Monism ; (2) Dualism ; (3) Specific Adoption theory ; (4) Transformation theory ; and (5) Delegation theory. These theories have been put forward to explain the relationship between International Law and State Law. Of all these theories the most popular are 'Monism' and 'Dualism' and they are diametrically opposed to each other.

Main Theories[] :—

(1) Monism.[]—The exponents of this theory emphasise the scientific analysis of the internal structure of law. According to them law is a unified branch of knowledge, no matter whether it applies on persons or other entities. "According to monist belief, international obligation and municipal rules are facets of same phenomenon, the two deriving ultimately from one basic norm and belonging to the unitary order comprised by the conception of law." [1] "In their (i.e., monists) view the science of law is a unified field of knowledge, and the decisive point is, therefore, whether or not international law is true law. Once it is accepted as hypothesis that international law is a system of rules of truly legal character, it is impossible, according to Kelsen (1881-1973) and other monistic writers to deny that the two systems constitute part of that unity corresponding to the unity of legal science. Thus any construction other than monism, and in particular dualism, is bound to amount to a denial of the true legal character of international law." [2] It has already been pointed out in the Third Chapter that international law is a law in the true sense of the term and keeping this view in mind, monism seems to be reasonable and correct theory. Wright, Kelsen and Duguit, etc. are some of the prominent exponents of monism.

According to the exponents of Monism International Law and Municipal law are intimately connected with each other. International Law and Municipal Law are the two branches of unified knowledge of law which are applicable to human community in some or the other way. In the view of the monistic writers, in the ultimate analysis of law we find that man is at the root to all laws. All laws are made for men and men only in the ultimate analysis.

Criticism.—Monism is a very sound theory. It is very difficult to disprove the view of Kelsen that man lies at the root of all laws. But in actual practice states do not follow this theory. They contend that Municipal Law and International Law are two separate systems of law. Further, each state is sovereign and as such is not bound by international law. States follow international law simply because they give their consent to be bound and on account of other reasons.

(2) Dualism.[*]—In the view of the dualistic writers, international law and State law are two separate laws. "The Monist view of law is part of philosophy according to which totality is a single structure. But within the framework of the unitary universe is diversity of phenomenon ...... Differences are significant and the dualist considers that Municipal law differs markedly from international precepts." [3] Monism remained in vogue for a long time. Monism exercised a great influence upon international law, because it had close association with natural law. In the 19th century, however, the existence of State-will and complete sovereignty of the State were emphasized. The conception of State-will was taken from Hegel, a German scholar and was further developed. Dualism is based on the complete sovereignty of States. The chief exponents of this theory are Triepel and Anzilloti. Triepel has pointed out the following differences between International Law and State law :

---

[*] See for I.A.S. (1957), Q. No. 2 ; I.A.S. (1968), Q. No. 2 ; I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 5 ; P.C.S. (1976), Q. No. 10(e) ; P.C.S. (1974), Q. No. 5 ; P.C.S. (1972), Q. No. 3 ; P.C.S. (1985) Q. 2. ; P.C.S. (1995) Q. 7(b) ; C.S.E. (1995) Q. 6(a).

[] See also for P.C.S. (1977), Q. No. 1 ; P.C.S. (1987), Q. 2 ; C.S.E. (1986), Q. 5(a).

[] See also for UPPCS (2004) Q. 8; UPPCS (2008) Q. 5.

[1] D.J. Latham Brown, Public International Law, London, Sweet & Maxwell, (1970), p. 265.

[2] J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law Tenth Edition (Butterworths, Singapore, 1989) pp. 73-74.

[*] See for I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 11 (c).

[3] D.J. Latham Brown, Supra Note 1, at p. 266.

(a) Regarding subject.—Individual is the subject of State law, whereas State is the subject of international law.

(b) Regarding origin.—Origin of State law is the will of the State whereas origin of the international law is the common will of States.

Criticism.—It is not correct to contend that International Law is binding only on States. In the modern period, International Law is applicable on States, individuals and certain other non-State entities. Besides this, the conception of State-will as the source of State law is incorrect. In fact State-will is nothing but the will of the people who compose it. Similarly, it is not correct to say that the origin or source of international law is common will of the States. There are certain fundamental principles of international law which are binding upon the State, even against their will. "Furthermore, it may be objected to Triepel's theory that it does not explain the existence of a general International law. Even international customary law becomes particular law for Triepel, its rules apply only to the State which by conclusive acts have declared adherence to the 'tacit' agreements' upon which they rest—a view that is at variance with reality." [4] Anzilloti has tried to explain the difference between international law and State law in a different way. According to him, there is a difference between the fundamental principles of international law and State law. The fundamental principle of the State law is that laws enacted by appropriate legislative authorities are to be obeyed. The fundamental principle of international law is pacta sunt servanda, namely, agreement between States are to be respected. On this basis, Anzilloti contends that the legal systems of international law and States laws are different. It cannot be denied that pacta sunt servanda is an important fundamental principle of international law. But to assert that it is the only basis of international law seems to be far from truth. In fact, it is an important illustration of all the important fundamental principles of international law. It fails to explain the binding force of customary rules of International Law in regard to which the States have not given their consent.

Whether Monism or Dualism is the correct theory[*] .—On the basis of above discussion, monism appears to be the correct theory but no theory can be complete in itself and it is not possible to include all the elements in it. The practice of States indicates that sometimes there is the primacy of international law, sometimes there is the primacy of the Municipal law and sometimes there is mixture of different legal system. For example in the Greco-Bulgarian Communities case,[5] The permanent Court of International Justice held, "it is a generally accepted principle of international law that in relations between powers who are contracting parties to a treaty, the provisions of the municipal law cannot prevail over the treaty." On the other hand, when the Municipal Courts find that the conflict between the International law and Municipal law is of such nature that cannot be avoided, they give primacy to the Municipal law. In this connection, Mortensen v. Peters[6] and Sri Krishna Sharma v. The State of West Bengal[7] deserve a special mention. From the technical point of view, Municipal law cannot give direction for any act which is prohibited under International law but in practice individuals are compelled to follow such laws.[8] Gould correctly observes : "As matters stand, each situation must be analysed by itself, including the tribunal before which litigation, if any, is brought in order to settle the question of which two conflicting rules of law of different orders prevail in the concrete dispute." [9]

---

[4] Torsten Gihl, "The Legal Character and Sources of International Law" (Stockholm, 1957), p. 59.

[*] See also for UPPCS (2002) Q. 7(b) ; IAS (2003) Q. 8 (d).

[5] P.C.I.J. (1930), Series Bo. No. 17.

[6] 8, Sessions Cases (5th Series), 93 (1906).

[7] A.I.R. 1954 Cal. 598.

[8] Edwin Corchard, "Relation between International Law and Municipal Law", Virginia Law Review. Vol. 27 (1940), p. 137.

(3) Specific adoption Theory.—According to the positivists, international law cannot be directly enforced in the field of State law. In order to enforce it in the field of Municipal Law, it is necessary to make its specific adoption. In short International Law can be applied in the field of Municipal law only when Municipal law either permits it or adopts it specifically. This view is generally followed by States in respect of International Treaties. It is argued that unless there is specific adoption of the International Treaties (such as Tokyo Convention Act, 1975 and Vienna Convention of Diplomatic Relations Act, 1972 enacted by Indian Parliament) or there is some sort of transformation, International Treaties as such cannot be enforced in the municipal field. While considering the International Covenants on Human Rights, the Supreme Court of India observed, in Jolly George v. The Bank of Cochin,[10] "The positive commitment of the States Parties ignites legislative action at home but does not automatically make the covenant enforceable part of the corpus juris of India."[11] As regards specific adoption of international treaties by Indian Parliament, the Anti-Apartheid (United Nations Convention) Act, 1981, the Anti-Hijacking Act, 1982, the Suppression of Unlawful Act against the safety of Civil Aviation Act, 1982 and the International Monetary Fund and Bank (Amendment) Act, 1982 deserve a special mention.

Criticism.—This view is not correct in respect of the whole of international law because there are many principles of international law (especially customary rules) which are applied in the field of municipal law without specific adoption.

(4) Transformation Theory.—The exponents of this theory contend that for the application of international law in the field of municipal law, the rules of international law have to undergo transformation. Without transformation they cannot be applied in the field of municipal law.

Criticism.—This theory is based an consensual theory which has already been criticized. It may also be noted that it is not necessary for all treaties to undergo the process of transformation for their application in the field of municipal law. There are several law-making treaties which become applicable to the States even without undergoing the process of transformation. This theory has been severely criticized by the critics. It is, therefore, incorrect to consider that the transformation from one to other is materially essential.[12]

(5) Delegation Theory.—As pointed out earlier, transformation theory has been severely criticized by a number of jurists. The critics of transformation theory have put forward a new theory called Delegation theory. These critics point out that the constitutional rule of international law permit each State to determine as to how international treaties will become applicable in the field of State law. Thus, in fact, there is no transformation nor is there specific adoption in every case. The rules of international law are applied in the field of State law in accordance with the procedure and system prevailing in each State in accordance with its Constitution.

Criticism.—This theory can be regarded simply as a reaction against the theory of "dualism" and other theories based on positivism, one may ask where are and what are the constitutional rules of international law? When and how these rules have delegated power to state constitutions? This theory is far from true. In fact, each state is equal and sovereign and does not recognize any authority over and above it.

Thus there is a great controversy in regard to application of international law in the field of municipal law. In order to arrive at the right conclusion, it is necessary to go through the practice of States in this respect. But before we do so, it will be desirable first to consider the question of primacy. In other words, if there is a conflict between international law and State law, which will prevail ?

---

[9] Gould, An Introduction of International Law, Seventh Edition, at pp. 161-62.

[10] A.I.R. 1980 S.C. 470.

[11] Ibid at p. 474, per Krishna Iyer, J. for facts of the case see Appendix II.

[12] Starke, Supra Note 2, at p. 76.

*Question of primacy.—After discussing the different theories in regard to the relationship of State law and international law, it is necessary to conclude as to which will prevail in case of conflict ? According to the exponents of dualistic theory, there will be primacy of the State law. The basis of their view is that State is independent and sovereign. On the other hand, there is no uniformity of views among the writers of monistic theory. Some are of the view that there will be the primacy of international law. But some other jurists, such as Kelsen maintains that, in accordance with the facts and circumstances, there may be primacy of State law as well as international law. "Kelsen asserted a scientific indifference, though not a moral or political indifference, as between international and State monism, but contemporary jurisprudence for the most part deplores this indifference and posits the limitations of State Sovereignty by international law." [13]

Thus the view that State law will prevail in case of conflict between State law and international law is not correct. If we accept this theory, it will mean that there will be the primacy of more than 193 state legal systems. Acceptance of such theory will create anarchy and disorder in the international field. Besides this, this view is subject to the following criticism :

(a) If it is accepted that international law derives validity from the State Constitution, it will mean that with the disappearance of the State Constitution, the validity of the rules of international law will also disappear. This is a very absurd suggestion and cannot be accepted. Almost all the jurists are agreed on the point that the disappearance of State Constitution will not affect the validity of the rules of international law. Thus, the theory that international law is not necessarily binding on States sustained by so many theorists and jurists, though founded on essential error, can only aggravate this weakness in the system and postpone the maturity of that international legal order for which most of them profess to be working. It may also be noted that International Law exerts a definite check upon municipal law and holds the State responsible to the State whose nationals are injured by excesses in conflict with international law. There are innumerable precedents which have held States liable for their failure to perform international obligations." [14]

(b) When a new State is admitted to the family of nations, it becomes bound to obey the rules of international law even against its will. In fact, the duty of each State is to adopt its law and Constitution in accordance with the rules and principles of international law.

(c) Most of the States have accepted the supremacy of international law in their Constitutions.[15]

Thus, "since no doctrinal position seems to encompass all facts, it is likely that this controversy will continue indefinitely. Practice suggests that, in fact, a mixture of international law supremacy, municipal law supremacy and co-ordination of legal system exists." [16] In view of the prevailing controversy, each situation must be analysed by itself to decide as to whether there will be primacy of International Law or that of the municipal law.[17] In practice, national courts endeavour to interpret Statutes in such a way as not to conflict the provisions of international law.[18]

---

* See for I.A.S. (1971), Q. No. 4 ; see also the British and Indian Practice discussed later on in this Chapter, C.C.S. (1981) Q. 6 ; see also theories discussed above.

[13] P. E. Corbett : The Growth of Law., (1971), p. 47.

[14] See Edwin Borchard, "The Relation between International Law, and Municipal Law". Virginia Law Review, Vol. 27 (1940), p. 137.

[15] See Felice Morgenstern, "Judicial Practice and Supremacy of International Law". BYBIL. Vol . XXVII (1950), p. 42 at p. 92. As pointed out by C.W. Jenks : "Where the doctrine of incorporation applies and International Law is accepted as part of law of the land, the clarification of international law by an international court or tribunal may be self-executory not only, in the sense that it determines the point of law at issue between the parties to the particular case but equally in the sense that the law as clarified becomes a part of law applicable as the law of the land in virtue of incorporation". The Prospects of International Adjudication (1964), p. 690 ; see also Christoph H. Schreuer, "The Authority of International Judicial Practice in Domestic Courts", I.C.L.Q., Vol. 23, Part 4 (1947), p. 681 at pp. 645-86.

[16] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World, p. 45.

STATE PRACTICES REGARDING THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN INTERNATIONAL LAW AND STATE LAW*

(1) British Practice.—For the application of international law in Britain, distinction is maintained in regard to the customary rules of international law and the rules laid down by treaties. It will, therefore, be desirable to discuss them separately.

(A) British practice in regard to customary rules of international law.—In Britain, customary rules of International Law are treated as a part of British laws. British courts treat customary rules of international law as a part of their own law subject however to the following conditions. (a) Rules of international law should not be inconsistent with the British Statutes ; and (b) If the highest Court once determines the scope of a customary rule of international law, then all the courts in Britian are bound by it.[19]

Influence of the above practice.—Following is the influence of the British practice in regard to the customary rules of international law :—

(a) Rules of Construction.—The British Courts interpret the Parliamentary Statutes in such a way that they should not go against international law. In this connection the presumption is that Parliament never intends to violate international law. This rule is applicable only when the provisions of the Statutes are ambiguous. In case the provisions of the Statutes are clear and unabmiguous, they prevail over the rules of international law.

(b) Rule of Evidence.—In Britain, the rules of international law need not be proved through evidence.

Following are the exceptions of the British practice in regard to customary rules of international law :

(i) Acts of State do not come within the purview of the British courts, irrespective of the violation of international law.

(ii) Prerogative powers of Crown.—In some matters the British courts are bound to obey the prerogative powers of Crown. For example, if the Crown grants recognition to any State, the British courts are bound to accept it. They cannot question the matters coming within prerogative powers of the Crown.[20]

(B) British Practice as to Treaties.—In Britain the practice regarding the rule laid down by treaties is different from the practice in regard to the customary rule of international law. In regard to treaties, the British practice is based on the constitutional principles governing the relationship between Executive or Crown and Parliament. In regard to treaties, the matters, relating to negotiations, signatures, etc. are within the prerogative powers of the Crown. In Britain it is necessary that some type of treaties should receive the consent of Parliament. Either the Parliament accords its consent or adopts it in State law through the help of a statute. Such type of treaties are : (a) Treaties which affect the right of British citizens ; (b) Treaties which amend or modify common law or Statute law of Britain ; (c) Treaties which confer additional powers on Crown ; and (d) Treaties which impose additional financial burden on the Government. In addition to these, treaties which expressly provide that for their application the consent of the Parliament is required, consent of the Parliament is essential for their application. The consent of the Parliament is also necessary for the treaties which cede the British territory. Other types of treaties do not require the Parliamentary consent. Now the question arises if there is a conflict between a law enacted by Parliament and treaty, which will prevail. In this connection the House of Lords declared in Ostime v. Australian Mutual Provident Society,[21] that if a treaty has been enforced through law enacted by Parliament, then this will prevail over an earlier inconsistent British Law.

---

[17] See Supra Note 9.

[18] See Mac:Leod v. U.S. 229 U.S. 434 (1913). See also Mortensen v. Peters, 18 Sessions Cases (5th Series) 93 (1906) ; Shri Krishna Sharma v. The State of West Bengal, A.I.R. 1954 Cal. 598.

* See also for P.C.S. (1987) Q. 2. (1963), Q. No. 5 ; I.A.S. (1954), Q. No. 1 ; P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 6 ; P.C.S. (1985) Q. 2.

 See for I.A.S. (1974), Q. No. 1 (c) ; I.A.S. (1968), Q. No. 2 ; I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 5 ; I.A.S. (1954), Q. No. 1 ; P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 6 ; P.C.S. (1985) Q. 2.

[19] Starke, see supra note 2 at p. 78.

[20] See Starke, ibid, p. 80.

In Solomon v. Commissioners of Customs and Excise,[22] Diplock, L.J. observed that where by a treaty, the British Government undertakes to introduce domestic legislation to achieve a specified result in the United Kingdom or to secure a specified result which can be achieved by legislation, the treaty, since in the English law is not self operating, remains irrelevant to any issue in the English wit until Her Majesty's Government has taken steps of legislation to fulfil its treaty obligations. Once the Government has legislated, the court must in the first instance construe the legislation. If the terms of the legislation are clear and unambiguous, they must be given effect to, whether or not they carry out U.K.'s treaty obligations. But if the terms of the legislation are not clear and are reasonably capable of more than one meaning, the treaty becomes relevant for there is a prima facie presumption that Parliament does not intend to act in breach of international law, including there in specific obligations; and if one of the meanings which can reasonably be ascribed to the legislation in consonant with the treaty obligations and another or others are not, the meaning which is consonant is to be preferred. Thus, in case of lack of clarity in the words used in the legislation, the terms of the treaty are relevant to enable the court to make its choice between the possible meanings of these words by applying this presumption.

Reference may also be made to a more recent case namely. International Tin Council case (J. H. Rayner Ltd. v. (Mining Law) Department of Trade and Industry[23] This case relates to the claims of creditors against International Tin Council (ITC) after it failed to meet its depts. I.T.C. was an international organisation established by tin producing and tin importing States for regulating international marketing and production of tins. ITC was established by a treaty, the Sixth International Tin Agreement (ITA6) and it operated in United Kingdom because of a Headquarters Agreement between the ITC and the U.K. But these treaties were not incorporated in the national law of the U.K. although by an order of 1972, passed under the International Organisations Act, 1968, it was provided that the ITC would have the legal capacities of a body corporate. One of the creditors prayed that the U.K. Court, in view of the obligations of the State Parties to ITA 6, to enable claimants to recover directly against those States. Another creditor sought the appointment of a receiver of ITC so as to claim against the State Parties to ITA 6. Both these claims were rejected by the House of Lords unanimously.

Delivering the judgement Lord Oliver observed that treaties are not self executing. A treaty is not a part of English law unless and until it has been incorporated into the law by legislation. So far as individuals are concerned they cannot derive rights by treaties nor can they be deprived of the rights or subjected to obligations, and it is outside the purview of the courts not only because it is made in the conduct of foreign relations, which are a prerogative of the Crown, but also because, as a source of rights and obligations, it is irrelevant. However, it does not follow that the courts must never look at or construe a treaty. Where, for example, a treaty is directly incorporated into English law by Act of the Legislature its terms become subject to the interpretative jurisdiction of the court in the same way as any other Act of the legislature.[24]

---

21. (1960) A.C. 459 at p. 476 ; (1959) 3 All E.R. 245 at p. 248.
22. (1967) 2 Q.B. 116.
23. (1990) 2 AC 418.
24. Fothergill v. Monarch Airlines Ltd., (1981), AC 251 relied upon.

Moreover, it is well established that where a statute is enacted in order to give effect to U.K.'s obligations under a treaty, the terms of the treaty may have to be considered as to the meaning or scope of the statute. Besides this, where parties have entered into a domestic contract in which they have chosen to incorporate the terms of the treaty, the court may be called upon to interpret the treaty for the purposes of ascertaining the rights and obligations of the parties under their contract.[25]

In the instant case, the creation and regulation by a number of sovereign states of an international organisation for their common political and economic purposes was an act jure imperii and an adjudication of the rights and obligations between themselves and that organisation or, inter se, can be undertaken only on the plane of international law. Since ITA6 is an unincorporated treaty, there is simply no way in which the case can be put for a claim by ITC against its members for an indemnity or contribution which does not, in the ultimate analysis, involve a reliance upon, and the interpretation of its provision, so that the claim is equally incapable of adjudication under the limb of the principle of non justiciability.

(2) American Practice.*—In America also, the practice regarding customary rules of international law and the rules laid down by treaty is different.

(A) American practice regarding customary rules of international law.—The American practice regarding customary rules of international law is more or less same as the British practice. In America also customary rules of international law are treated as a part of American law. In the leading case Paquete Habana,[26] Justice Gray remarked, "International law is a part of our law and must be ascertained and administered by the courts of justice of appropriate jurisdiction as often as questions of rights depending on it are duly presented for their determination." For this purpose, "where there is no treaty, and no controlling executive or legislative act or judicial decision, resort must be had to the customs and usages of civilized nations ; and, as evidence of these, to the works of jurists and commentators, who by years of labour, research and experience, have made themselves peculiarly well acquainted with the subjects of which they treat. Such works resorted to by judicial tribunals, not for the speculations of their authors concerning what the law ought to be, but for the trustworthy evidence of what the law really is." [27] Besides this the American courts also interpret the Statute of the Congress in such a way that may not go against international law.

(B) American practice regarding rules laid down by Treaties.—American practice regarding rules laid down by treaties is different from British practice. In case of international treaties, the American practice is not based on the constitutional rules governing the relationship of the executive and Congress. In America, everything depends upon the provisions of the Constitution. Article VI of the American Constitution provides that Constitution of the United States, all laws made in pursuance thereof and the international treaties entered into under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land. Thus international treaties have been placed in the same category as State law in America. It may, however, be noted that in America the practice is that if there is a conflict in between international treaty and a State law, whichever is later in date shall prevail. If there is a conflict between American Constitution and an International Treaty, the former (i.e. the Constitution) will prevail. Besides this, in America treaties have been divided into two categories—self-executing treaties and non-self-executing treaties. Self-executing treaties are those treaties which become applicable in America without any Act or consent of the Congress. On the other hand non-self-executing treaties are those which can become applicable in America only after the consent of the Congress or through its adoption by a specific Statute.

---

[25] Philppson v. Imperial Airways Ltd., (1939) A.C. 332 relied on.

* See for I.A.S. (1974), Q. No. 1(c) ; P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 6 ; P.C.S. (1980) Q. No. 2.

[26] (1900) 175 U.S. 677 at p. 700 ; see also U.S. v. Melekh, (1960) 190 F. Supp. 67.

[27] Hilton v. Guyot, 159 U.S. 113, 163, 164, 214, 215.

(3) Israeli Practice.—In Eichman v. Attorney-General of the Govt. of Israel,[28] the Supreme Court of Israel said that according to the law of Israel, which is identical on this point with English law, the relationship between municipal and international law is governed by the following rules :—

"(1) The principle in question becomes incorporated into the municipal law and a part of that law only after it has achieved general international recognition.

(2) This, however, only applies where there is no conflict between the provisions of municipal law and a rule of international law. But where a conflict does exist, it is the duty of the court to give preference to and apply the laws of the local legislature. True, the presumption must be that the legislature strives to adjust the laws to the principles of international law which have received general recognition. But where a contrary intention clearly emerges from the Statutes itself, that presumption loses its force, and the court is enjoined to disregard it.

(3)............ a local statutory provision, which is open to equivocal construction and whose content does not demand another construction, must be construed in accordance with the rules of public international law.[29]

(4) Greek Practice.—Article 28(1) of the new Constitution[30] of Greece provides that the generally accepted rules of international law, as well as international conventions from the time they are sanctioned by law and enter into force according to each one's own terms, shall be an integral part of internal Greek Law, and they shall prevail over any contrary provision of law. It, however, adds that the applications of the rules of international law and international conventions to aliens is always subject to the condition of reciprocity. As regards treaties, Article 36 of the Constitution provides that in respect of treaties on commerce, as well those on taxation, economic cooperation, and participation in international organizations or Unions, and any others that contain concession as to which under other provisions of the Constitution no provision can be made without a law, or that impose a burden upon the Greeks individually, shall have no force without sanctioning by a law voted by Parliament.[31]

(5) The French Practice.*—According to Articles 53 and 55 of the Constitution of the Fifth French Republic, international law is treated as a part of the law of France. The rules of customary international law are part of the law of France. Thus in this respect, the French practice is similar to those of the U.S. and U.K. As regards treaties, the French practice differs from the American practice. In France, international treaties and agreement concluded by France with other States, which are duly published, are administered and applied by the French Courts even though they are in conflict with the provisions of the Municipal Law of France and irrespective of the fact that they have been entered into earlier or later than the Municipal law in question. But like the American practice, the international agreement should not conflict with the French Constitution. In case there is a conflict between the two, the latter shall prevail.

(6) Soviet Practice.—Article 29 of the draft Soviet Constitution provides : "The relations of the U.S.S.R. with other States shall be based on the observance of the principle of mutual renunciation of the use or threat of force, and of the principles of sovereign equality, inviolability of frontiers, territorial integrity of States, peaceful settlement of disputes, non-interference in international affairs, respect for human rights and basic freedoms, equality and the right of peoples to decide their own destiny, co-operation between States, scrupulous fulfilment of commitments arising from universally recognized principles and norms of international law, and the international treaties signed by the U.S.S.R.[32] According to Soviet author,[33] a notable feature of the Soviet Constitution is that it formulates the principles underlying the Soviet Union's relations with other nations of particular importance is the principle of non-interference in internal affairs[34] and respect for human rights and basic freedoms. The Constitution puts on record the basic principle of modern international law that the co-operation of States in different spheres including that of human rights should not be misused for interference in each other's internal affairs. This principle is generally recognised and is contained in the U.N. Charter and many international agreements.

---

[28] (1962) 136 I.L.R. 277.

[29] See L.C. Green, International Law Through Cases, Third Edition (1970), pp. 239-40.

[30] Which came into force on June 11, 1975.

[31] For detailed study see A.A. Fatouros, International Law in the New Greek Constitution" A.J.I.L., Vol. 70(1876), p. 492.

* See for I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 5.

 See also for I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 5.

According to the principles of the Civil Legislation and Civil Procedure of the Soviet Union, in the case of conflict between international law and Soviet Federal Statute, the former shall prevail. But if there is a conflict between an international treaty and the provisions of the Soviet Constitution, the latter shall prevail over the former. The Soviet writers severely criticize the principle of the primacy of international law. So far as the question of the conflict between the Soviet Internal Statutes and the provisions of the international law is concerned, Soviet writers contend that in view of special nature of the State of Soviet Union, conflict of this type is not possible. As one Soviet author[35] puts it : "In the practice of the Soviet Union and of the countries of people's democracy, conflicts between rules of international law and those of the Internal Statutes are not possible. Socialist States, while strictly observing international law, can neither impose nor accept obligations which would be contrary to the principles of international law of the contracting parties. On the other hand, while strictly observing international agreements, they are unable to enact provisions of municipal law, which would be contrary to international agreements." It may, however, be noted that later on Soviet writers have accepted that the conflict is possible and in such a situation, as compared to international law, the provisions of the later internal statutes shall prevail.[36] In the view of some Soviet writers, in Soviet Union, international law is, in fact, the extension of the Soviet policy. According to the Soviet jurist, Vyshinsky, it is wrong to say that historically international law is a body of binding rules of conduct. In his view, international law is the external law of the State.

In Soviet Union, generally international treaties and international statutes are given almost the equal statuts. But the position is different in regard to customary rules of international law. In England and America, the general principle is that customary rules of international law are generally the part of the municipal law. But the Soviet Union gives more importance to the agreements and treaties. The customary rules of international law are regarded valid only after they have been approved by the Soviet Government. "The Soviet Government claimed the right to choose international obligations which were to constitute in force and to reject those which for various reasons were not to be honoured. The same also applied to international custom, international agreements, bilateral and multilateral, and international practice as evidence of customary law required confirmation by the Soviet Government even by the United States of America.[37] But the position has changed significantly after the breaking up of the Soviet Union and end of Communism over there. Consequently, the Soviet practice is likely to be revised in view of the rapid changes that are taking place in Russia and other former Soviet Republics.

---

[32] See New Times No. 24 (June, 1977) at p. 37 ; for full draft Constitution of the U.S.S.R. See Ibid, at pp. 34-48.

[33] Vladimir Kartashkin, "The Draft Constitution of the U.S.S.R. and International Law", New Times, No 29 (July, 1977), p. 4 at p. 6.

[34] For further elaboration of this principle see also Valentin Yaroslavtsev, "Non-Interference—A Basic Principle, New Times, No. 20 (May, 1977), p. 18.

[35] See Kazimierz Grzybywski, Soviet Public International Law (A.W. Sijthoff, Leyden, 1970), p. 31.

[36] Ibid. at p. 32.

[37] Grzybywski, see supra note 35 at p. 28.

Yet another significant thing to be noted is the supremacy of Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) even in respect of external affair and hence its importance in the field of international law.[38] The supremacy of the CPSU in the U.S.S.R. in terms of internal law seems to have been recognised even by the United States of America.[39]

(7) The Chinese Practice.[40]—In the words of a Chinese writer[41]...... regardless of what the Bourgeoisic says—supremacy of international law over municipal law, supremacy of municipal law over international law, monist theory or dualist theory—all these theories concretely reflect the will of the Bourgeoisic and their historical changes are "solely determined by class interest." The Chinsese authors have never accepted the supremacy of international law over municipal law and have vehemently criticized this view.[42] But as pointed out by Jerome Alan Cohen and Hungdah Chiu, "The relation of international law to municipal law is not only of basic theoretical importance in the conduct of international activity. Yet Chinese writers rarely discuss this problem, and those who do, like Ying T'ao, almost exclusively confine themselves to criticisms of relevant Western theory and practice. These criticisms follow the arguments set forth in the Soviet legal literature." But Soviet authors have in addition, attempted to construct their own specific explanations of relationship between international law and municipal law.[43] Thus China has yet not articulated a definite theory to explain the relationship between International Law and Municipal Law.

(8) Austrian Practice and Practice in Netherlands and Switzerland.—Article 9 of the Austrian Constitution provides that the generally recognised rules of international law are part of Austrian law. This has been interpreted to mean the general recognition need not necessarily be universal and that the changes in these rules are automatically reflected in internal law. However, these rules may be overridden by ordinary laws. The same attitude prevails in countries like France. As regards the abrogation of treaties, like Switzerland and the U.S., Austria adheres to the view that laws enacted in violation of prior treaty, obligations are internally valid although they constitute an international tort. However, in case the ordinary rules referred to in Article 145 of the Austrian Constitution were enacted, the constitutional court can declare any law violating existing rules of international law invalid, whether embodied in treaties or not. It may also be noted that unlike in the U.S. the constitutional court of Austria refuses to review the constitutionality of international agreements. Thus, as pointed out by Ignaz Hohenveldern[44]............ the Austrain Constitution may be described as following a middle course between extrinsic monistic theory of the absolute supremacy of international law, over internal law and the principles according to which, in internal law, the will of the people, as expressed at any given moment by the majority of the Nationalrat should be supreme."

(9) Indian practice.*—Before the adoption of Indian Constitution the Indian practice in respect of relation of international law to internal law was similar to the British practice. After the adoption of the Constitution of India everything depended upon the provisions of Constitution. In order to know the position of International Law in the post-Constitution period, it is necessary to examine the relevant provisions of the Constitution of India. The most relevant provision is contained in Article 51 which runs as follows :

---

[38] See Dieter Schroder "Supremacy of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union Recognized in International Law." A.J.I.L. Vol. 70 (1976), p. 322 at pp. 326-27.

[39] Ibid, at p. 328.

[40] See also Chinese definition and approach to International Law discussed earlier in Chapter 2.

[41] Ying Tao, "Recognise the true Face of Bourgeoisic International Law from a Few Basic Concepts" KCWTYC No. 1 ; 47-49 (1960) in Jerome Alan Cohen and Hungdah Chiu, People's China and International Law, (Princeton, New Jersey, 1974), at p. 101 at p. 104.

[42] Ibid, at pp. 103-104.

[43] Ibid, at p. 104.

[44] Ignaz Seidl-Hohenvelden, "Relation of International Law to Internal Law in Austria", A.J.I.L., Vol. 49 (1955), p. 45 at p. 476.

* See for I.A.S. (1960), Q. No. 2 ; P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 6 ; I.A.S. (1963), Q. 5 ; I.A.S. (1968), Q. No. 2 ; P.C.S. (1988) Q. 5.

"The State shall endeavour to—(a) promote international peace and security ; (b) maintain just and honourable relations between nations ; (c) foster respect for international law and treaty obligations in the dealings of organised peoples with one another ; and (d) encourage settlement of international disputes by arbitration."

For the purposes of the present discussion, the most important provision is contained in Articles 51(c) noted above. It is, however, significant to note that this article specifically mentions "international law" and "treaty obligations." "It seems somewhat paradoxical that separate mention should be made of 'treaty obligations' as they undoubtedly constitute integral part of international law. No explanation is to be found in the Constituent Assembly debates either as to intent of Article 51 or the meaning and scope of the treaty 'international law' and treaty obligations. Prof. C.H. Alexandrowicz says that the expression "international law" in this paragraph connotes customary international law and that 'treaty obligations' stand for treaties. This interpretation would seem to be the most logical in the context of the article as well as of attitude of the Indian Courts to questions of international law." [45]

But Article 51 does not give any clear guidance regarding the position of international law in India as well as the relationship of municipal law and international law because this article is contained in Part IV of the Constitution of India. Part IV of the Constitution deals with the Directive Principles of State Policy. Article 37 of this Part clearly provides that the provisions contained in this Part shall not be enforceable by any court. "This Article (Article 51) falls in the Chapter on 'Directive Principles of State Policy' which are non-justiciable. Secondly, it is doubtful if the expression State includes the courts also within its ambit and if the Directive Principles have been addressed to them too." However, it would be wrong to contend that Article 51 is of no relevance and provides no guidance at all. Article 37 which provides that provisions contained in Part IV of the Constitution are non-justiciable, adds in unmistakable terms that the principles therein laid down are "nevertheless fundamental in the governance of the country and it shall be the duty of the State to apply these principles in making laws." The majority of constitutional experts in the country now subscribe to the view that simply because the principles contained in Part III are non-justiciable, it cannot be successfully contended that they are of no significance or even of less significance than the fundamental rights contained in Part IV which are justiciable. Amendments of the Constitution particularly XXIV and XXV Amendments, confirm this view. As noted above, the term "International Law' in Article 51 refers to international customary law. It is thus significant to note that both international customary law and treaty law have been treated on the same footing in Article 51. It may also be noted here that an analysis of judicial decision shows that in India dualism is followed. Nevertheless, a pertinent question arises as to whether the Constitution of India has altered the position prevailing in pre-Constitution period. In this connection, Article 372 (1) clearly provides : "Notwithstanding the repeal by this Constitution of the enactments referred to in Article 395 but subject to other provisions of this Constitution, all the laws in force in the territory of India immediately before the commencement of this Constitution, shall continue in force thereinbefore until altered or repealed or amended by a competent Legislature or other competent authority." [46]

Before the adoption of the Constitution of India, the British practice that customary rules of international law are part of the law of the land, applied in India also. This practice continued even after the adoption of the Constitution by virtue of the provisions of Article 372 until it was altered or repealed or amended by a competent Legislature or other competent authority.[47] It has, therefore, been aptly remarked : "It does not mean that the doors of Indian Courts are entirely closed to the wide absorption of international customary law into municipal law. Under the British rule in India, the English Common law doctrines widely applicable in many fields. The Constitution of India did not alter that position for it provided for the continued operation of the 'law in force' immediately preceding the commencement of the Constitution. Therefore, on the analogy of the English Common law, the municipal courts of India have applied the provisions of the treaties entered into by India if they have been incorporated into municipal law through legislation, and the well recognised principles of international customary law have been applied because they are supposed to form part of the law of the land. It is thus the dualist view of international law which has been commenced by the British and Indian courts, viz., that international law can become a part of municipal law only by specific incorporation." [48] Thus, Article 51 of the Constitution of India, in so far as it requires the various organs of State, to foster respect for international law and treaties would seem to strengthen rather weaken the legacy of the common law principle that international law is a part of the law of the land. This is so, notwithstanding, the imprecise formulation of Article 51. And constitutional declarations in India are not mere embellishments on paper. They reflect "law in action." [49]

---

[45] M.K. Nawaz, "International Law on the Contemporary Practice of India : Some Perspective", Proc. ASIL. April 25-27 (1963), p. 275 at p. 278 ; see also C.H. Alexanderowicz, "International Law in India", ICLQ (1952), p. 292.

[46] S.K. Agarwala, "India's Contribution to the Development of International Law—Role of Indian Courts" appearing in Asian States and Development of Universal International Law, Ed. by R.P. Anand (1972), p. 73.

[47] See T.K. Varred v. State of Travancore-Cochin, A.I.R. 1956 S.C. 142 at p. 145.

Thus, so far as customary rules of international law are concerned, the position prevailing immediately preceding the commencement of the Constitution continues even after the coming into force of the Constitution. In India also customary rules of international law are part of the municipal law provided that they are not inconsistent with any legislative enactment or the provisions of the Constitution of India. As regards the treaty rules also, India follows more or less the British dualist view. That is to say, ordinarily, international law can become part of municipal law of India if it has been specifically incorporated. In State of Madras v. G.G. Menon,[50] the Supreme Court held : "The Indian Extradition Act, 1903, has been adopted but the Fugitive Offenders Act of the British Parliament has been left severely alone. The provisions of the Act could only be made applicable to India by incorporating them with the appropriate changes into an Act of Indian Parliament and enacting on Indian Fugitive Offenders Act. In the absence of any legislation on these lines it seems difficulties to hold that sections of the Fugitive Offenders Act, have force in India by the reason of the provisions of Article 372 of the Constitution.[51] In this case, Mr. and Mrs. Menon were Advocates in Singapore (then a British colony). Mrs. Menon had also served as a member of the Legislative Council of Singapore. They came to India in July, 1952. The Colonial Secretary of Singapore requested the Government of India for their extradition for there were certain charges against them according to the law of Singapore. Rejecting the request for their extradition, the Supreme Court held : "The whole basis for the applicability of Part II of the Fugitive Offenders Act has gone ; India is no longer a British possession, no order-in-council can be made to group it with other British possessions. Those of the countries which still form part of British possessions and which along with British India were put into a group may legitimately decline to reciprocate with India in the matter of surrender of fugitive offenders on the ground that notwithstanding Article 372 of our Constitution, India was no longer a British possession and, therefore, the Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881, did not apply to India and they were not bound in the absence of a new treaty to surrender their nationals who may have committed extraditable offences in the territories of India." [52] The Supreme Court, therefore, concluded, "In these circumstances, it is not possible to work out the sections of the Fugitive Offenders Act and apply them to the situation that has arisen after the coming into force of the Constitution of India." [53]

---

[48] S.K. Agarwala, "India's Constitution to the Development of International Law—the Role of Indian Courts" in Asian States and the Development of International Law (1977), p. 73.

[49] M.K. Nawaz, "International Law in the Contemporary Practice in India : Some Perspectives" Proc. ASIL, April 25-27 (1963), p. 275.

[50] A.I.R. 1954 S.C. 517.

[51] Ibid. at p. 519.

[52] Ibid. at p. 519.

[53] Ibid, at p. 520.

Reference may be made here to Article 253 of the Constitution which provides : "Notwithstanding in the foregoing provisions of this chapter i.e., Chapter XI of Part XI, Parliament has power to make any law for the whole or any part of the territory of India for implementing any treaty, agreement or convention with any other country or countries or any decision made at an international conference, association or other body." It would, however, be wrong to contend that the implementation of every treaty would require legislative aid. This was held by the Delhi High Court in Shiv Kumar Sharma and others v. The Union of India and others.[54] This case dealt with the implementation of the "Kutch Award" and the question was whether it involved cession of Indian territory. It also dealt with the question whether a constitutional amendment or legislation was necessary for implementation of the "Kutch Award." The court held that there was no cession of any territory belonging to India and no constitutional amendment was necessary for the implementation of the Kutch Award.[55] As regards the question if legislation was necessary for the implementation of treaty, Mr. S.K. Kapur, J., of the Delhi High Court made it clear that every treaty does not require legislative aid. His Lordship observed, "............ In India treaties do not have the force of law and consequently obligations arising therefrom will not be enforceable in Municipal Courts unless backed by legislation. Settlement of dispute as to boundary arises no such obligation requiring implementation in Municipal Courts. Cases may arise where a domestic law is in express terms extended to a named city and that city as a result of treaty settling a dispute like the present, has to be handed over to another country. In that case legislation may be necessary." [56] The same view was taken by the Supreme Court in Maghanbhai Ishwarbhai Patel and others v. Union of India." [57] The Supreme Court said that a settlement of a boundary dispute cannot be held to be a cession of territory. The Supreme Court observed : "Ordinarily an adjustment of a boundary which international law regards as valid between two nations, should be recognised by the courts and the implementation thereof can always be with the Executive unless a clear case of cession is involved when Parliamentary intercession can be expected and should be had. This has been custom of nations, whose Constitutions are not sufficiently elaborate on this subject.[58] In this case Supreme Court seems to have followed the American practice regarding the distinction between 'self-executing' and 'non-self-executing' treaties.[59] While elaborating the law, the Supreme Court observed : "A treaty really concerns the political rather than the judicial wing of the State. When a treaty or award after arbitration comes into existence it has to be implemented and this can only be if all the three branches of Government to wit the Legislature ; the Executive and the Judiciary, or any one of them, possesses the power to implement it. If there is any deficiency in the constitutional system it has to be removed and the State must equip itself with the necessary power. In some jurisdictions the compromise read with the Award acquires full effect automatically in the Municipal Law, the other body of Municipal Law

---

[54] A.I.R. 1969 Delhi 64.

[55] Ibid, at p. 72.

[56] Ibid, at p. 74.

[57] A.I.R. 1969 S.C. 783 ; also appearing in I.J.I.L., Vol. 9 (1969), at pp. 234-278.

[58] IJIL Vol. 9(1969) at p. 255 ; In re-Berubari Union and Exchange of Enclaves, A.I.R. 1960 S.C. 845, the Supreme Court had to decide whether any legislation was necessary for the agreement relating to Berubari Union. Since it involved the cession of Indian territory, the highest tribunal answered in affirmative. The Supreme Court observed :".........the question as how treaties can be made by a sovereign State in regard to a cession of national territory and how treaties when made can be implemented would be governed by the provisions in the Constitution of the country. Stated broadly, the treaty-making power would have to be exercised in the manner contemplated by the Constitution and subject to the limitations imposed by it. Whether the treaty made can be implemented by ordinary legislation or by the constitutional amendments will naturally depend on the provisions of the Constitution itself." Ibid, at p. 857.

[59] Besides the provisions of the American Constitution according to which all treaties entered into under the authorities of the U.S. are the Supreme Law of the Land (along with the provisions of the American Constitution and all laws made in pursuance thereof), in America treaties, are divided into two categories-'self-executing' and 'non-self'executing' treaties. Self-executing treaties are those which do not require any specific adoption and directly become applicable in the field of municipal law. Non-self-executing treaties are those treaties which can be applied in the field of municipal law only after their specific adoption by the Congress.

notwithstanding. Such treaties and awards are self-executing. Legislation may nevertheless be passed in aid of implementation but is usually not necessary." [60]

In A.D.M. Jabalpur v. S. Shukla[61] one of the questions, inter alia, for consideration of the Supreme Court was whether Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the two International covenants on Human Rights, 1966 were part of Indian municipal law. By majority the Supreme Court held that they were not part of Indian municipal law. In his dissenting opinion, however, H.R. Khanna, J. held that if there was a conflict between the provisions of an International treaty and the municipal law, it is the latter that will prevail. But if two constructions of the municipal law were possible the court should give that construction as might bring about harmony between municipal law and International law or treaty. In his view, the constitutional provision should be construed in such a way as to avoid conflict with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The view expressed by H.R. Khanna, J. seems to be rational and better.

Thus, in case of conflict between a provision of an International Treaty such as Article 11 of International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights to which India is a party and a provision of a State statute (such as section 51, (Proviso) and Order 21, Rule 37, Civil Procedure Code) it is the latter which shall prevail if the International Treaty in question has neither been specifically adopted in the municipal field nor has gone under transformation. This was held by the Supreme Court of India in Jolly George Varghese v. Bank of Cochin.[62] Krishna Iyer, J., who delivered the judgment of the Court quoted with approval the observation of A.H. Robertson in his book, "Human Rights in National and International Law" at p. 13. Iyer, J., added that Robertson rightly points out that international conventional law must go through the process of transformation into the municipal law before the international treaty can become an internal law.[63] His Lordship further observed : "The remedy for breaches of International law in general is not to be found in the law courts of the State because International Law per se or proprio vigore has not the force of law or authority of civil law till under its inspirational act actual legislation is undertaken. I agree that the Declaration of Human Rights merely sets a common standard of achievement for all people and all nations but cannot create a binding set of rules. Member States may seek through appropriate agencies, to initiate action when these basic rights are violated but individual citizens cannot complain about their breach in municipal courts even if the country concerned has adopted the covenants and ratified the operational Protocol. The individual cannot come to the Court but may complain to the Human Rights Committee, which in turn will set in motion other procedures. In short, the basic human rights enshrined in the International covenants ...... may at best inform judicial institutions and inspire legislative action with member States, but apart from such deep reverence, remedial action at the instance of an aggrieved individual is beyond the area of judicial authority."[64] His Lordship added, "The positive commitment of States parties ignites legislative action at home but does not automatically make the covenant an enforceable part of the corpus juris of India."[65] Justice Krishna Iyer, however, construed section 51 of the Civil Procedure Code in such a way as to avoid conflict with Article 11 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966. He observed :

"Article 11 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights only interdicts imprisonment if that is sought solely on the ground of inability to fulfil the obligation. Section 51 of Civil Procedure Code also declares that if the debtor has no means to pay he cannot be arrested and detained. If he has and still refuses or neglects to honour his obligation or if he commits acts of bad faith, he incurs the liability to imprisonment under

---

[60] I.J.I.L. Vol. 9(1969), p. 244 ; emphasis added.

[61] A.I.R. 1976 S.C. 1207.

[62] A.I.R. 1980 S.C. 470 ; (1980) 2 SCC 360.

[63] See ibid, at p. 473.

[64] A.I.R. 1980 S.C. 474.

[65] Ibid.

Section 51 of the Code, but this does not violate the mandate of Article 11 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. However, if he once had the means but now has not or if he has the money now on which there are other pressing claims, it is violative of the spirit of Article 11 of the Covenant to arrest and confine him to jail so as to coerce him into payment."

Thus Justice Iyer seems to reaffirming the above view of H.R. Khanna, J. in A.D.M. Jabalpur v. Shukla. This shows that in case there is no conflict between municipal law and International law or where two constructions of municipal law are possible, Indian Courts can give effect to International law by giving harmonious construction.

In Civil Rights Vigilance Committee, S.L.S.R.C. College of Law, Bangalore v. Union of India and others,[66] the Kerala High Court followed and quoted the above observation of the Supreme Court in Jolly George's case. The facts in this case were as follows :

Geof Boycott and Geof Cook, the two cricket players of U.K. were included in the M.C.C. team scheduled to visit India between November 1981 and February 1982 to play six matches at different places in India. These two players had links with South Africa which practised policy of apartheid. The Government of India was a party to the Gleneagles Accord of June 12, 1977, entered into by the member countries of the Commonwealth wherein they reaffirmed their full support for the international campaign against apartheid. Boycott and Cook, as seen from the booklet issued in May 1981, by the U.N. under the title "Centre against the Apartheid "were among the sportsmen blacklisted by the U.N. for having participated in sports events in South Affrica. However, the Government of India allowed the English Cricket team including those two players to come to the country and to play matches as scheduled.

The Civil Rights Committee presented a writ petition impugning the said action of the Government of India but the learned single Judge dismissed it holding, inter alia, that such impugned action being an act of state the Court had no jurisdiction to examine its validity and to grant the relief sought in the writ petition. Hence the present appeal was made. The Division Bench of the Karnataka High Court dismissed the appeal. Venkatchalaiah J. who delivered the judgment for himself and D.M. Chandrashekhar, C.J. observed "...... that the provision in Article 51 is not enforceable by any Court and if the Parliament does not enact any law for implementing the obligations under a treaty entered into by the Government of India with foreign countries, courts cannot compel Parliament to make such law. In the absence of such law, court cannot also, in our view enforce obedience of the Government of India to its treaty obligations with foreign countries...the Government of India's obligations under the Cleneagles Accord and obligations attached to its membership of United Nations, cannot be enforced, at the instance of citizens of this country or associations of such citizens, by Courts in India, unless such obligations are made part of the law of this country by means of appropriate legislation."

In Gramophone Company of India Ltd. v. Birendera Bahadur Pandey,[67] Chinnappa Reddy, J. of the Supreme Court observed that if in respect of any principle of international law the Parliament says 'no', the national court cannot say 'yes'. National court shall approve international law only when it does not conflict with national law. In case however the conflict is inevitable, the national law shall prevail.[68]

Present Legal Position.—But the position will be different when there is no conflict between International Conventions and the domestic law. As pointed out by the Supreme Court in Vishaka v. State of Rajasthan,[69] in the absence of domestic law occupying the field to formulate effective measures to check the evil of sexual harassment of working women at all work places, the contents of International Conventions and norms are significant for the purpose of interpretation of the guarantee of gender equality and right to work with human dignity in Articles 14, 15, 19(1)(g) and 21 of the Constitution and the safeguards of sexual harassment implicit therein. Any International Convention not inconsistent with the fundamental rights and in harmony with its spirit must be read into these provisions to enlarge the meaning and content thereof, to promote the object of constitutional guarantee. This is implicit from Article 51(c) and the enabling power of Parliament to enact laws for implementing International Conventions, and norms by virtue of Article 253 read with Entry 14 of the Union List in the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution.

---

[66] A.I.R. 1983 Kant. 85.

[67] A.I.R. 1984 S.C. 667.

[68] Ibid. at p. 671.

[69] AIR 1997 SC 3011.

In this case, the Apex Court was dealing with the problem of harassment of working women. Delivering the judgement of the Three Judge Bench, J. S. Verma, C.J.I., observed that the meaning and content of the fundamental rights guaranteed in the Constitution are of sufficient amplitude to encompass all the facets of gender equality including prevention of sexual harassment abuse. Independence of judiciary forms a part of our constitutional scheme. The International Conventions (especially Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women) and norms are to be read into them in the absence of enacted domestic law occupying the field when there is no inconsistency between them. It is now an accepted rule of judicial construction that regard must be had to International Conventions and norms for construing domestic law when there is no inconsistency between them and there is a void in the domestic law.

In Vineet Narain v. Union of India[70] speaking for the Three Judge Bench, J. S. Verma, C.J.I., observed that there are ample powers conferred by Article 32 read with Article 142 to make orders which have the effect of law by virtue of Article 141 and there is mandate to all authorities to act in aid of the orders of the Supreme Court as provided in Article 144 of the Constitution. In a catena of decisions of the Supreme Court, this power has been recognised and exercised, if need be, by issuing necessary directions to fill the vacuum till such time the legislature steps is to cover the gap or the executive discharges its role.[71] Further, J. S. Verma, C.J.I., referred to Vishakha v. State of Rajasthan,[72] wherein it was pointed out that it is the duty of the executive to fill the vacuum by executive orders because its field is counterminous with that of the legislature and where there is inaction even by the executive, for whatever reason, the judiciary must step in, in exercise of its constitutional obligations under the aforesaid provisions, to provide a solution till such time as the legislature acts to perform its role by enacting proper legislation to cover the field.[73]

In Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A. K. Chopra[74] once again referred with approval the decision in Vishaka v. State of Rajasthan[75] for its "innovative judicial law making process". In the present case, a superior officer of the Corporation was found guilty of molesting and of having tried to physical assault a subordinate female employee. As a punishment, he was dismissed from service. But the High Court held that the occurrence as alleged had not taken place. Though the High Court did not find any fault with the finding as the unbecoming act of delinquent officer or with the conduct of inquiry yet the High Court interfered with punishment of dismissal on the ground that since the delinquent had not "actually molested" and had "not managed" to make physical contact with her, the punishment of removal was not justified. The Supreme Court held that what punishment was required to be imposed in the facts and circumstances of the case was a matter which fell exclusively within the jurisdiction of the competent authority and did not want any interference by the High Court. The entire approach of the High Court had been faulty. The impugned order of the High Court cannot be sustained on this ground alone. Reversing the order of the High Court, the Supreme Court further observed that there is another aspect of the case which is fundamental and goes to the root of the case and concerns the approach of the High Court while dealing with cases of sexual harassment at the place of work of female employee.[76]

---

[70] AIR 1998 SC 889.

[71] Ibid. at pp. 914-915.

[72] 1997 SC 3011 : 1997 AIR SCW 3043.

[73] AIR 1998 SC 889 at p. 916.

[74] AIR 1999 SC 625, 633.

[75] AIR 1997 SC 3011.

Dr. Anand, C-J.I., further observed :

"In cases involving violation of human rights the courts must for ever remain alive to the international instruments and conventions and apply the same to a given case when there is no inconsistency between international norms and the domestic law occupying the field. In the instant case, the High Court appears to have totally ignored the intent and content of the international conventions and norms while dealing with the case."[77]

Earlier in the judgement Dr. Anand, C.J-I., observed :

"There is no gainsaying that each incident of sexual harassment, at the place of work, results in violation of the Fundamental Right to Gender Equality and the Right to Life and Liberty—the two most precious Fundamental Rights guaranteed by the Constitution of India. As early as in 1993 at the ILO seminar held at Manila, it was recognised that sexual harassment of woman at work place was a form 'of gender, discrimination against woman'. The contents of fundamental rights guaranteed in our Constitution are of sufficient amplitude to encompass all facts of gender equality, including prevention of sexual harassment and abuse and courts are under a constitutional obligation to protect and preserve those fundamental rights. The sexual harassment of a female at the place of work is incompatible with the dignity and honour of a female and needs to be eliminated and that there can be no compromise with such violations, admit of no debate. The message of the International instruments such as the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, 1979 (CEDAW) and the Bejing Declaration which directs all State Parties to take appropriate measures to prevent discrimination of all forms against women besides taking steps to protect the honour and dignity of women is loud and clear. The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights contains several provisions particularly important for women. Article 7 recognises her right to fair conditions of work and reflects that women shall not be subjected to sexual harassment at place of work which may vitiate working environment. These international instruments cast an obligation on the Indian State to gender sensitise its laws and the courts are under an obligation to see the message of the international instruments is not allowed to be drowned. The Supreme Court has in numerous cases emphasized that while discussing constitutional requirements, Court and Counsel must never forget the core principle embodied in international conventions and instruments and as far as possible give effect to be principles in those international instruments. The Court are under an obligation to give due regard to International conventions and norms for construing domestic laws more so often when there is no inconsistency between them and there is a void in domestic law."[78]

---

[76] AIR 1999 SC 625 at p. 632.

[77] AIR 1999 SC 625 at p. 634.

[78] Ibid; see also with advantage Prem Shankar v. Delhi Administration, AIR 1980 SC 1535; Mackninnon Mackenzie & Co. v. Andrey D. Costa, (1987) 4 SCC 469: (1987) 2 JT (SC) 34, AIR 1987 SC 1281; Sheela Barse v. Secretary Children's Aid Society (1987) 3 SCC 50, 54; AIR 1987 SC 656, 658-659; Vishaka v. State of Rajasthan, (1997) 7 JT (SC) 384: 1997 AIR SCW 3043 : AIR 1997 SC 3011. People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India (1997) 2 JT (SC) 311 : 1997 AIR SCW 1234 and D. K. Basu v. State of West Bengal, (1997) 1 SCC 416, 438 : 1997 AIR SCW 233, 248-249.

Last but not the least in Chairman, Railway Board & others v. Mrs. Chandrima Das and others,[79] the Supreme Court aptly observed that the International Covenants and Declarations as adopted by the United Nations have to be respected by all signatory states and the meaning given to the words in such declarations (for example Universal and Declaration and Declaration on the Elimination of Violence Against Women) and covenants have to such as would help in effective implementation of those rights. The applicability of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and principles thereof may have to be read, if need be, into the domestic jurisprudence.[80]

On the basis of the above discussion the legal position may be summarised as follows :

It is the obligation of the courts not to ignore and to apply the provisions of International Conventions and Instruments on Human Rights in general and International Covenants in particular to interpret the constitutional provision relating to human rights. If there is a conflict between a provision of an international treaty and a provision of domestic law, the provisions of the domestic law shall prevail. But if two constructions of the provision of domestic law are possible, the court should give harmonious construction so as to be in accord with international treaty. If no domestic law is occupying the field or there is void in domestic law, and the constitutional provisions (fundamental rights) are of sufficient or wide amplitude to encompass the provision of international treaty, the provisions of international treaty can be read into the constitutional provisions. It may be noted here that what is true of human rights is also true of international law in general. It is on the basis of the above legal position that the relationship between the International Conventions or treaties and Indian law including the Constitution of India, which is the supreme law of the land, has to be appreciated and understood.

From the above discussion the following conclusions may be derived .[81]

(1) Customary rules of international law are treated to be part of domestic law in a large number of states and in case they do not conflict with existing municipal law, there is no need of their specific adoption.

(2) Only in a few states, customary rules of international law, without specific adoption are applied by municipal courts even in case of conflict with municipal statute or judge-made law.

(3) As regards practice relating to the application of treaties within the municipal sphere practice of state is not uniform.

(4) In large number of states, municipal courts give priority to the application of municipal law, irrespective of the applicability of rules of international law and the question of any breach of international law is left to be settled at the diplomatic level.

Concept of opposability.—The concept of opposability has been explained by Starke[82] with the help of the following illustration :—

"In a dispute before an international tribunal between two states, A and B, where State A relies upon some ground in support of its claim, State B may seek to invoke as against i.e. 'oppose' to State A some rule, institution or regime under State 'B' domestic law in order to defeat the ground of claim set up by the State A. As a general principle, if the domestic rule, institution or regime is in accordance with international law, this may be legitimately 'opposed' to State A in order to negate its ground of claim but if not in accordance with international domestic rule, institution, or regime may not be so 'opposed'.

---

[79] AIR 2000 SC 988.

[80] Ibid at pp. 996-997.

[81] See J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law (Butterworths, Singapore, 1989) pp. 86-87.

[82] Ibid. at p. 90.

But for the applicability to this rule in respect of a treaty rule, it is necessary that the state against which rule is being invoked must be a party to treaty. In North Sea Continental Shelf case,[83] it was held that Article 6 of the 'Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, 1958 containing the rule of equidistance for the delimitations of continental shelf common to adjacent states, was not opposable to German Federal Republic which had not ratified the convention. But in a subsequent case if a state which had ratified the convention including Article 6 without reservation, Article 6 would be opposable to such a state.

It may be noted here that even if a rule of domestic law is held to be non-opposable, the rule concerned will not cease to be valid rule in the domestic domain. The position will, however, be different if the domestic rule itself is held to be unconstitutional.

---

[83] I.C.J. Reports 1969 p. 3 at p. 41.

Part II

THE LAW OF PEACE

CHAPTER 8

SUBJECTS OF INTERNATIONAL LAW AND THE PLACE OF INDIVIDUAL IN INTERNATIONAL LAW

Subjects of International Law*

"A subject of rules is a being upon which the rules confer rights and capacity and imposes duties and responsibility ; whereas an object enjoys and is burdened by no such competence. The law commands its subjects but it merely regulates the use and disposition of objects"[1] Ordinarily international law deals with the rights and duties of the States. Ordinarily its rules are for States. Generally it is the States who enter into treaties with each other and are thus bound by its provisions. This does not, however, mean that other entities or individuals are outside the scope of international law. International law applies upon individuals and certain non-State entities in addition to States.

Various theories regarding subjects of International Law

Following are the three main theories prevalent in regard to the subjects of international law :

(1) States alone are subjects of international law.

(2) Individuals alone are the subjects of international law.

(3) States are the main subjects of international law, but to a lesser extent individuals and certain non-State entities, have certain rights and duties under international law.

*1. Only States are subjects of International Law.—Some jurists have expressed the view that only States are the subjects of international law. In their view, international law regulates the conduct of States and only States alone are the subjects of international law. As pointed out by Percy E. Corbett : "The triumph of positivism in the late eighteenth century made the individual an object, not a subject of international law. This law more and more emphasised the separateness of States, making their sovereignty, indeed its basic principles." [2]

Criticism.—This view has been subjected to severe criticism by jurists. This theory fails to explain the case of slaves and pirates. Under international law, slaves have been conferred upon some rights by the Community of States. Similarly pirates are treated as the enemies of mankind and they may be punished for piracy by the States. But the jurists who subscribe to the view that only States are subjects of international law to reconcile these exceptions by contending that they are not the subjects, but objects of international law. They have argued that the treaties which confer certain rights over slaves and pirates impose certain obligations upon the States. If there is no such obligation of the States, the slaves cannot have any rights under international law. Hence the exponents of this theory regard pirates, slaves, etc., as the objects of international law. Prof. Oppenheim also subscribes to this view. In his view : "Since the Law of Nations is primarily a law between States, States are to that extent, the only subjects of the Law of Nations." [3] This view finds mention in the eighth edition of Oppenheim's book. In the ninth edition, the editors of his book have changed this view. According to the view expressed in the ninth edition, "States are primarily, but not exclusively, the subject of international law. To the extent that bodies other than States directly possess some rights, power and duties in international law they can be regarded as subjects of international law, possessing international personality." [4] Further, "International law is no longer if ever was concerned solely with states. Many of its rules are directly concerned with regulating the position and activities of individuals, and many more indirectly affect them." [5] Thus, it is wrong to say that individuals are not the subjects to international law. In the view of Prof. Schwarzenberger, it is contradiction in terms to say that individuals are not the subjects but objects of international law because how can it be expected that individuals who are the basis of society may only be objects of international law. Thus, as a matter of fact, individuals are also the subjects of International law. In Reparation for injuries suffered in the service of the U.N.,[6] the International Court of Justice held "that the United Nations has the capacity to bring an international claim against the State for obtaining reparation when an agent of the U.N. suffers injury in the performance of his duties in circumstances involving the responsibility of State". The "Court, by implication, rejected the proposition that only States are subjects of international law".[7] Thus the traditional view that States only are the subjects of international law is not a rule of modern international law.[8]

---

* See for I.A.S. (1971), Q. No. 3 ; P.C.S. (1984) Q. 10(a) ; P.C.S. (1985) Q. 1 ; IAS (2007_Q. 5(d).

[1] D. J. Latham Brown, Public International Law (London, 1970), p. 234.

 See for PC.S. (1972), Q. No. 2, C.S.E. (1992) Q. No. 5(b) ; UPPCS (2007) Q. 5.

[2] Percy E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (Princeton, New Jersey, 1971), p. 178.

[3] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 636.

It is now generally recognised that besides States, public international organisations, individuals and certain other non-State entities are also the subjects of international law.

2. *Only individuals are the subjects of international law—Just contrary to the above theory, there are certain jurists who have expressed the view that in the ultimate analysis of international law it will be evident that only individuals are the subjects of international law. The chief exponent of this theory is Prof. Kelsen. Even before Kelsen, Westlake had remarked, "The duties and rights of the States are only the duties and rights of men who compose them." [9] Kelsen has analysed the concept of State and expressed the view that it is a technical legal concept and includes the rules of law applicable on the persons living in a definite territory. Hence, under international law the duties of the States are ultimately the duties of the individuals. Truly speaking there is no difference between international law and State law. In his view, both laws apply on the individuals and they are for the individuals. He, however, admits that the difference is only this that the State law applies on individuals 'intermediately' whereas international law applies upon the individuals 'mediately'.

Criticism.—Kelsen's views appear to be logically sound. But so far as the practice of the States is concerned it is seen that the primary concern of the international law is with the rights and duties of the States. From time to time certain treaties have been entered into which have conferred certain rights upon individuals. Although the statute of the International Court of Justice adheres to the traditional view that only States can be parties to international proceedings, a number of other international instruments have recognised the procedural capacity of the individual. This was the case not only in the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles relating to the jurisdiction of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunals, but also in other treaties such as the Polish-German Convention of 1922 relating to Upper Silesia in which—as was subsequently held by the Upper Silesians Mixed Tribunal—the independent procedural status of individuals as claimants before an international agency was recognized even against the State of which they were national. In the sphere of substantive law, the Permanent Court of International Justice recognized, in the advisory opinion relating to the Postal Service in Danzig that there is nothing in international law to prevent individuals from acquiring directly rights under a treaty provided that this is the intention of the contracting parties. A considerable number of decisions of municipal courts rendered subsequently to the advisory opinion of the Permanent Court expressly affirmed that possibility.[10] Reference may be made to the 1965 Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States. Through this convention it is provided that disputes between the States and nationals of other States who invest money will be resolved in accordance with the provisions of the said Convention. It is clear from this example that the view of Kelsen that international law applies upon the individuals only 'mediately' does not seem to be correct. There are many examples wherein international law applies upon individuals not only 'mediately' but also directly. It is wrong to say that pirates, slaves, etc. are only objects of international law. To say that they are only the objects of international law is nothing but to distort the facts.

---

[4] Oppenheim's International Law, Vol. I, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Ninth Edition, Longman Group UK Limted and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, p. 16.

[5] Ibid, at p. 846.

[6] I.C.J. Rep. (1949), p. 174.

[7] A.O. Obilade, "The individual as a Subject of International Law", I.J.I.L. Vol. 14 (1974), p. 90 at pp. 91-92.

[8] Ibid, at p. 98.

* See for I.A.S (1969), Q. No. 2 ; I.A.S. (1966), Q. No. 2 ; for elaboration see also the third view and conclusion given below ; P.C.S. (1988) Q. 1. See also matter discussed under the heading "Place of Individuals in International Law" ; C.S.E. (1987) Q. 5.

[9] Collected Papers (1914), Vol. I, p. 78.

But as Philip C. Jessup has aptly remarked : "But while I agree...that States are not the only subjects of international law, I do not go to the other extreme and say...... that individuals are the only subjects." [11] Although, individual possesses a number of rights under international law, his procedural capacity to enforce the observance of these rights is grossly deficient. In most of the cases claim on his behalf can be brought only by the State whose national he is and as pointed out by the Permanent Court of International Justice. "It is an elementary principle of international law that a State is entitled to protect its subjects when injured by acts contrary to international law committed by another State, from whom they have been unable to obtain satisfaction through the ordinary channels. By taking up the case of one of its subjects and by resorting to diplomatic action or international judicial proceedings on his behalf, a State is in reality asserting its own rights—its right to ensure, in the person of its subjects respect for the rules of international law"[12] one may, however, still argue that the substantive right belongs to the individual because the amount of the claim is based on the injury suffered by the individual and normally the award is given to him. It may, therefore, be concluded that the extreme view that the individuals alone are the subjects of international law cannot be accepted. Individuals are now recognized as subject of international law and they can now (although in a very few rather negligible cases) even claim rights against States (including his own),[13] but their procedural capacity to enforce their rights is grossly deficient. In practice, International law for its major part still deals with the rights and duties of States. Therefore, it would be absurd to contend that States are not the subjects of international law. The correct position therefore is that besides States, individuals, public international organisations and some non-State entities are also the subjects of International law.

(3) *States, individual and certain non-State Entities are Subjects.—The third view not only combines the first and second views but goes a step ahead to include international organisations and certain other non-State entities as subjects of international law. This view undoubtedly appears to be far better than the first two views. Following arguments may be put forward in support of this view :

(i) In the present time, several treaties have conferred upon individuals certain rights and duties. International Covenants on Human Rights and 1965 Convention on the

---

[10] See Survey of International Law in Relation to the Work of Codification of the International Law Commission, Memorandum submitted by the Secretary-General of the U.N. Document A/CN. 4/1, Rev. I, Feb. 10, 1949, pp. 19-20.

[11] Transnational Law (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1956), p. 3. In a later article, Judge Jessup wrote : "......Our international legal realm no longer concentrates on relationship between States themselves. The break-through began, perhaps when it was recognised that 'international law', like national law, must be directly applicable to the individual, it must not continue to be insulated through the tradition that it dealt only with the rights and duties of States". "The Present State of Transnational Law", in the Present State of International Law (1973), p. 339 at p. 343.

[12] The Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions Case (1924). Manely O. Hudson, World Court Reports (1934), Vol. I, p. 297.

[13] See for Example European Convention on Human Rights, 1950 and International Covenants on Human Rights, 1966 and the Optional Protocol and also U.N. Commission on Human Rights.

* See also P.C.S. (1978), Q. No. 2.

Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States deserve a special mention in this connection.

(ii) In Danzing Railways Official Case,[14]* the Permanent Court of Justice ruled that if in any treaty the intention of the parties is to confer certain rights upon some individuals, then international law will recognize such rights and will enforce them. In this case, Poland had acquired, under an international agreement, Danzing Railway Co. Under the said agreement Poland had agreed to provide certain facilities to the officials of the said railways company. Subsequently, Poland refused to provide those facilities to the officials of the Company. Poland argued that since the said agreement was in the form of an international treaty, it created rights and duties only in respect of the parties to the treaty and hence the individuals as such cannot possess any rights under the said treaty. The Permanent Court of International Justice rejected the contention of Poland and ruled that if the intention of the parties is to confer certain rights upon individuals then international law will not only recognize such rights of the individual but may also enforce them.

(iii) 1949 Geneva Convention on the Prisoners of War has conferred certain rights upon the Prisoners of War. These rights have been mentioned in Chapter on "Laws of Land Warfare."

(iv) The Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals propounded the principle that international law may impose obligations directly upon the individuals. As observed by the Nuremberg Tribunal, "Crimes against International law are committed by men, not by abstract entities and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provisions of international law be enforced."

(v) The Genocide Convention of 1948 has imposed certain duties directly upon the individuals. According to the convention, persons guilty of crime of genocide may be punished, no matter whether they are the head of the State, high officials or ordinary individuals.

So far 146 countries have become parties to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, 1948.

(vi) In addition to the above example, a new trend or movement has started in the international field under which some rights are conferred upon individuals even against the States. A glaring example of this is the European Convention on Human Rights in 1950. Under the provisions of the said convention, European Commission and the European Courts were established. The European Commission is entitled to investigate the violation of human rights. It may, however, be noted that the case may go to the European Court on Human Rights only with the consent of the State concerned. The International Covenants on Human Rights, 1966, and the Optional Protocol represent the culmination of the benign trend (so far as human rights are concerned) that individual can claim rights directly (i.e. without the medium of the State) under international law.[15] It may also be noted that an individual who is the victim of the violation of human rights and whose State is the member of the U.N. may send a petition regarding violation of human rights by his own State to the U.N. Commission on Human Rights.

(vii) It is now generally agreed that international organisations are also the subjects of international law. In this connection the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice in the case of 'Reparation for Injuries Suffered in the Services of United Nations' may be cited. In this case the International Court of Justice decided that the United Nations is an International Person under international law. In the words of the Court "...... what it does mean is that it (U.N.) is a subject of international law and capable of possessing rights and duties and it has capacity to maintain its rights by bringing international claims." [16]

---

[14] P.C.I.J. (1928), Series B. No. 15.

* See for I.A.S. (1974), Q. No. 3(b) ; I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 12 (d).

 Asked in I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 2 ; For answer see also the two views regarding the subjects of international law discussed earlier in this Chapter.

[15] For a detailed study of these covenants and the Optional Protocol ; see Chapter on "Human Rights" (Chapter 25).

(viii) In regard to the international criminal law, the law-making treaties have imposed certain obligations upon the individuals and the States have consented to it. In this connection, Narcotic Drugs Convention, 1961, Hague Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Seizure of Aircrafts, 1970, etc. deserve special mention.

(ix) There are certain international treaties in regard to the minorities. These treaties have conferred upon minorities certain rights. The example of Articles 297 and 304 of the treaty of Versailles, 1919, may be cited in this connection. In some cases the protectorate States may also be treated as subjects of international law. Article 8 of the Constitution of the World Health Organization permits such States to become associate member. International Law also permits the recognition of insurgents. Bangladesh became a member of WHO long before it was admitted as a member of the U.N.

Percy E. Corbett has rightly written : "To me it has long meant that we are witnessing a transition in international legal development from a prolonged stage in which the predominant, not to say exclusive, concern was the regulation of the conduct of States as distinct entities, to one in which equal attention is given to promoting the growth of a body of world law transcending States, and applicable on a footing of equality to individuals, corporations, international organisations, and State"[17] Thus States are not the only subjects of international law. No doubt they are still the main subjects and the bulk of international law concerns with their conduct and relations but in view of the developing and changing character of international law, international organisations, some non-State entities, individuals are also the subjects of international law.

Place of Individuals in International Law*

As pointed out earlier, individuals are also treated to be the subjects of international law although they enjoy lesser rights than States under international law. Thus, "It is no longer possible, as a matter of positive law, to regard states as the only subjects of international law, and there is an increasing disposition to treat individuals, within a limited sphere, as subjects of international law." [18] In the beginning they were accepted as subjects of international law as an exception of the general rule, and number of jurists treated them as objects rather than the subjects of international law. This view has now been discarded. In the recent times, several treaties have been concluded wherein rights have been conferred and duties have been imposed upon the individuals. Some of the provisions of the international law under which rights have been conferred upon individuals and obligations that have been imposed upon them are as follows :—

(1) Pirates.—Under International law pirates are treated as enemies of mankind. Hence every State is entitled to apprehend them and punish them. Thus under international law it is the obligation of the parties not to commit piracy.

(2) Harmful acts of individuals.—For the amicable and cordial relation of the States it is necessary that the individuals should not be involved in such acts as may prove detrimental for the good relations among States. Therefore, under international law there are several such provisions which provide that the persons who commit such crimes may be punished. For example, if a person causes harm to the ambassador of another State, then under international law he deserves to be given stringent punishment. A leading case on the point is the Ex parte Petroff, 1971, decided by the Supreme Court of Australia, wherein two persons, who were found guilty of throwing explosive substances on the Soviet Chancery, were convicted.

---

[16] I.C.J. Rep. (1949) p. 174.

[17] Percy E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (1971), p. 184 : see also W. Friedmann, Law in a Changing Society (First Indian Reprint, 1970), p. 331.

* See for P.C.S (1972), Q. No. 2 : For answer see also the theories regarding subjects of International law discussed earlier, P.C.S. (1985) Q. 10(a) ; C.S.E. 91987) Q. 5(b) ; UPPCS (2001) Q. 5(c) ; IAS (2003) Q. 5 (a).

[18] Oppenheim's International Law, note 4, at pp. 848-849.

(3) Foreigners.—To some extent international law also regulates the conduct of the foreigners. According to international law, it is the duty of each State to give to them those rights which it confers upon its own citizens.

(4) War criminals.—War criminals can be punished under international law. This conception is based on the principle that rules relating to war crime are not only for the States, but individuals are also bound by them. Nuremberg and Tokyo Tribunals have established the principle in unequivocable and unambiguous terms that since crimes under international law are committed by individuals, only by punishing them the provisions of international law can be enforced.

(5) Espionage.—Espionage is a crime under international law. Hence, when the spies are apprehended, they may be punished.

(6) Under some treaties individuals have been conferred upon some rights whereby they can claim compensation or damages against the States. For example, the Treaty of Varsailles, 1919, provided under Art. 297 that any individual could file suit against Germany for compensation or damages.

(7) The United Nations Charter has also given a place of importance to the rights of individuals. The preamble of United Nations Charter begins with the words, "Peoples of the United Nations". This is not incidental but deliberate and meaningful. There are a number of provisions of the U.N. Charter such as Article 1(3), Article 13(1)(b), Article 55(c),Article 62(3), Article 68 and Article 76 (c) which deal with individuals. Besides this, the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948. This Declaration mentions in detail the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individuals. Moreover, in 1948, the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted the Genocide Convention. This convention imposes an obligation upon the individuals in respect of the crimes of genocide. It is, therefore, clear that the United Nations Organisation has given much significance to the rights of individuals.

(8) Besides the above-mentioned examples, some very important steps are being taken in respect of the rights of individuals under international law. International law now confers upon the individuals certain rights not only 'mediately' but 'immediately'. An example of this is Convention on the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and the Nationals of other States. As is clear from its very name, the persons who invest their money in foreign countries have been conferred upon certain rights against the State concerned.

(9) The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 and the Optional Protocol confer rights directly upon the individuals. International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 has been ratified by 168 countries. Besides this, optional Protocol to Civil and Political Rights has been ratified by as many as 115 countries as of September, 2013. The U.N. Commission of Human Rights (which has now been replaced by Human Rights Council) have enabled the individuals to send petitions even against their own States. The Human Rights Council has replaced U.N. Commission of Human Rights. Human Rights Council consists of 47 members. It has come into force since 19 June, 2006.

Conclusion : "States are becoming increasingly realistic in acknowledging the position of the individual in the legal order. It seems that the basis of law is being shaken. International law today cannot without qualification be described as the law between States .... The individual has become a subject of international law not having the same quality as a State but capable of asserting his rights himself before some international tribunals although lacking procedural capacity to bring actions in most cases. Article 34 of the International Court of Justice should be amended in order that individuals may have access to the court." [19] Further, "The legal order will continue to be imperfect as long as it faces new challenges such as apartheid and modern technological advance, and the individual as subject of international law will continue to play an important role in the development of the law." [20] Thus slowly and gradually individuals are occupying place of importance under international law. They are no more mere objects of international law. They are in fact the subjects of international law. It cannot, however, be denied that even today States are the main subjects of international law and the bulk of international law deals with their rights and duties. To conclude in the words of Wright, "Justice requires that the power of the States be curbed so far practicable in consideraiton of these other interests. In a distant future, these interests, especially the interests of the individuals for whose welfare other institutions exist in both democratic and socialist theory, may achieve a better balance in Universal Law with the national interest of Sovereign States." [21] [19] A.O. Obilade, "The Individual as Subject of International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 14(1974) p. 90 at 98.

---

---

[20] A.O. Obilade, "The Individual as Subject of International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 14 (1974) p. 90 at 98, 99.

[21] Q. Wright, "Towards a Universal Law or Mankind", Columbia Law Review, Vol. 63 (1963), pp. 445-46.

CHAPTER 9

NATURE OF STATE AND DIFFERENT KINDS OF STATES AND NON-STATE ENTITIES

State is the main subject of international law. It is very difficult to define the term 'State', but certain jurists have made their endeavours to this respect. According to Salmond, State is a community of people which has been established for some objectives such as internal order and external security.[1] In the view of Lawrence, State is a society which is politically organised and its members are bound with each other by being under some central authority and most of the people automatically follow the rules of this central authority.[2] As pointed out by Oppenheim, the existence of State is possible only when people of State have settled under highest government authority and habitually follow its orders.[3] According to Prof. H.L.A. Hart, "The expression 'a State' is .... a way of referring to two facts : First, that a population inhabiting in a territory live under that form of ordered government provided by a legal system which its characteristic structure of Legislature, Courts, and primary rules ; and secondly, that the government enjoys a vaguely defined degree or independence." [4] Starke has rightly pointed out that an ideal definition of the term 'State' is not possible. But in the modern period it is finally settled as to what are the essential elements of State.[5]

Essential Elements of a State.—According to Article 1 of Montevideo Convention, 1933, "The State as a person of international law should possess the following qualifications : (a) A permanent population ; (b) A defined territory ; (c) A Government ; and (d) Capacity to enter into relations with other States". Oppenheim[6] has pointed out the following essential elements of a State : (1) Population ; (2) A definite territory ; (3) Government ; and (4) Capacity to enter into relation with other States. The famous jurist Holland has added one more essential element, namely, to some extent, 'civilization' because of which the State becomes the member of international community. Article 4 of Montevideo Convention on the Rights and Duties of States provides that States are juridically equal, enjoy the same rights and have equal capacity in their exercise. The rights of each one do not depend upon power which it possesses to assure its exercise, but upon the simple fact of existence of a person under international law. Further Article 6 provides that the recognition of a State merely signifies that the State which recognises it accepts the personality of the other with all the rights and duties determined by International Law. Recognition is unconditional and irrevocable.

Functions of States.—Modern period has witnessed revolutionary changes in regard to functions of a State. Previously there was the conception of a police State, according to which, the essential functions of a State were to maintain internal peace and order and to defend it from external aggression. It cannot be denied that even today these are the essential functions of a State but in the present period the conception of State has undergone significant changes. Instead of the conception of police State, the present conception is that of a welfare State. That is to say, for the benefit of the people, State has to perform many social, economic, educational and cultural functions. But these functions do not come under the category of essential functions. They are in fact subsidiary functions. Nevertheless, these are also the functions of a State in the modern time and the importance of these functions is constantly increasing.

---

[1] Op. cit. Salmond on Jurisprudence, pp. 129-30.

[2] T.J. Lawrence. The Principles of International Law, Seventh Edition, p. 48.

[3] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 118.

[4] H.L.A. Hart, The Concept of Law (Oxford, 1961), p. 216.

[5] J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition, (Butterworths, Singapore 1989), p. 95.

[6] Oppenheim, Supra Note 3, at pp. 118-19.

Concept of Sovereignty*

In the view of jurists, only sovereign States are entitled to be the members of the Family of Nations. According to Austin, "If a determinate human superior, not in the habit of obedience to a like superior, receive habitual obedience from the bulk of a given society, that determinate superior is sovereign in that society, and the society, (including determinate superior) is a society political and independent". In relation between States, 'Sovereignty has been defined by Max Huber in Island of Palmas Arbitration. In his words : "Sovereignty in the relation between States signifies independence. Independence in regard to a portion of the globe is the right to exercise therein to the exclusion of any other State, the functions of a State." [7] In the modern period the credit of propounding the concept of sovereignty goes to John Bodin who in 1576 in his book, "De-Republic" has put forward the conception of sovereignty. According to him, the essential element of sovereignty is the law-making power of the sovereign. Since the sovereign makes the law, he does not intend to bind himself by that law. But he hastened to add that the sovereign is however bound by the Divine Law. Slowly and gradually this concept of sovereignty became distorted and it became synonymous with absolution. In sixteenth century, Hobbes expressed that by sovereignty is meant the absolute and complete power of the sovereign. It came to be defined as the Supreme power over a definite territory unrestricted by any earthly power. Every sovereign State can exercise the functions of State, to the exclusion of all other States. In other words, it exercises complete sovereignty within its territories. Since territories of a State are circumscribed by its boundaries, it has been rightly said, "Boundaries are one of the most significant manifestation of State territorial sovereignty". According to Austin, sovereignty is indivisible and illimitable.

In International law of a good example of the application of the principle sovereignty is the 'Theory of auto-limitation'. According to the theory, States follow international law because they have by their consent reduced their powers. This principle is based on the principle of State sovereignty. The chief exponents of this principle were Anzilotti and Triepel. It has been pointed out in an earlier chapter that the theory of auto-limitation suffers from several defects and does not appear to be correct. It has been severely criticized by many jurists. In the modern period, there have been revolutionary changes in respect of the theory of sovereignty of States. In the present time it is not proper to say that State sovereignty is indivisible and illimitable. Ordinarily over one and the same territory there can be only one sovereign. In practice, however, there can be several exceptions such as[8]—

(1) the first and probably the only real exception is the condominium which exists between two or more States exercising sovereignty jointly over a territory, e.g., condominium of Austria and Prussia over Schleswig Holstein Lanenburg from 1864 till 1866, condominium of Great Britain and Egypt over Sudan from 1898 to 1955 and condominium of Great Britain and France over the New Hebrides (now the independent State of Vanuatu) can be cited as example.

(2) One State exercising sovereignty which is, in law vested elsewhere, i.e., where a territory is administered by a foreign power with the consent of the owner State. For example, Great Britain exercised sovereignty over Turkish Island from 1878 to 1914.

(3) The third exception is that of giving territory on lease or pledge by the owner State to a foreign power. For example, in 1998 China leased the district of Kiaochow to Germany, Wei-Hai-Wei and the land opposite the Island of Hongkong to Great Britain, Kuang Chouwan to France and Port Arthur to Russia.

(4) Where the use, occupation and control of the territory are granted in perpetuity by the grantor State to the other State. For example, in 1903 the Republic of Panama

---

* See also for C.S.E. (1991) Q. 6(a) ; C.S.E. (1993) Q. 5(c).

[7] See A.J.I.L. (1928), Vol. 22 at p. 875.

[8] See Oppenheim's International Law, Vol. I, edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Ninth Edition, Longman Group UK Limited and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, pp. 565-572.

transferred to the United States of America a ten-mile territory for construction, administration and defence of the Panama Canal.

(5) The next exception is that of a federal State because sovereignty is divided between a federal State and its member States.

(6) The last exception is that of a mandated or trust territory. The State, which is given a mandate or a trust territory, exercises sovereignty over it although the territory is not its own.

In the present time, States have accepted many restrictions under international treaties and in international institution whereby they have impliedly surrendered a part of their sovereignty. For example, the members of the United Nations and International Labour Organization, have accepted many obligations because of which their sovereignty has ceased to be illimitable and indivisible. Thus, "Sovereignty" has a much restricted meaning today than in eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, when, with the emergence of powerful highly nationalised States, few limits on State's autonomy were acknowledged. At the present time there is hardly a State which in the interests of the International community, has not accepted restrictions on its liberty of action. Thus most states are members of the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation (ILO), in relation to which they have undertaken obligations limiting their unfettered discretion in matters of international policy. Therefore, it is probably more accurate today to say that the sovereignty of a State means the residuum of power which it possesses within the confines laid down by international law." [9] Judge Lauterpacht has also rightly remarked : "International Law, whether codified or not, implies essentially a restriction of the sovereignties of States whose relations it governs." [10] Though this is true, even new States do not accept this sound proposition in theory as well as practice. There is much force in the following words of Prof. Edward Hambro : "In the world of the twentieth century no frontal attack on national sovereignty will avail. The charter is based on the Sovereign equality of the Members. But—and this is very important indeed—no rule prevents the States from disposing of part of their freedom of action for the common good." [11] 'Sovereignty has been defined[12] as "the supreme authority" in an independent political Society. It is essential, indivisible and illimitable. However, as remarked by Sabyasachi Mukharji, C.J. in Uhion of India v. Sukumar Sen Gupta.[13] "it is now considered and accepted as both divisible and limitable and we must recognise that it should be so. Sovereignty is limited externally by the possibility of general resistance. Internal Sovereignty is paramount power over all action within, and is limited by the nature of power itself."

His Lordship quoted with approval the above-mentioned passage from Starke's book and observed : "Any State in the modern times has to acknowledge and accept customary restraints on its sovereignty inasmuch as no State can exist independently and without reference to other States. Under the general international law the concept of inter-dependence of States has come to be accepted." [14]

Further, "......... the complexities of modern developed societies need peaceful co-existence, if the world is to survive. Amicable and peaceful settlement of boundary disputes are in the interest of international community. The older and absolute ideas of sovereignty and independence has thus necessarily to be modified in the dawn of the 21st century." [15]

---

9. Starke, Supra Note 5, at 100 ; see also Oppenheim, Supra Note 3, at p. 123.
10. H. Lauterpacht, "Codification and Development of International Law", A.J.I.L., Vol. 49 (1955), p. 16 at p. 38.
11. Edward Hambro, "International use of the sea bed" in the Law of the sea, edited by Lewis M. Alexander (1973), p. 216 at 219.
12. See P.G. Osborne, A Concise Law Dictionary, 5th Edition, p. 297.
13. AIR 1990 SC 1692 at p. 1701.
14. Ibid, at p. 1706.
15. Ibid. at pp. 1707-1708.

It may be noted that the world today (i.e. in 1994) bears little resemblance to the world of 1945 when the U.N. system was set up. A recent study, "Tomorrow's United Nations" has pointed out : "We live in a period when governments, the basic units of the U.N. system, have less and less control over the forces that are shaping the future. Nationalism and sovereignty are increasingly problematic concepts. Their relationship to international responsibility and to the realities and hard facts of contemporary life are inevitably changing."

Since the Gulf War (1991) attempts have been made to bring about changes in the traditional concept of national sovereignty. Being encouraged by the United Nations intervention on behalf of the Kurdish people of Iraq, several western countries have expressed the view, in the last session of the General Assembly, that internal disorder and violations of human rights by Governments should warrant collective international action through the United Nations. France went a step ahead and suggested that the charter of the United Nations be amended to accommodate the envisaged activist role of the world body. But this view found enthusiasm for the U.N. as an agent of collective security in the quicksilver of shifting international relations is being viewed with alarm by developing countries including India and China. Both India and China did their best to dissuade the Security Council from passing a resolution allowing the Security Council interference in the civil war in Yugoslavia under the reasoning that it was a threat to international peace and security.

In his address to the U.N. General Assembly, Mr. Roland Dumes, Foreign Minister of France, cited the example of the U.N. intervention on behalf of the Kurdish people and said that every people that requested the right to self-determination and Sovereignty were entitled to it so long as they did it through forums like the U.N. He added that the European Community had showed that lasting peace could be established only through "the sharing of national sovereignties". The developing countries, however, view with alarm and fear this new found enthusiasm of the western countries for the activist role of the U.N. because in their view, and rightly too, the new ideas contains too many elements from the concept of "empire" and its mission of civilizing the Colonized world. Thus the traditional concept of national sovereignty is under a serious strain. It is in the interest of the developing countries to watch and respond continuously the new ideas relating to sovereignty especially the enthusiasm for activist role of the U.N. in respect of human rights.

Principle of the Equality of States*

As the members of the international community, in principle, all States are equal. This equality is due to their international personality. Despite the dissimilarity in respect of their territories, population, power, civilization, prosperity etc. all States as international persons are equal. According to Oppenheim,[16] following are the consequences of this legal equality :

(a) When any question is to be decided by consent, each State is entitled to have one vote. (But there are exceptions to this rule, such as the veto of the permanent members of the Security Council).

(b) Legally, the importance of the votes of the weak as well as strong nation is same. There are some exceptions of this rule also.

(c) No State can exercise jurisdiction over another State. The Courts have enforced this rule in many cases such as Duff Development Co. Ltd. v. Govt. of Kelantan.[17] The

---

* See for I.A.S. (1975), Q. No. 8(a) ; I.A.S. (1958), Q. No. 4 ; P.C.S. (1966), Q. No. 7 ; For Sovereign equality under the U.N. See also matter discussed under the heading "Principles of the United Nations" under the Chapter "Principles, Purposes, Membership, etc. of the U.N." ; See also for P.C.S. (1978), Q. No. 4.

[16] See Oppenheim, Supra, note 3, at pp.263-67.

[17] (1924) AC 79.

Parliament Belge,[18] Mighell v. Sultan of Johore,[19] De Haber v. The Queen of Portugal.[20] The Exchange v. McFaddon,[21] Vavasseur v. Krupp,[22] and, The Constitution.[23]

(d) Generally, the Courts of a State cannot challenge the validity of the official acts of another State so far as these acts are related to the jurisdiction of that State. A.M. Luther Co. v. Sagor & Co.,[24] Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. Comptosird Escompte,[25] Banque Internationale v. Goukassow,[26] and Underhill v. Hernandez,[27] deserve mention in this connection.

Although in principle all States are equal, in reality they are not equal. They are unequals in respect of their respective power, territory, property, etc.[28] The U.N. Charter is based on the principle of 'sovereign equality' of States but as pointed out by P.A. Sorokin, in reality great powers are unequal to small States (and legally also because they possess the power of veto under the charter).[29] Thus the equality of States is a general principle but there are several important exceptions of this principle.

A significant departure from the principle of equality was made under the Covenant of the League of Nations. It manifested itself in the composition of the Council and to some extent, in the principles relating to the membership of the Governing Body of the International Labour Organisation. The principle of 'the sovereign equality of its members' constitutes a significant landmark in the gradual modification of the traditional doctrine of equality of States, while the principle of equality of States has been strictly adhered to in the composition of the General Assembly, it has been greatly diluted in the composition of the Security Council. The principle of sovereign equality of States has also been modified significantly in the Constitution of the World Bank, International Monetary Bank and some other specialized agencies. The principle of sovereign equality of State under the U.N. Charter has been discussed in a little greater detail under the heading 'Principles of the U.N.' under the chapter entitled Purposes, Principles, Membership, etc. of the U.N."

Rights and Duties of States*

The doctrine of basic or fundamental rights and duties was enunciated by the naturalist writers. In their view, the doctrine of fundamental rights and duties owns its existence to the Law of Nature. There are certain rights which are inherent in the very nature of States and may, therefore, be regarded as the fundamental rights of States. As pointed out by Oppenheim, "Until the last two decades of the nineteenth century there was general agreement that membership of the international community bestowed so-called fundamental rights of State. Such rights were chiefly enumerated as the rights of existence of self-preservation, of equality, of independence to territorial supremacy, of holding and requiring territory, of intercourse, and of good name and reputation. It was maintained that these fundamental rights are a matter of course and self-evident since the community of nations consists of sovereign States. But no unanimity existed with regard to the number, the appellation and the contents of these alleged fundamental rights."[30] Further, "they are rights and duties which do not arise from treaties between States, but which the States customarily enjoy and are subject to simply as international persons, and which they grant and receive reciprocally as members of the community of nations."[31] It may be noted here that the theory of fundamental rights has been subjected to severe criticism.[32] According to the positivist writers, there are no fundamental or inherent rights and duties of States. The rights so referred are not inherent but have arisen out of historical development and their growth can be traced. In the view of the positivists, rights and duties of States have arisen only out of customs and treaties. In their view, consent is the basis of international law. They also contend that the distinction between fundamental and non-fundamental rights and duties of States is unjustified. Rights and duties of the States are in fact the rights and duties which have been recognised by the community of States. Although there is much force in the above criticism, it cannot be accepted as a whole. Whether we call them basic or fundamental, there seems to be a general consensus in respect of certain rights and duties. Some of the more important of such rights include (i) sovereignty and independence of States ; (ii) equality of States ; (iii) territorial jurisdiction ; and (iv) right to self-defence and self-preservation. So is the case with certain duties which include (i) duty not to resort to war ; (ii) to fulfil treaty obligations in good faith, and (iii) the duty of non-intervention. At present sovereignty is deemed neither to be indivisible nor unlimited. In the interest of international community and on the basis of reciprocal rights and duties, no State can now claim absolute sovereignty. Independence of States denotes certain rights, powers and privileges under international law. Some of the rights, associated with the independence of a State are (i) power exclusively to control its own domestic affairs; (ii) power to admit or expel aliens ; (iii) privileges and immunities of diplomatic envoys in other States, and (iv) exclusive jurisdiction over crimes committed within its territory. Certain duties are also associated with the independence of States. The duty not to perform act of sovereignty on the territory of another State, duty not to allow in its territory preparations which are prejudicial to the security of another State, duty not to intervene in the affairs of another State etc. are such duties.[33]

---

[18] (1880) 5 PD 197.

[19] (1894) 1 QB 149.

[20] (1851) 17 QB 171.

[21] (1812) 7 Cranch 116.

[22] (1878) LR 9 Ch. D. 351.

[23] (1879) 4 PD 39.

[24] (1921) 3 KB 532.

[25] (1923) 2 KB 630.

[26] (1923) 2 KB 682.

[27] (1897) US 250, 11 Sup. at 83.

[28] As pointed out by Oppenheim "Legal equality must not be confused with political equality. The enormous differences between States as regards their strength are the result of a natural inequality which, apart from rank and titles, finds its expression in the Province of policy. Politically, States are in no manner equals......... But, however, important the position and the influence of the Great Powers may be, they were not before the establishment of the League of Nations derived from a legal basis of rule. Great powers did not enjoy any superiority of right, but only a priority of action. Nor has a State the character of a Great Power by law. It is nothing else than actual size strength, and economic influence which makes a State a Great Power......... apart from the covenant of the League of Nations, hegemony of the Great Powers was prior to the charter of the United Nations, a political and not a legal one". Supra note 3 at pp. 275-277.

[29] See P.A. Sorokin, "The Reconstruction of Humanity"; pp. 12-17; see also Kelsen, Yale Law Journal, Vol. 53 (1944), pp. 207-220.

* See for IAS (1974), Q. No. 3(c).

Several efforts have been made to formulate and codify rights and duties of States. Some of the more important efforts which deserve a special mention are : 'Declaration of rights and duties of Nations' proclaimed by the American Institute of International Law in 1916; Montevideo Convention of 1933, relating to the Rights and Duties of States, and the Bogota Charter of the Organisation of American States of 1948 which includes a Chapter on fundamental rights and duties of States. Besides this in 1947 the International Law Commission prepared a draft declaration of Rights and Duties of States on the basis of a proposal made by Panama. The General Assembly transmitted it to the Member States of the U.N. for their consideration.[34] It is significant to note that the Draft included 14 basic articles incorporating certain traditional rights such as independence, territorial jurisdiction, equality and individual and collective self-defence and duties such as non-intervention, not to foment civil strike in another State's territory; not to do anything in its territory which endanger international peace and security, not to resort to war or use force or make a threat thereof against the territorial integrity or political independence of another State or in any manner inconsistent with international law (including the Charter of the U.N.), to settle international disputes peacefully and ensure respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion in its territory and jurisdiction. The Draft Declaration has yet not been adopted and therefore doubts have been expressed in respect of its general application and validity. As pointed out by Rosalyn Higgins,[35] "on occasions United Nations organs may pass resolutions deliberately declaratory of existing law one may cite for example General Assembly Resolution 375 (IV), the declaration on the Rights and Duties of States though in the event this particular Declaration was not in fact adopted. It covers certain traditional rights and duties in 14 basic articles ranging from jurisdiction to intervention to sovereign equality. Although the General Assembly is not a legislative body, the adoption of such a type of resolution by an overwhelming majority or by unanimous vote would surely provide probative evidence of the belief of States concerning certain rules of law."

---

[30] Oppenheim, Supra note 3, at pp. 259-60.

[31] Ibid at p. 261.

[32] For criticism see "Theory of Fundamental Rights" discussed under Chapter 2.

[33] For this and the right to self-defence and self-prevention, see Chapter entitled "Intervention".

[34] See General Assembly Resolution 375 (IV).

Different kinds of 'States' and 'non-State entitles'

Following are different kinds of 'States' and 'non-State entities' :

(1) Confederation.—Confederation is formed by independent States. Under international law confederation has no international personality. The aim and objective of confederation is to establish a sort of co-ordination among the States, leaving States independent in their internal and external matters. But under international law, these States are not international persons.

(2) Federal State.—Generally a Federal State is formed by the merger of two or more than two sovereign States. Under international law, a Federal State is an international person. The Federal State exercises control and has rights not only over the member-States but also over the citizens of the States. In a Federal State, generally there is a division of powers between the central authority and the States through a contribution. States are generally autonomous in their internal matters but the federation or the central authority exercises control over them. The United States of America, Switzerland, India are good examples of the Federal States. The main difference between a Confederation and a Federal State is that while the Federal State in an international person under international law, a Confederation is not an international person.

(3) Condominium.—When two or more States exercise rights over a territory, it is called Condominium. "A Condominium exists when over a particular territory joint dominion is exercised by two or more external powers." [36] New Hebrides is a good example of a Condominium. Both England and France exercised control and had rights over the territory of New Hebrides between 1914 and 1980. Thus there is a joint sovereignty of France and Britain over New Hebrides. Other examples of condominium are those of Austria and Prussia over Schleswig-Holstein and Lanenburg from 1864 till 1866, of Great Britain and Egypt over Sudan from 1898 to 1955, and of Great Britain and France over Islands of Canada and Endenbury after 1939. In respect of rivers, gulfs or bays also sometimes the idea of condominium is used.[37]

(4) *Vassal State.—A State which is under the suzerainty of another State is called a Vassal State. Its independence is so restricted that it has no importance under international law. As remarked by Starke, "Vassal State is one which is completely under the suzerainty of another State. Internationally its independence is so restricted as scarcely to exist at all.[38] In its foreign affairs, the Vassal State possesses no power and all its foreign policies are governed by the State of which it is a Vassal State.

(5) *Protectorate State.—According to Starke, "Although not completely independent, a Protectorate State may enjoy a sufficient measure of sovereignty to claim jurisdictional immunity in the territory of another State, If may also still remain a State

---

[35] See Rosalyn Higgins, "The Development of International Law by the Political Organs of the United Nations", Proc., ASIL Vol. 59 (1955), p. 116.

[36] Starke, see supra note 5, p. 116.

[37] See Oppenheim's International Law, note 8, pp. 565-566.

* See for P.C.S. (1971), Q. No. 4(a) ; I.A.S. (1954), Q. No. 4.

[38] Starke, Supra note 5, at p. 115.

 See for I.A.S. (1964), Q. No. 4.

under international law." [39] In the case of Ionian ship,[40] the court held that a State may remain international person even though it is dependent upon some other State. The facts of this case are as follows:—

The Treaty of Paris, 1815 declared the Ionian group of Islands as an independent State under Britain. The treaty provided that the Ionian State could independently perform its internal functions with the consent of Britain. This treaty had empowered Britain to declare war or peace on behalf of Ionian State. In 1854 the German War broke out between Britain and Russia. During the war, the British warships apprehended some ships which were flying flags of Ionian State. These ships were seized on the ground that they were carrying on trade with the enemy. It was contended that the inhabitants of the Ionian group of Islands are British subjects and consequently they cannot carry on trade with the enemies of Britain during the war period. The Court had to decide mainly two questions. In the first place, it was to be decided whether Ionian group of Islands is an independent State. Secondly, whether the inhabitants of the Ionian group of Islands were British subjects and consequently, whether they will be treated as enemies of Russia.

In reply to the first question the Court ruled the Ionian group of Islands is an independent State and it was, therefore, free to trade with Russia. The Court further observed that it would be wrong to contend that the ships of Ionian State would be treated to be the ships of Britain. In reply to the second question, the Court ruled that since Ionian group of Islands is an independent State, its inhabitants are not the subjects of Britain and hence they will not be deemed to be the enemies of Russia.

Thus, a protectorate State can remain a State under international law and may possess some rights and immunities. This view was expressed by Lord Finlay in Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government.[41] The same view was expressed in The Charkieh.[42] In Rights of U.S. Nationals in Morocco,[43] the International Court of Justice has subscribed to this view. Often Protectorate States entrust matters of foreign policy and the matters regarding defence to other States. For example, Sikkim was a protectorate State of India before it was made an associate State of India. Subsequently, it was compeletely merged in India and became a State in the Indian Union. Thus it lost all vestige of international personality and became a constituent unit and a part and parcel of India. Starke has rightly pointed out, "Protectorates, in the strict sense, have for all practical purposes now disappeared from the international scene." [44]

Difference between Protectorate and Vassal State*

Following are the main points of difference between a Protectorate State and a Vassal State :

(a) Often through a treaty, a Protectorate State entrusts its matters of security, defence and external affairs to another State. A Vassal State is autonomous in its internal matters, but is completely dependent upon other State in external matters.

(b) A Protectorate State may become a member of the international community. A Vassal State is not regarded a member of the international community.

(c) A Protectorate State is not completely sovereign and in fact its sovereignty is taken by the country of which it becomes a Protectorate State. A Vassal State is a semi-sovereign State.

(d) If the protecting State declares a war against any country, then the Protectorate State is not necessarily involved in that war. Thus, the treaty entered into by the protecting State is not binding upon the Protectorate State. In the case of a Vassal State, it is bound by the treaty entered into by the protecting State.

---

[39] Starke, note 5, p. 115.

[40] (1855) 2 Spinks 212 ; Hudson Cases 421.

[41] (1924) A.C. 797 at p. 814.

[42] (1873) L.R. 4A & E. 59.

[43] I.C.J. Rep. (1952), p. 176.

[44] Starke, note 5, p. 116.

* See also for C.S.E. (1988), Q. 5(c).

(e) Lastly, Protectorate State may remain a State, but a Vassal State is completely under the suzerainty of another State and has no separate and independent existence under international law.

(6) Trust Territories.—Trust territories have been discussed in detail entitled "The Trusteeship Council" therefore, see that Chapter.

International position of Tibet, Holy See or Vatican City and Commonwealth of Nations

Tibet

Tibet is a mountaneous region in between India and China. Till 1720, it was an independent State, but later on it was incorporated by China in its State. After the end of the reign of Manchu dynasty in China, Tibet became free from the suzerainty of China. In 1906, Tibet was brought under the joint protection of China and Britain. After some years, the control of China over Tibet ceased and it again became an independent State. However, in its external affairs, China continued to exercise control over it. In Simla Conference of 1914 Tibet was declared autonomous in its internal matters and was regarded to be under the protection of China. The next land-mark event was the treaty of 1951 whereby Tibet was regarded as a Protectorate State of China. China accepted Dalai Lama as the spiritual head of Tibet. Thus, Tibet was autonomous in its internal matters but was under control of China in its external matters. It may, however, be noted that China flagrantly violated the treaty of 1951 and started interfering in the internal matters of Tibet. In 1959, the situation deteriorated so much that the conflict took the form of a war between China and Tibet. China sent its forces in Tibet and ruthlessly suppressed the movement of people. Dalai Lama, the spiritual head of Tibet was compelled to leave Tibet. He fled away from Tibet and took asylum in India. Thus Tibet is a Protectorate State. But because of the autocratic and imperialistic policy of China it has been converted into a vassal State and the rights of citizens of Tibet are flagrantly violated and Tibetians are at the mercy of the Government of China. But time and again India has declared that Tibet is a protectorate State of China and its affairs are internal matters of China.

Holy See or Vatican City

Holy See or Vatican City is a place where the religious head of Catholic Christians (Pope) resides. Holy See is smallest sovereign State. In the middle of 19th century, the rulers of Italy seized the territory of Pope and occupied his capital, Rome. Consequently Pope went away and settled in his residential place called Vatican City. Since Pope was religious head, the Government of Italy passed a law in 1871 whereby some guarantee was given to Pope. The said Act conferred some privileges and immunities upon Pope more or less equal to those privileges and immunities which are enjoyed by head of the States. Next important change took place in 1929, when a treaty was concluded between Pope and the Government of Italy whereby Vatican City comprising of 100 acres of land was accepted as a State and Pope was conferred upon the rights to enter into diplomatic relations with other States. Thus by the treaty of 1929, Vatican State assumed the status of an international person under the international law. The present position of Vatican City is that it is an international person and possesses all the rights and duties of a sovereign State. It is a natural State. It is not a member of the United Nations. In short, Vatican City is an international person and is fully independent and sovereign State under international law.

Commonwealth of Nations*

Except Britain, Commonwealth of Nations is an association of those States which were at some time the colonies of the British Empire.[45] Before 1948, it was called the British Commonwealth of Nations. Slowly and gradually the British colonies became independent one by one and with their liberation, their attitude also underwent significant changes. After the attainment of independence, these liberated States were not prepared to accept the suzerainty or overlordship of any other State. In the conference of 1948, a resolution was passed that the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations will be autonomous in their internal matters. As pointed out earlier, significant changes had appeared in international field by the year 1948. Consequently, the word 'British' was dropped and was named only "Commonwealth of Nations'. The present position is that all the members of the Commonwealth of Nations are sovereign States. They are fully independent and may exchange diplomatic envoys. In foreign affairs, their powers are unlimited. They can enter into treaty and may make declaration of war or peace on the basis of their sovereign powers.

---

* See for I.A.S. (1956), Q. No. 2 ; P.C.S. (1969), Q. No. 10.

[45] Besides Britain The Commonwealth of Nations now comprises of 46 States including Australia ; Bangladesh ; Canada ; Fiji ; Ghana ; Guyana ; Hong Kong ; India ; Jamaica ; Kenya ; Lesotho ; Malawi ; Malaysia ; Malta ; Mauritius ; Newzealand ; Nigeria ; Papua and New Guinea ; Sierra Leone ; Singapore ; Sri Lanka ; Tanzania ; Trinidad ; Uganda and Zambia.

The Common Wealth of Nations has 1/3 of World population. It has 53 current members. They are—

18	from Africa
02	in America
12	in Carribean
03	in Europe
10	in South Pacific
08	in Asia

53

Legal Status of Commonwealth of Nations.—Commonwealth of Nations is neither a State nor a federation. It is only a loose association of equal and sovereign States who are members of the United Nations and agree, to follow certain principles.[46] Under International law, the Commonwealth of Nations is not a separate independent entity. It is only a loose association of independent States. So far as India is concerned, she has made it clear that India is a sovereign democratic republic. India has joined Commonwealth of Nations, on the basis of equality and the membership of Commonwealth of Nations depends upon the sweet will and discretion of India.

Neutral State and Neutralised State and Distinction between them.[47]

N.B.—For a critical discussion of this, please see Chapter on "Neutrality".

---

[46] See Starke, note 5, at pp. 116-117.

[47] See also Chapter on "Neutrality........"

CHAPTER 10

STATE RESPONSIBILITY[*]

Since, formerly, States alone were recognized as subjects of international law, the general topic of international responsibility for wrong used to be discussed under the heading "State Responsibility". Though international responsibility now also involves consideration of position of international organisations and individuals for the sake of convenience, the topic of international responsibility is still studied under the heading "State responsibility".[1]

Meaning of the term 'State Responsibility'[]

Often it is said that the sovereign has no obligation under law. This statement is true only in respect of the subjects of the sovereign because a State may change its law at its will and may thus bring about changes in its obligations. The position is, however, different in respect of the obligations towards other nations. In that respect, obligations of the State are that of an international person. A State has certain obligations under international law. "The State responsibility concerning international duties is, therefore, a legal responsibility, for a State cannot abolish or create international law in the same way that it can abolish or create municipal law."[2] Thus, "The rules of international law as to State responsibility concern the circumstances in which and the principles whereby the injured State becomes entitled to redress for the damage suffered."[3]

In the Chorzow Factory (indemnity) case,[4] the Permanent Court of International Justice said ".........it is a principle of International law, and even a general conception of law, that any breach of an engagement involves an obligation to make reparation."[5] In the Corfu Channel case,[6] the International Court of Justice held Albania responsible for the explosions which occurred and observed : "These grave omissions involve the international responsibility of Albania......... and there is a duty upon Albania to pay compensation to the United Kingdom." As pointed out by Starke,[7] "The law of State responsibility is still in evolution and may possibly advance to the stage where individuals are also fixed with the responsibility for breaches of international law which are 'international crimes.'[8]

State responsibilities during the wars have been generally accepted in Article 3 of Hague Convention, 1907. According to it, if a belligerent State violates rules of war, it shall be responsible for the payment of compensation. It shall also be responsible for the acts committed by persons of its armed forces. "State responsibility, like the question of the definition of aggression, is a pedigreed subject. It was considered by the Hague

---

[*] See also for IAS (2008) Q. 5(d)

[1] See Openheim's International Law, Vol. I, Ninth Edition, Longman Group UK Limited and Mrs Tomoko Hudson, 1992, p. 500.

[] IAS (2005) Q. 8(b).

[2] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. 1, Eighth Edition, p.337. See also W. Friedmann, 'Law in a Changing Society' (First Indian Reprint, 1970), p. 336; F.V. Gracia Amador, "State Responsibility in the Light of the New Trends of International Law", 49 A.J.I.L. (1955), p. 339.

[3] J.G. Starke, Introduction of International Law Tenth Edition, (Butterworths, Singapore, 1989) p. 293.

[4] (1928) P.C.I.J. Series A. No. 17, p. 29.

[5] The World Court further observed, "The essential principle contained in the actual notion of an illegal act—a principle which seems to be established by international practice and in particular by the decisions of arbitral tribunals—is that reparation must, as far as possible, wipe out all consequences of the illegal act and re-establish this situation which would in all probability have existed if that act had not been committed—Restitution in kind, or if this is not possible, payment of a sum corresponding to the value which a restitution in kind would bear, the award, if need be, of damages for loss sustained which would not be covered by restitution in kind or payment in place of it— such are the principles which should serve to determine the amount of compensation due for an act contrary to international law." Ibid at p. 47.

[6] I.C.J. Reports (1949), p. 23.

[7] Starke see supra note 3, at p. 294.

[8] See S.P. Jagota, "The Role of the International Law Commission in the Development of International Law", A.J.I.L. Vol. 16 (1976), p. 459 at p. 464.

Conference of 1930. It has been considered by the Commission in the early fifties but the present work has been done since 1969 by Professor Ago as the Special Repporteur...... " the object of the current work of the U.N. International Law Commission on State responsibility, is to codify the rules governing State responsibility as a general and independent topic.[9] Under the general plan for the draft on State responsibility adopted by the Commission, the origin of international responsibility forms the subject of Part I of the Draft, which is concerned with determining on what grounds and under what circumstances a State may be held to have committed an internationally wrongful act which, as such, is a source of international responsibility. Part II deals with the content, forms and degrees of international responsibility, that is to say, the determination of the consequences an internationally wrongful act of State may have under international law (reparative and punitive consequences of an internationally wrongful act, relationship between these two types of consequences, material forms which reparation and penalties may take). Once these two essential tasks are completed, the Commission may, if it seems fit, decide to add to the draft Part III concerning the settlement of disputes and the "implementation." [10]

By the 42nd Session in 1990, the Commission had provisionally adopted first reading of 35 articles relating to first phase of its work. First five articles of second phase were also adopted.

Kinds of State Responsibility

Original and Vicarious responsibility :—

Original responsibilities of the State are for the works of its government and vicarious responsibilities are for its citizens and the works done by its agents. When the private individuals of a State cause harm to other States through their acts, the question of vicarious responsibility arises. In such a situation it becomes the duty of the State to punish the individuals concerned and compel them to pay compensation. "'Original' responsibility is borne by a State for acts which are directly imputable to it, such as acts of its government, or those of its officials or private individuals performed at the government's command or with its authorisation. 'Vicarious' responsibility, on the other hand, arises out of certain internationally injurious' acts of private individuals (whether nationals, or aliens in the State's territory), and of officials acting without authorisation. It is apparent that the essential difference between original and vicarious responsibility in this sense is that whereas the former involves a State being in direct breach of legal obligations binding on it and is accordingly a particularly serious matter, with the latter the State's responsibility is at one to remove the injurious conduct complained of : in such cases the State's responsibility calls for it to take certain preventive measures and requires it to secure that as far as possible the wrongdoer makes suitable reparation, and if necessary to punish him. But these preventive and remedial obligations of the State in cases of 'vicarious' responsibility are themselves obligations for the breach of which (as by refusing to take the remedial action, which is required) the State bears direct responsibility." [11] It is to be admitted that the legal consequences of the two categories of acts may not be the same, but there is no fundamental difference between the two categories, and in any case, the use of 'vicarious responsibility' here is surely erroneous." [12]

State responsibilities in different fields or consequences of State Responsibility :—

(1) *International Delinquency.—As pointed out by Prof. Oppenheim, "An international delinquency is any injury to another State committed by the Head or Government of a State in violation of an international legal duty. Equivalent to acts of the

---

[9] For details see : Richard D. Kearney, "The Twenty-fifth Session of the International Law Commission", A.J.I.L., Vol. 68 (1974), p.454 at pp. 455-462.

[10] U.N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIII, No. 8 (August-September, 1976), p. 49.

[11] Oppenheim's International Law, note 1, at pp. 50-1-502.

[12] Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Second Edition (1973), p. 442.

* See for I.A.S. (1968), Q. No. 7 and I.A.S. (1962), Q. No. 3 and P.C.S. (1966), Q. No. 4 (a).

Head and Government are acts of officials or other individuals commanded or authorised by the Head of Government. The comprehensive notion of an international delinquency ranges from ordinary breaches of treaty obligations, involving not more than pecuniary compensation to violations of International Law amounting to a criminal act in the generally, accepted meaning of the term... International delinquencies—a term applying both to wrongs consisting of breaches of treaties and to wrongs independent of treaty may be committed in regard to different objects. Thus a State may be injured in regard to its independence through unjustified intervention; in regard to its treaty rights through an act violating a treaty ; or in regard to its right of protection over citizens abroad through any act that violates the person or the property of one of its citizens abroad." Starke has explained the term, 'international delinquency' in the following words : 'In practice most cases of State responsibility, at least before international tribunals, arise out of wrongs alleged to have been committed by the State concerned. By wrong in this connection is meant the breach of some duty which rests on a State at international law and which is not the breach of a purely contractual obligation. To such wrongs, more frequently the term 'international delinquency' is applied......... Most of the cases that come under this head concern injuries suffered by citizens abroad......... Generally speaking, a person who goes to live in the territory of foreign State must submit to its law ; but that is not to say that certain duties under international law in respect to the treatment of that person do not bind the State. Examples are, the duty of the State to provide proper judicial remedies for damage suffered, and the duty to protect alien citizens from gratuitous personal injury by its officials or subjects." [13]

Thus according to Starke, International delinquency is a wrongful act committed by a State which is not a breach of a purely contractual obligation. International delinquency is a wrongful act which is the breach of international obligation and is independent of any contractual obligation. On the other hand, crimes are violations of customary or treaty rules of International law. For international delinquency, generally the remedy is pecuniary compensation. The remedy for international crime may be the punishment or reparation as the case may be. It is in respect of a crime against international law, the observation of the Nuremberg judgment that individuals who commit crimes against International law may be punished is relevant. As compared to it, international delinquency is a wrongful act committed by an official or organ of the State concerned which may be imputed or attributed to the State.

Notions of Imputability.—As pointed out by Starke, "In the subject of international delinquencies, it is important to apply the notion of imputability. This notion assists in clarifying the subject and in providing a proper framework for its theory. To take a practical example, if an agency of State X has caused injury to a citizen of State Y in breach of international law, technically we say that State X will be responsible to State Y for the injury done. What this means is that the organ of official of State X has committed a wrongful act, and the conduct in breach of international law is imputed from the organ or official to the State. The imputation is thus the result of the intellectual operation necessary to bridge the gap between the delinquency of the organ or official and the attribution of breach and liability to the State .... Imputability therefore depends on the satisfaction of two conditions : (a) conduct of a State organ or official in breach of an obligation defined in a rule of international law ; (b) that according to international law, the breach will be attributed to the State. It is only if the breach is imputable that the State becomes internationally responsible for the delinquency. Responsibility begins where imputability ends." [14] But as rightly remarked by Brownlie,[15] "In general, broad formulae on State responsibility are unhelpful and, when they suggest municipal analogies, a source of confusion. Thus it is often said that responsibility only arises when the act or omission complained of is imputable to a State. Imputability would seem to be a superfluous notion, since the major issue in a given situation is whether there has been breach of duty, the content of 'imputability' will vary according to the particular duty, the nature of the breach, and so on. Imputability implies a fiction where there is none and conjures up the idea of vicarious liability where it cannot apply."

---

[13] Starke, See Supra note 3, at p. 304.

[14] Ibid at pp. 304-305.

[15] Brownlie, See Supra Note 12, at p. 421.

Reference may be made here to Youmans case[16]. In this case, the Mayor of the town (in Mexico) ordered a lieutenant of State forces to suppress riots and attack against certain American citizens. Instead of dispersing the rioters, the troops did just the reverse. They started firing on the house in which the Americans had taken refuge. In the process, one American was killed. The other two Americans were forced to leave the house and were killed by the troops and rioters. In opening the fire against the Americans the troops had disobeyed the orders of the Mayor and had acted beyond the scope of their authority. The Mexican Government was held liable for the wrongful acts of the troops.

It is sometimes said that 'A State is not responsible to another State for unlawful acts committed by its agents unless such acts are committed wilfully and maliciously or with culpable negligence'.* "It is difficult to accept so wide a conclusion and so invariable a requirement. A general floating condition of malice or culpable negligence rather contradicts the scientific and practical considerations underlying the law as to State responsibility .... It is only in specific cases when particular circumstances demand it that wilfulness or malice may be necessary to render a State responsible for example, if the State knowingly connives in the wrongful acts of insurgents or rioters, it would become liable although not generally otherwise .... Further the actual decisions of international arbitral tribunals fail to justify a general condition of malice or culpable negligence." [17] In the words of another author, "The fact that an ultra vires act of an official is accompanied by malice on his part, i.e., an intention to cause harm, without regard to whether or not the law permits the act does not affect the responsibility of his State. Indeed, the principle of objective responsibility dictates the irrelevance of intention to harm dolus, as a condition of liability; and yet general propositions of this sort should not led to the conclusion that dolus cannot play a significant role in the law. Proof of dolus on the part of leading organs of the State will solve the problem of 'imputability' in the given case, and in any case, the existence of a deliberate intent to injure may have an effect on remoteness of damage as well as helping to establish the breach of duty. Malice may justify the award of "penal damages." [18]

The basis of responsibility "has been said to be essentially delictual and based on fault, requiring either international or negligent conduct on the part of the State before a breach of it or an international obligation can be established ; or to be strict or objective, conduct and result alone establishing the breach of an obligation." [19] There is no single basis of international responsibility which may be applicable in all circumstances. In fact, the basis of responsibility depends on the particular obligation in question. For example, responsibility of State for acts of private individuals is based on fault for normally it is required to be shown that the State failed to show diligence in preventing either the injury or punishing the offender. But in certain areas (i.e.) dangerous activities responsibility may arise without fault. In certain dangerous activities, absolute or strict responsibility has been fixed in treaties such as Vienna Convention on Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage, 1963, Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by Space Objects, 1971 and the International Convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage, 1969.[20]

So far 40 countries have ratified Vienna Convention on Civil Liability for Nuclear Damage, 1963.

The Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by Space Object, 1971 has 89 parties as of January, 2013. International Convention on Civil Liability for oil Pollution Damage, 1969 has been ratified by 133 countries as of 2013.

(2) State responsibility for injury to aliens —Under international law it is generally agreed that aliens living in a State should also be conferred upon the same rights which are given to the citizens. It is the responsibility of the State to protect rights of the aliens in the same way as they protect the rights of their citizens. State responsibilities towards aliens may be of following types:—

---

[16] Annual Digest of Public International Law Cases, 1925-26, p. 223.

* Asked in IAS (1965), Q. No. 5 and seems to have been adopted from Starke, supra note 2, at p. 339.

[17] Starke, Supra note, 3 at p. 312.

[18] Brownlie, see supra note 12 at pp. 427-28.

[19] Openheim's International Law, note 1, at pp. 508-509.

[20] See ibid, at pp. 509-511.

*(a) State responsibility for acts of private individuals.—Under international law, each State is under a duty to exercise due diligence to prevent its own subjects as well as foreign subjects who live within its territory from committing injurious acts against other States. While the State responsibility for official acts of administrative officials and members of armed forces is extensive, responsibility for private persons is limited because in practice it is impossible for a State to prevent a private person from committing injurious act against a foreign State. The duty of the State is simply to exercise due diligence and where injurious acts have nevertheless been committed, to procure satisfaction and reparation for the wronged act, as far as possible, by punishing the offenders and compelling them to pay compensation, if necessary.[21] If the citizens of a State cause some damage or harm to an alien in that State, that alien gets the right to file the suit for compensation according to law of that State. Thus in such a situation the State tribunals protect the rights of aliens. It may be noted here that the decisions of the State courts are binding upon the aliens in the same way as they are binding upon the citizens of the State. But if the decision of a State Tribunal is arbitrary and against justice, the alien person has a remedy to approach his home State to settle the matter through political means and ensure that the matter is decided in accordance with the principles of international law. Since in such matters the political matters are involved, it would not be correct to say that there is any State responsibility in this connection.

(b) State responsibility for acts of mob-violence.—State responsibility for acts of mob-violence is same as for acts of private individuals. Generally, State may be held responsible for mob-violence only when it has not made due diligence to prevent it. "Outbreaks of mob-violence resulting in injury to the aliens raise regularly the question of prevention as well as of redress. While occasional outbreaks of mob-violence may be accepted in any State, and their mere occurrence is not of itself a ground of responsibility, the State is expected to use 'due diligence' to prevent them".[22] But this test is very uncertain and ambiguous. 'Due diligence' to prevent mob-violence depends upon the time, facts and circumstances. "What constitutes 'due diligence' is a question of time and circumstances'[23] This test is so ambiguous that often jurists express the view that there is no State responsibility in respect of mob-violence. But this view is not correct. Some countries such as England and America do not support this view. If the alien person is some officer of foreign country then the State responsibility is further increased.[24]

As regards the vagueness of the test and definition of the term 'due diligence', "Obviously no very dogmatic definition would be appropriate, since what is involved is a standard which will vary according to the circumstances. And yet, if 'due diligence' be taken to denote a fairly high standard of conduct the exception would overwhelm the rule. The reporteur for the International Law Commission on State responsibility, Gracia Amador, concludes that the basic principle is that there is a presumption against responsibility and proposes the following provision : "The State is responsible for injuries caused to an alien in consequence of riots, civil strife or other internal disturbances if the constituted authority was manifestly negligent in taking the measures which, in such circumstances, are normally taken to prevent or punish the acts in question". There is some authority for the view that the granting of an amnesty to rebels constitutes a failure of duty and an acceptance of responsibility for their acts on the basis of a form of estoppel ; but in many cases this inference will be unjustified".[25]

Reference may also be made here to the case concerning United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran[26] which involved the acts of rioters and other militants who attached and occupied U.S. diplomatic and consular premises in Iran. The rioters and militants also seized the occupants and held them as hostages. Since the rioters and militants were persons without official status in the initial stages their acts could not be imputed to the State, the International Court of Justice held Iran not responsible for the initial stages of their acts. But subsequently the situation changed when the militants became agents of the State and hence Iran was held responsible for their acts. The World Court also held Iran responsible for breach of its international responsibility to take steps to protect American diplomatic premises and to restore status quo.

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1972), Q. No. 6.

[21] See Oppenheim's International Law, note 1, at p. 549.

[22] Charles, G. Fenwick International Law (Third Indian Reprint, 1971), p. 338.

[23] Ibid.

[24] Ibid, at p. 339.

[25] Brownlie, Supra note 12 at pp. 440-41.

[26] I.C.J. Rep. (1980) p. 3.

Illustration.—'A Portuguese subject residing in India is mobbed and his property plundered by the mob on India refusing to pay damages to Portugal, Portugal blockades the Indian Coast and orders the capture of Indian vessel.* In this case India would be responsible for injury to the person and property of the Portuguese subject if she did not take 'due diligence' to prevent the mob violence or if she 'was manifestly negligent in taking the measures which, in such circumstances are normally taken to prevent or punish the acts in question'. But the Portuguese action amounts to reprisal and one of the conditions for a valid reprisal is that there must be a certain proportion between the offence and the action taken in reprisal. Obviously in the present case, there is no proportion between the injury caused to the Portuguese subject and the reprisal resorted to by Portugal. Moreover, no State is entitled to resort to reprisal which may endanger international peace and security.

State Responsibility in respect of injuries suffered by Persons Serving the U.N.

There is also State responsibility in respect of the persons serving under the auspices of the international organisations. This conclusion can be validly drawn on the basis of the decision of the International Court of Justice in the case of Count Bernadottee or the case of Reparation for Injuries suffered in the Service of the U.N.[27] The facts of this case were as follows : Count Bernadottee along with a French observer was appointed by the United Nations Security Council to mediate in the conflict between Arabs and Jews in Palestine. On September 17, 1948, when he was in that area of Jerusalam which was under the occupation of Israel he along with a French observer was murdered. In this connection, the General Assembly of the United Nations requested, in 1948, the International Court of Justice to give an advisory opinion as to whether in such matters the United Nations can claim compensation and damages for organisation and the persons appointed under its service. If, questions were answered in the affirmative, it was further asked in what manner the action taken by the United Nations could be reconciled with such rights as might be possessed by the State of which the victim was a national. In its advisory opinion of 11th April, 1949, the Court held that the organisation was intended to exercise functions and rights which could only be explained on the basis of the possession of a large measure of international personality and the capacity to operate upon the international plane. It followed that the organisation (in this case the U.N.) had the capacity to bring a claim and to give it the character of an international action for reparation for the damage that had been caused to it. The World Court further declared that the organisations can claim reparation not only in respect of damage caused to itself, but also in respect of damage suffered by the victim persons entitled through him. Although, according to the traditional rule, diplomatic protection had to be exercised by the national State, the organisation should be regarded in international law as possessing the powers which even if they are not expressly stated in the Charter are conferred upon the organisation as being essential to the discharge of its function. The Court held that the organisation has the capacity to claim appropriate reparation, including also reparation for damage suffered by the victim or by persons entitled through him. The risk of possible competition between the organisation and the victim's national State could be eliminated either by means of a general convention or by a particular agreement in any individual case. In purusance of the above decision, the Secretary-General of the U.N. claimed compensation from Government of Israel for the death of Count Bernadotte and a French observer. The Government of Israel paid the money in the form of compensation but refused to accept any obligation under law in this connection. In other words, we may say that although Israel paid the compensation, but it did not accept that it was its legal responsibility to pay compensation, arising out of mob-violence. Thus the legal position is that a State is responsible for injuries caused in its territory to person serving the U.N. or any other international organisation.

---

* Asked in P.C.S (1964), Q. No. 8(a).

[27] I.C.J. Rep. (1949), p. 174.

(c) State responsibility for acts of insurgents.—So far as the State responsibility for the acts of insurgents is concerned, the general rule is that it is the responsibility of the States to try to prevent the violent acts of the revolutionaries. But there is a controversy that if States are not able to prevent violent activities, whether they will be responsible or not. According to Fenwick, State responsibility for the acts of insurgents is different from State responsibility for the acts of mob-violence. When there is a revolution or to put it more precisely insurrection, there is a presumption that the State shall make due diligence to prevent it because it is in the interest of the State to suppress it. In the words of Fenwick, "The very existence of organised revolution raises a presumption of 'due diligence' on the part of the State in suppressing it, since the government had an immediate interest in such an open attack upon its authority.[28] As pointed in the Ninth Edition of Oppenheim's International Law[29] where the aim of insurrection or rebellion is to overthrow of government, position in principle is the same as for rioters and acts of mob-violence. "The State is not responsible for acts of the insurrectionists, but is only obliged to exercise due diligence to prevent, or immediately crush the insurrection, and to punish those responsible for injury to foreigners." [30]

Calvo Doctrine*

The doctrine was propounded by Calvo of Argentina and hence it is called Calvo doctrine. According to this doctrine, during civil war the State is not responsible for the losses suffered by the alien persons because if this responsibility is accepted then big nations will get an excuse to intervene in the independence of weaker States. In the words of Fenwick, "The general principle that the State is not responsible for losses incurred by aliens in time of civil war became associated in Latin America with the name of the Argentine publicist Calvo, who argued in his treatise on international law that a State could not accept responsibility for losses suffered by foreigners as the result of civil war or insurrection, on the ground that to admit responsibility in such case would be the menace to independence of weaker State by subjecting them to the intervention of strong States, and would establish an unjustifiable inequality between nationals and foreigners." [31] But many States such as America and England do not accept completely the above doctrine. Since the revolts or insurrections are frequent in the States, the presumption that State made due diligence becomes weak.

Reference may also be made here to the insertion of Calvo clause in contracts providing for the determination of any dispute arising out of the contract by national courts and preventing the home government of the alien concerned from making diplomatic intervention. "In order to prevent appeals by aliens to their home governments for diplomatic intervention on behalf of their contract right, a number of Latin American States during the latter part of the nineteenth century adopted a policy of writing into their contract with aliens a clause known as the 'Calvo clause' the general tenor of which was that the alien agreed that any dispute that might arise out of the contract were to be decided by the national courts in accordance with national law and were not to give rise to any international reclamation." [32] "Further, the decisions of international arbitration tribunals and of mixed claims commissions upon the subject have been conflicting, some upholding the Calvo clause as a bar to the interposition of the alien's government, others rejecting it on the ground that the act of the alien's cannot restrict the right of his government under international law." [33] In Orinoco Steamship Co. case between United States and Venezuela[34] the Steamship Co. had suffered losses as its vessels were requisitioned during revolution. It also alleged that it was unlawfully discriminated against it in the navigation of the river. The Calvo clause was upheld. But on its reference to the Permanent Court of Arbitration at the instance of the United States it was held that the rejection of claims by the Umpire was not justified.[35] North American Dredging Company case between the U.S. and Mexico[36] involved the breach of contract by Mexico. The contract related to the dredging at the port of Salina Cruz. The contract provided that contractor and persons working shall be considered Mexicans in all matters and "are consequently deprived of any rights as alien and under no condition shall the intervention of foreign diplomatic agents be permitted, in any matter related to this contract." The Mixed Claims Commission held that under international law such a clause may be included by an alien in a contract but he is not entitled to "deprive the government of his nation of its undoubted right of applying international remedies to violations of international law committed to his damage." Thus although the Calvo clause was held to be binding on the claimant to be governed by Mexican laws, it could not take from him "his and undoubted right to apply to his own Government for protection if his resort to the Mexican tribunals or other authorities available to him resulted in a denial or delay of justice as that term is used in international law." [37]

---

[28] Charles G. Fenwick, International Law, p. 340.

[29] See note 1, at p. 552.

[30] Ibid.

* See also I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 11 (d) ; I.A.S. (1970), Q. No. 10 (e) ; I.A.S. (1968), Q. No. 7 ; I.A.S. (1963), Q. 12 (c) ; p.c.s. (1974), Q. No. 10(c) ; P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 10(d) ; P.C.S. (1966), Q. No. 10(b).

[31] Charles G. Fenwick, International Law, at p. 341.

[32] Ibid., at pp. 350-351.

"(1) Thus in so far as such clause attempts to waive in general the Sovereign right of a State to protect its citizens, it is to that extent void.

(2) .... it would be obviously improper for the individual to treat the State against which he seeks redress as an inferior and untrustworthy country and to apply for his government's intervention without making any claim in the local courts.

(3) Where such a stipulation purports to bind the claimant's government not to intervene in respect of a clear violation of international law, it is void.

To sum up, it may be said that Calvo clause is ineffective to bar the rights of States to protect the internationals abroad, or to release States from their duty to protect foreigners on their territory.[38]

(3) State responsibility for acts of government organs.—The State concerned has responsibility for the act performed by its representatives or high officials towards the alien persons. But State responsibility is accepted only to the extent where the officials concerned have acted out of their powers and jurisdiction. "The traditional doctrine of international law, which restricts State responsibility to persons officially connected with government, as distinct from private persons, is predicted on the assumption that the latter are free from government direction to control in their actions affecting foreign States".[39] Similarly, State is responsible for the acts of its judicial organs.

(4) State responsibility for contracts with foreigners.—In this connection, the general rule is that if there is a breach of the contract entered into by a State with aliens, then it does not give rise to any international responsibility. The alien person, however, has the remedy to avail the local means available to him in the State law of the State concerned. If the matter is not resolved to the satisfaction of the alien person then he may try to settle it through the medium of his home State by resorting to political and diplomatic means. In the words of Fenwick, "In general, the alien, believing himself to be the victim of breach of contract by foreign government, must first exhaust such local remedies as are

---

[33] Charles G. Fenwick, International Law, at p. 351.

[34] (1903), Ralston. International Arbitral Law and Procedure, p. 72.

[35] See 1910, Scot, Hague Court Reports, p. 226ff.

[36] U.S. v. Mexico, General Claims Commissions, 1926.

[37] See also the International Fisheries Company case between the United States and Mexico, (1926), Opinions of the Commissioners, 1931, p. 207.

[38] Starke, see Supra note 3, at pp. 302-303.

[39] W. Friedmann, Law in a Changing Society (First Indian Reprint, 1970), p. 337.

available to him. These failing him, he may seek to press the claim through the foreign office of his Government." [40]

(5) State responsibility for Breach of Treaty or Contractual Obligations.—State responsibility for breach of treaty obligation depends upon the provisions of the treaty. In Chorzow Factory (Indemnity) case,[41] the Permanent Court of International Justice held : "It is a principle of international law that the reparation of wrong may consist in an indemnity corresponding to the damage which the national of the injured State have suffered as a result of the act which is contrary to international law .... Rights or interest of an individual the violation of which right causes damage are always in a different plane to rights belonging to a State, which rights may also be infringed by the same act. The damage suffered by an individual is never, therefore, identical in kind with that which will be suffered by a State; it can only afford a convenient scale for the calculation of the reparation due to the State." In several cases, international arbitral awards have awarded damages under two separate heads— (i) Damage suffered by individual and (ii) Damage sustained by the claimant State. I'm Alone[42] is an illustrative case on the award of such type. In this case I am Alone, a British ship of Canadian registry, was sunk by a United States Coast Guard Vessel in 1929 as it was engaged in the smuggling of alcoholic liquor in the United States. It was sunk on the high seas more than 200 miles from the coast of the U.S. after a hot pursuit which began outside U.S. territorial water but within the inspection Zone provided for in the 'Liquor Treaty' between U.K. and the U.S. The Canadian Government complained of the sinking of I'm Alone. The Canadian claim was referred to the Commissioners appointed under the convention concerned. In their final report the Commissioners observed : "We find as a fact, from September, 1928, down to the date when she was sunk, the I'm Alone, although a British ship of Canadian registry, was de facto owned, controlled, and at critical times, managed and her movements directed and her cargo dealt with and disposed of, by a group of persons acting in concert who were entirely, or nearly so, citizens of the United States, and who employed her for the purposes mentioned (i.e. smuggling of liquor)......... in view of the facts, no compensation ought to be paid in respect of the loss of the ship or the cargo.

The act of sinking the ship, however, by officers of the United States Coast Guard, was ...... an unlawful act ; and the commissioners consider that the United States ought formally to acknowledge its illegality, and to apologize to His Majesty's Canadian Government therefor ; and, further, that as a material amend in respect of the wrong the United States should pay the sum of $25,000 to His Majesty's Canadian Government ; and they recommend accordingly".[43]

As pointed out earlier, if a State contracts with the citizens of another State, then generally there is no State responsibility in consequence of the breach of such contract but if any contract entered into with another State that it will enforce the contract entered into with the citizen of that State, then there will be State responsibility in consequence of the breach of the contract with the citizens. In this connection Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. case[44] deserves a special mention here. Anglo-Iranian Company was company registered in Britain on April 19, 1933, a contract was entered into between this company and Iran wherein Iran gave some concessions to the company in respect of extracting oil in Iran. In 1951, Iran nationalised this company by passing a law to that effect. Britain contended that the said contract was sponsored by her and Iran had promised not to end or otherwise make any change in the concessions granted. The International Court of Justice held that for an implied treaty in respect of a contract between a State and the citizens of another State, it is necessary that there should be sufficient evidence for the same. The Court rejected the contention of Britain on the ground that there was no privity of contract between Persia and Britain.[45]

---

[40] Fenwick, supra note 28 at p. 350.

[41] United Nations Reports of International Arbitral Awards, Vol. III, p. 1609, L.C. Green, International Law Through cases, p. 469.

[42] P.C.I.J. (1928), Series A. No. 17 (1) W.C.R. 646.

[43] See also Reparation for injuries suffered in the Service of the United Nations I.C.J. Rep. (1949), p.174.

[44] I.C.J. Rep. (1952), p. 93.

The Court also rejected the view that the agreement of 1933 was both a concessionary contract between Iran and the company and an international treaty between Iran and the U.K. since the U.K. was not a party to the contract. The position was not altered by the fact that the concessionary contract was negotiated through the good offices of the council of the League of Nations.

(6) *State Responsibility in respect of Expropriation of Foreign Property. —There is a great controversy in regard to the expropriation of foreign property situated in a State. However, in the modern period, significant changes have taken place in this connection. Till the 19th century, if any State expropriated the foreign property it was considered to be the violation of international law making the said State liable for the same. But in the modern period, in view of the complete control of States over their economic system and in consequence of the nationalisation of different industries, it has become difficult to recognise such expropriation as the violation of international law. It may be noted here that the term 'expropriation' includes nationalisation and confiscation of property. On the basis of practice, principles and decided cases, it may be that expropriation of foreign property may be valid only where there has been no irregularity or discrimination with the foreigners. This was held in Anglo Iranian Oil Co. Ltd. v. Jaffarte.[46]

There has been the constant development of the law relating to the expropriation of foreign property. In 1952, the General Assembly approved the concept of economic self-determination through a resolution.[47] The said resolution referred Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. Ltd. v. S.U.P.O.R.[48] and Anglo-Iranian Oil Co. Ltd. v. Idemtsu Kosan Kobushiki Kaisha.[49] In 1958, a Commission on Permanent Sovereignty over Natural Resources was established. On the basis of the report of this commission, the Economic and Social Commission passed a resolution[50] in 1962 which declared that in case of expropriation, nationalisation, or requisitioning the owner shall be given "appropriate compensation in accordance with the rules in force in States taking such measures in accordance with international law".[51] In 1965, the Third Committee of the General Assembly adopted a draft article for human rights covenant which provided : "The peoples may for their own ends, freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources without prejudice to any obligation arising out of international economic co-operation based upon the principle of mutual benefit, and international law. In no case may a people be deprived of its own means of subsistence." Thereafter, such type of provisions were included in Human Rights Covenants, 1966. These covenants have now come into force. In this connection, 1965 Convention of the Settlement of Investment Disputes between States and Nationals of other States also deserves a special mention. In this convention, an endeavour has been made to establish international procedure and machinery for the settlement of investment disputes between States and nationals of other States. On 17th December, 1973, the General Assembly passed a resolution [Resolution 3171 (xxviii)] on permanent Sovereignty over National Resources wherein it affirmed "that the application of the principle of nationalization carried out by States, as an expression of their sovereignty in order to safeguard their natural resources, implies that each State is entitled to determine the amount of possible compensation and mode of payment, and that any disputes which might arise should be settled in accordance with the national legislation of each State carrying out such measures.[52]

---

[45] Anglo-Indian Oil Co. case, I.C.J. Rep. (1952), p. 112.

* See also for I.A.S. (1970). Q. No. 6; I.A.S. (1975) Q 4; CSE (1986), Q 6 (a) (ii).

[46] (1953) 1 W.L.R. 246; see also J.E.C. Fawcett, "Some Foreign Effect of Nationalisation of Property" BYBIL Vol. XXVII (1950), p. 355 at p. 375.

[47] General Assembly Resolution, 626 (vii) of 21st December, 1952.

[48] 22nd. International Law Reports (1955), p. 23 at p.40.

[49] 20th International Law Reports (1953), p. 305 at p. 315. In this case the Court held that nationalisation was merely a species of expropriation.

[50] See Resolution 1803 (xvii) of 14th December, 1962.

[51] See Ibid. para 4.

On December 13, 1974, the U.N. General Assembly adopted by an overwhelming majority a Charter of economic rights and duties of States.[53] It has been hailed by some developing countries as an 'economic Magna Carta.' The resolution was passed by a majority of 120 to 6 with ten abstentions. The resolution proclaims that each State has the right to "freely exercise full permanent sovereignty over its wealth and natural resources, to regulate and exercise authority over foreign investments within its national jurisdiction, and to nationalise, expropriate or transfer the ownership, of foreign property." It further provides that "appropriate compensation" should be paid in cases of nationalisation by the State adopting such measures, taking into account its relevant laws and regulations and all the circumstances which the State considers pertinent. In case of any dispute or controversy relating to compensation, it should be settled under the domestic laws of the nationalising State and its tribunals unless it is freely and mutually agreed by all States concerned that other peaceful means be sought on the basis of sovereign equality of States and in accordance with free choice of means.[54] United States, Britain, Denmark, West Germany and Luxemburg voted against the resolution while other affluent members, Austria, Canada, France, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, Norway and Spain abstained. Despite this, it would not be wrong to say that "the new Charter marks the beginning of a new phase in international relations, even if interested powers may be expected to defy and sabotage it."

In view of the above discussion, it may be rightly said that 'A State's natural asset is a national asset'.* Since it is now generally recognised that each State has permanent sovereign rights over its natural resources, all natural resources are therefore its national assets and it has sovereign right to nationalise, expropriate or transfer ownership of foreign property. In such a case, the only requirement is that appropriate compensation should be paid. But appropriate compensation is to be paid taking into account its (i.e. State's concerned) relevant laws and regulations and all circumstances that the State considers pertinent. In case of any dispute in this connection, the same shall be settled under the law of the nationalizing State and by its tribunals or by any other peaceful means agreed between the parties. Even the developed States concede the Sovereign right of each State to nationalise, expropriate or transfer ownership of foreign property but they contend that appropriate compensation (i.e. just equivalent of market value) should be paid for such expropriation and it should be subject to international adjudication. Such compensation should not only be adequate but must be paid promptly.

Despite this controversy, there is general agreement about the Sovereign right of each State to nationalise or expropriate foreign property and hence it has been remarked that 'A State's 'natural asset is a national asset'. This is clear from the example of nationalisation of Suez Canal in 1956 by Egypt. By this Egypt asserted its Sovereign rights over its natural resources. This was resented by France, Britain and Israel who made joint, armed intervention in the internal affairs of Egypt. But the problem was subsequently resolved by the efforts of Soviet Union, Security Council and the General Assembly. The agreement that followed recognised the Sovereign right of Egypt to nationalise Suez Canal and to realise taxes for the use of the canal. Thus the nationalisation of Suez Canal is a very strong precedent to show that a natural asset being a national asset, each State has Sovereign rights to nationalise or expropriate foreign property. So is the case with oil in West Asia. The events of past few years have clearly demonstrated the Sovereign rights of West Asian countries in respect of their most valuable natural resource—oil. They have gone even a step ahead and have used oil as a weapon to get their demands fulfilled and to influence international politics.

---

[52] On Permanent Sovereignty over Natural Resources see also Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, pp. 431-44 ; U.S. Secretariat Study, The Status of Permanent Sovereignty over Natural Wealth and Resources, 1962 ; Gess, ICLQ. Vol. 13 (1964), pp. 398-449. Hyde, AJIL, Vol. 50 (1956), pp. 851-67.

[53] For the text of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States ; see Resolution 3281 (XXXIX) reprinted in U.N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XII (January, 1975), p. 118.

[54] Article 2(2) (c) of the Chapter of Economic Rights and Duties of States ; see also Chapter I entitled International Economic Co-operation and the Evolution a New International Economic Order."

* Asked in I.A.S. (1975), Q. No. 4.

In recent years more and more emphasis is being given to the recognition of the principle of nationalisation or expropriation of foreign property by the developing countries and the opposition of the developed countries is growing weaker day by day. The main attack is against the implementation of the principle and not the principle itself. Besides nationalisation the developing countries have also been emphasizing the right of each State "to regulate and exercise authority, over foreign investment within its national jurisdiction in accordance with its laws and regulations and in conformity with its national objectives and priorities" and that "no State shall be compelled to grant preferential treatment to foreign investment."[55] They further contend that each State has the right to "regulate and supervise the activities of transnational corporation within its national jurisdiction and take measures to ensure that such activities comply within its laws, and regulations and conform with its economic and social policies. Transnational corporations shall not intervene in the internal affairs of a host State."[56]

To conclude in the words of a writer, "Finally, from a political view point, it appears to follow as a matter of course that the past struggle between the proponents of the Hull rule and adherents of the Calvo Doctrine (or its modern variants) will lead to synthesis in which the emphasis upon domestic law will be considerably stronger than under the old Hull Rule. Put succinctly, one may, therefore well expect that international law will continue to protect alien property, but that the extent of protection will more than previously be in accordance with modern developments in domestic property orders."[57]

(7) *Liability for the Acts of Multinational Corporations : Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster .—There is lack of definite international law in respect of liability of transnational or multinational corporations. The charter of Economic Rights and Duties adopted by the General Assembly on 12 December 1974, recognises the right of each state "to regulate and supervise the activities of transnational corporations within its national jurisdiction and take measures to ensure that such activities comply with its laws, rules and regulations and conform with its economic and social policies." But developed countries such as U.S., U.K., Federal Republic of Germany and Japan voted against this. In M.C. Mehta v. Union of India,[58] which is more popularly known as Oleum Gas Leak case, the Supreme Court of India held : "the enterprise must be under an obligation to provide that the hazardous or inherently dangerous activity, in which it is engaged must be conducted with the highest standard of safety and if any harm results on account of such activity the enterprise must be absolutely liable to compensate for such harm and it should be no answer to say that it had taken all reasonable care and that the harm occurred without any negligence on its part .... the enterprise is strictly and absolutely liable to compensate all those who are affected by the accident and such liability is not subject to any of the exceptions which operate vis-a-vis the tortious principle of strict liability under the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher.[59]

After having consolidated all claims relating to Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster and having acquired exclusive right to represent and make the claim by passing Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster (Processing of claims) Act, 1985, the Union of India instituted a suit against Union Carbide Corporation (U.C.C.) on 8 April 1985 in South District Court of Judge John F. Keenan. Judge John F. Keenan held on 12 May 1986 that the proper forum for filing the suit is India. Thereupon, on 5 Sept. 1986 the Union of India filed the suit at Bhopal against the U.C.C. requesting the court to award Rs. 3900 crores as compensation. On 17

---

[55] Article 2(a) of the Charter of the Economic Rights and Duties.

[56] Article 2 (2) (b), ibid.

[57] Rudolf Dolzer, "New Foundations of the Law of Expropriation of Alien Property", A.J.I.L., Vol. 75 (1981) p. 553 at p. 589.

* See also for IAS (2002) Q. 5(b).

[58] AIR 1987 SC 1086.

[59] Ibid, at p. 1099.

December, 1987 Bhopal District Court passed an interim order directing the U.C.C. to deposit Rs 350 Crores. U.C.C. appealed against the said order and the High Court reduced the quantum of interim compensation to Rs. 250 crores. The U.C.C. once again filed an appeal in the Supreme Court against the order of the High Court. Thus the Bhopal Gas Leak Case reached the Supreme Court on the basis of compromise between the Union of India and the U.C.C. The Supreme Court passed an order on 14 February, 1989 directing the U.C.C. to pay a sum of US 470 million dollars in full settlement of all claims, rights and liabilities arising out of the Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster and quashing "all Criminal proceedings related to the disaster".

Thus in the Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster case the Supreme Court got an opportunity to further develop the principle of 'strict and absolute' liability enunciated in M.C. Mehta v. Union of India but the court abdicated its responsibility and even before the challenge to the validity of the Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster (Processing of Claims) Act, 1985 was decided, the Court passed settlement under awarding a very meagre sum and ending all criminal and civil liability in respect of the Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster. The settlement order has been severely criticized.[60] As remarked by Mr. P.N. Bhagwati, retired Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of India, "The Bhopal Gas has come to a disturbing end in an abrupt and unprecedented manner. The multinational has won and the people of India have lost. What has happened is unfortunate and distressing. The Supreme Court has lost the opportunity of advancing human rights jurisprudence from the Third world point of view and failed to meet the expectations of the people of India the constituency of the Court."[61]

On 22nd December, 1989, the Supreme Court upheld the validity of Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster (Processing of Claims) Act, 1985. The Court decided it in Charan Lal Sahu v. Union of India.[62] In regard to the review of decision of 14 February, 1989, the Supreme Court gave its decision on 3rd October, 1991 in case of Union Carbide Corporation v. Union of India.[63] The question for consideration, inter alia, before the Supreme Court was as to whether the compromise decision of 14 February, 1989 was within the jurisdiction of the Court because the Court was considering an interim order and not an appeal. The Supreme Court held that it was within the competence of the Court under Article 136 of the Constitution.[64] It was also argued before the Court that in M.C. Mehta v. Union of India,[65] the principle was propounded that greater the enterprise, greater quantum of compensation be awarded by the Court. The Supreme Court held that in compromise decision, this principle cannot be necessarily applied.[66] The Supreme Court rejected other arguments also and upheld the validity of the order of 14 February, 1989.

It may, however, be noted that the courts of states where multinational corporation operate possess jurisdiction over such corporations and their properties situated in the host state. If the acts of such corporation cause loss to the person or property of citizens of the state, the action can be taken against the corporation according to the law of that state.

As regards the liability in respect of Bhopal victims, two questions still remained. First, who should be blamed for the paltry compensation paid to Bhopal gas leak victims ? Secondly, who should make good the shortfall in compensation if the $ 470 million paid by Union Carbide Corporation is found inadequate ? According to the Supreme Court October 3, 1991 judgment, on both counts, the Central Government will have to pay and not the Dew Chemicals. It is the Central Government which will have to settle any additional claims for compensation made by victims of the gas tragedy.

---

[60] See Dr. S.K. Kapoor "Bhopal Gas Leak Disaster (Industrial Hiroshima) and the Waterloo of Indian Judiciary" Law Review of Sri J.N.D.C., Lucknow, Vol. II (1989) p. 13.

[61] India Today, March 15, 1989, p. 45.

[62] AIR 1990 SC 1480.

[63] AIR 1992 SC 248.

[64] Ibid, at pp. 272-273.

[65] AIR 1987 SC 1086.

[66] AIR 1992 SC 248, 309.

Reeling under the blowback of the Bhopal Gas tragedy verdict, the government on 15th June, 2010 withdrew a set of "official amendments" to the nuclear liability for civil damage bill which were seen to dilute accountability of foreign suppliers and restrict legal options of victims.

Legal controls on the Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes.—The most important Convention in this respect is 1989 Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal. It was adopted in 1989. It entered into force in 1992. So far the convention has been ratified by 187 countries. Protocol to this convention has for only 11 parties. For coming into force it requires 20 parties to ratify it. But unfortunately, the United States of America, the largest generator of hazardous wastes, has not yet ratified the convention. The definition of hazardous wastes given the convention does not include ratification wastes and wastes emanating from the normal operations of the ship because they are already covered under several other international regulations. The object of the convention is to minimize the generation of hazardous wastes to promote disposal of hazardous wastes as close as possible to their source of generation, to encourage to take precautions to control pollution and to reduce transboundary movements of hazardous and other wastes covered by the Basel convention. With a view to continuously review and evaluate the effective implementation of the provisions of the Convention, Article 15 of the convention provides for the establishment of conference of Parties as the governing body of the convention. Article 16 provides for the setting up of a Secretariat at Geneva.

Having taken into account the relevant provisions of Principle 13 of the 1992 Rio Declaration on Environment and Development, according to which States shall develop international and national legal instruments regarding liability and compensation for the victims of pollution and other environmental damage and to fulfil the commitment accepted under Article 12 of the convention and emphasizing the need to set out appropriate rules and procedures in the field of liability and compensation for damage resulting from the transboundary movement and disposal of hazardous wastes and other wastes, States Parties to the Basel Convention adopted Protocol of liability and Compensation for Damage Resulting from Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal. As noted above, it has yet to come into force.

According to Article 1 of the Protocol, the objective of the Protocol is to provide for a comprehensive regime for liability and for adequate and prompt compensation for damage resulting from the transboundary movement of hazardous wastes and other wastes and their disposal including illegal traffic in those wastes.

As regards the scope of application of Article 3 provides that the Protocol shall apply to damage due to an incident occurning during a transboundary movement of hazardous wastes and other wastes and their disposal, including illegal traffic from the point where the wastes are loaded on the means of transport in an area under the national jurisdiction of a State of export. Any contracting party may by way of notification to the Depository exclude the application of the Protocol, in respect of all transboundary movements for which it is the State of export, for such incidents which occur in an area under its national jurisdiction, as regards damage in its area of national jurisdiction. The Secretariat shall inform all contracting parties of notifications received in accordance with this Article.

As regards preventive measures, Article 6 of the Protocol provides that subject to the requirement of domestic law any person in operational control of hazardous wastes and other wastes at the time of an incident shall take all reasonable measures to mitigate damage arising therefrom. Article 4 provides for 'strict liability'. It provides that the person who notifies in accordance with Article 6 of the convention shall be liable for damage until the disposer has taken possession of the hazardous wastes and other wastes. If the State of the export is the notifier or if no notification has taken place the exporter shall be liable for damage until the disposer has taken possession of the hazardous wastes and other wastes. Article 5, which provides for 'fault-based liability', adds that any person shall be liable for damage caused or contributed to by his lack of compliance with the provisions implementing the convention or by his wrongful intentional, reckless or negligent acts or omissions. This Article shall not affect the domestic law of the contracting parties governing liability of servants and agents.

Article 13, which fixes the time of liability, states that claims for compensation under the Protocol shall not be admissible unless they are brought within ten years from the date of the incident. Article 16 however, provides that the Protocol shall not affect the rights and obligations of the contracting parties under the rules of general international law with respect to state responsibility.

The Protocol was opened for signature by States and by regional integration Organisations parties to the Basel Convention in Berne at the Federal Department of Foreign Affairs of Switzerland from 6th to 17th March, 2000 and at United Nations Headquarters in Newyork from 1st April to 10th December, 2000. According to Article 29, the Protocol would enter into force on the nineteenth day after the date of deposit of the twentieth instrument of ratification, acceptance, for mal-confirmation, approval or accession.

Reference may also be made to the other convention in this field. The Walgani Convention to Ban the Importation into Forum Islands Countries of Hazardous and Radioactive Waste and to Control the Transboundary Movement of Hazardous Waste Within South Pacific Region. This convention was adopted in 1995 and entered into force in 2001. Last but not the least, the Stockholm Convention on Persistent Organic Pollutants. This convention was adopted in 2001. It has yet not entered into force.

State Responsibility for Environment

N.B.—For this please see chapter "Development and Environment".

Defences to State Liability

Articles 29 to 35 of the 1980 Draft Articles on State responsibility submitted by International Law Commission deal with the defences to State Responsibility. They are following :

(1) Consent.—If a State gives its consent to such an act of some other State as is not in conformity with the obligation of the other State to it, then the State giving such consent will not be entitled to claim that the said act is wrongful. But this rule will not apply where a peremptory rule of international law has been violated.[67]

(2) Counter measure in respect of an internationally wrongful act.—The wrongfulness of an act of a State not in conformity with an obligation of that State towards another State is precluded if the act constitutes a measure legitimate under international law against that other State, in consequence of an internationally wrongful act of that other State.[68]

(3) Force majeure and fortuitous event.—The wrongfulness of an act of a State not in conformity with an international obligation of that State is precluded if the act was due to an irresistable force or to an unforeseen external event beyond its control which made it materially impossible for the State to act in conformity with that obligation or to know that its conduct was not in conformity with that obligation.

The above rule will not apply the State in question has contributed to the occurrence of the situation of material impossibility.[69]

(4) Distress.—The wrongfulness of an act of a State not in conformity with an international obligation of that State is precluded if the author of the conduct which constitutes the act of that State had no other means, in a situation of extreme distress, of saving his life or that of persons entrusted to his care.

---

[67] Article 29.

[68] Article 30.

[69] Article 31.

But this rule will not apply if the State in question has contributed to the occurrence of the situation of extreme distress or of the conduct in question was likely to create a comparable or greater peril.[70]

(5) State of necessity.—A State of necessity may not be invoked by a State as a ground for precluding the wrongfulness of an act of that State not in conformity with an international obligation of State unless :

(a) the act was the only means of safeguarding an essential interest of the State against a grave and imminent peril ; and

(b) the act did not seriously impair an essential interest of the State towards which the obligation existed.

In any case, a State of necessity may not be invoked by a State as a ground for precluding wrongfulness :

(a) if the international obligation with which the act of the State is not in conformity arises out of a peremptory norm of general international law.

(b) if the international obligation with which the act of the State is not in conformity is laid down by a treaty which, explicitly or implicitly, excludes the possibility of invoking the State of necessity with respect to that obligation; or

(c) if the State in question has contributed to the occurrence of the State of necessity.[71]

(6) Self-defence.—The wrongfulness of an act of a State not in conformity with an international obligation of that State is precluded if the act constitutes a lawful measure of self defence taken in conformity with the charter of the United Nations.[72]

(7) Reservation as to compensation for damage.—Preclusion of the wrongfulness of an act of a State by virtue of the provisions of Articles 29, 31 32 or 33 does not prejudge any question that may arise in regard to compensation for damage caused by that act.[73]

---

[70] Article 32.

[71] Article 33.

[72] Article 34.

[73] Article 35.

CHAPTER 11

RECOGNITION

Meaning and Definition of the term 'Recognition'*

As aptly remarked by Professor G. Schwarzenberger, "The growth of international law is best understood as an expanding process from a nucleus of entities which have accepted each other's negative sovereignty and on the basis of consent, are prepared to maintain and possibly expand the scope of their legal relations. Like most clubs, the society of sovereign States is based on the principle of co-option. In exercising this preorgative the existing subjects of international law employ the device of recognition." According to Prof. L. Oppenheim, "In recognising a State as member of international community, the existing States declare that in their opinion the new State fulfils the conditions of statehood as required by international law." [1] Fenwick also subscribes to the view that through recognition the members of the international community formally acknowledge that the new State has acquired international personality. The Institute of International Law has defined the term 'recognition' in the following words : it is "......the free act by which one or more States acknowledge the existence of a definite territory of a human society politically organized independent of any other existing States and capable of observing obligations of international law by which they manifest through their intention to consider it a member of international community." [2] According to Kelsen, a community to be recognised as an internaitonal person must fulfil the following conditions : (1) The community must be politically organised ; (2) It should have control over a definite territory ; (3) This definite control should tend towards permanence ; and (4) The community thus constituted must be independent.[3] Thus the conditions of a Statehood are (a) People ; (b) a territory ; (c) a government ; and (d) sovereignty. "Recognition of a State is an act by which another State acknowledges that the political entity recognized possesses the attributes of statehood." [4] In short, we may say that through recognition, the recognising State acknowledges that the recognised State possesses the essential conditions of statehood. However, international law does not provide as to how these essential conditions are to be determined. In fact, international law leaves members of international community free to determine by themselves whether the recognised States contain the essential condtions of statehood. It is because of this reason that very often recognition is said to be a political diplomatic function.[5]

Theories of Recognition

There are two main theories of recognition (1) Constitutive theory ; and (2) Declaratory or Evidentiary theory.

(1) Constitutive theory.—According to this theory, recognition clothes the recognized State with rights and duties under International law. Recognition is a process through which a political community acquires internaitonal personality by becoming a member of family of nations. Hegel, Anzilloti, Oppenheim, etc. are the chief exponents of

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1982), Q. NO. 2 C.S.E. (1988), Q. 6(a), P.C.S. (1990) Q. 8(a) ; UPPCS (2001) Q. 7(b).

[1] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 127. See also Oppenheim's International Law Ninth Edition, Longman Group UK Ltd. and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, pp. 127, 128 and p. 132.

[2] Charles G. Fenwick International Law (1971), p. 156.

[3] See A.J.I.L. (1936), Vol. 30, Supplement, at p. 185.

[4] Hans Kelsen, "Recognition in International Law", A.J.I.L. Vol. 55 (1941), p. 605 at pp. 607-8.

[5] Philip C. Jessup, A Modern Law of Nations (1948), p. 63.

 See also I.A.S. (1960), Q. No. 4 and P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 5 ; C.S.E. (1979), Q. No. 8 (a) ; P.C.S. (1983) Q. 2(a) C.S.E. (1987), Q. 6 (a) ; C.S.E. 1988, Q. 6 (a) C.S.E. (1990) Q. 6(a) ; P.C.S. (1990) Q. 8(a), P.C.S. (1991) Q. 7(a) ; P.C.S. (1995) Q. 8 (a) ; UPPCS (2001) Q. 5(b) ; UPPCS (2007) Q. 6.

 See also for I.A.S. (1971), Q. No. 5 and I.A.S. (1962), Q. No. 4 ; IAS (2006) Q. 5(d).

constitutive theory. In the words of Professor Oppenheim,[6] "A State is, and becomes, an international person, through, recognition only and exclusively."* "According to the Constitutive theory, statehood and participation in the international legal order are attained by politcal group only in so far as they are recognised by established State." [7] Holland also supports the Constitutive theory. In his view, recognition, confers maturity upon State and until and unless a State is recognised, it cannot acquire rights under international law. In the view of Judge Lauterpacht, Constitutive theory is in accordance with the practices of the State and is based on sound legal principles. The practice of States, however, indicates the contrary. In practice most of the States accept the Declaratory theory. In this connection, Judge Lauterpacht has remarked that the wide acceptance of Declaratory theory is due to the reaction against the traditional conception of recognition as a political act purely and simply. In his view, there is a legal duty on the part of the State to recognize any community that has in fact acquired the characteristics of statehood.

Criticism.—Jurists have criticized the Constitutive theory. The view of Judge Lauterpacht that there is legal duty on the part of the existing States to recognize any community that has in fact acquired the characteristics of statehood, does not seem to be correct. In practice, State do not accept any such obligation. "The practice indicates, however, that although established States normally recognize new States and new governments that in fact exist, they have not consented to law norms that obligate them to do so." [8] Besides this, the Constitutive theory presents several other serious difficulties. According to this theory, if a State is not recognized it can have neither duty nor rights under international law. This is a very absurd suggestion. If we accept this proposition, it will create difficulties in the case of new State which is recognized by some States but not recognized by others. The examples of China and Bangladesh can be cited in this connection. China was not recognized by America and other Western countries for a number of years although China possessed all the essential attributes of State. But to assert that China, therefore, did not have rights and duties under international law would be an absurd proposition. Similarly, Bangladesh was not recognised for sometime by China, Pakistan, Albania, etc.

However, in support of the constitutive theory, it must be admitted that once a state is recognized it acquires status and is recognized as such by the municipal courts of the recognising state.

(2) Declaratory Theory

According to this theory, statehood or the authority of the new government exists as such prior to and independently of recognition. Recognition is merely a formal acknowledgment through which established facts are accepted. The act of recognition is merely declaratory of an existing fact that a particular State or government possesses the essential attributes as required under international law. The chief exponents of this theory are Hall, Wagner, Brierly, Pitt Corbett and Fisher. According to Prof. Hall, a State enters into the family of nations as of right when it has acquired the essential attributes of statehood. Pitt Corbett has expressed the view that existence of a State is a matter of fact. In his words, "So long as a political community possesses in fact the requisites of a statehood, formal recognition would not appear to be a condition precedent to acquisition of the ordinary rights and obligaitons incident thereto." Brierly has also remarked, "the granting of recognition to a new State is not a 'Constitutive' but a 'Declaratory' act. A State may exist without being recognized and if it exists in fact, then whether or not, it has been formally recognized by other States it has a right to be treated by them as a State." [9] The Soviet view and practice are also in favour of the declaratory theory of recognition.

---

[6] Oppenheim : See Supra note 1, at p. 125.

* Asked in I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 6(b).

[7] P.E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (1971), p. 62.

[8] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 88.

 See also for P.C.S. (1990) Q. 10(b) ; IAS (2007) Q. 6(b).

[9] J.L. Brierly. The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition (1946), p. 139.

According to the Soviet view, birth of a State is the act of internal law rather than that of international law.[10] In modern times international personality does not depend upon recognition.[11]

Criticism.—This theory has also been subject to criticism. The view that recoginition is only a declaratory of an existing fact is not completely correct.[12] In fact when a State is recognized, it is a declaratory act. But the moment it is recognized, there ensue some legal effects of recognition which may be said to be of constitutive nature.

Conclusion.—On the basis of the above discussion, it may be concluded that recognition is declaratory as well as constitutive act. "Probably the truth lies somewhere between these two theories. The one or the other theory may be applicable to different sets of facts." [13] Judge Lauterpatcht has also expressed the view that it is declaratory of a simple fact of existence of political community after ascertaining facts of statehood in the functional way. On such declaration of statements, recognition is constitutive of certain legal consequences. Svarlien has also subscribed to this view. Prof. Oppenheim who has been classed among the exponents of constitutive theory, has admitted that "Recognition is declaratory of an existing fact but constitutive in nature." [14] In the Ninth Edition of Oppenheim's International Law[15] it has been pointed out that there is "no settled view whether recognition is the only means through which a new State becomes part of the international community". On the one hand there is the view that a new State comes into existence as a matter of fact and becomes a member of international community irrespective of the fact whether it has been recognised or not. On the other hand the view is that recognition constitutes the new State as a member of the internatonal community ; no State has a duty to recognise a new State ; and that no new State has a right to be recognised by other State.[16] Indeed, "The problem is largely theoretical because state practice is inconclusive and may be reationalised either way." [17] Prof. Briggs has rightly remarked, "Juridical theories of recognition deduced from jurisprudential concepts fail to explain the facts of State conduct, and inductions from State conduct have failed to provide a juridical unambigous theory of recognition." [18] Prof. T.C. Chen has also remarked, "In the last analysis, the question of international recognition is but a reflection of the fundamental cleavage between those who regard the State as the ultimate source of international rights and duties and those who regard it as being under a system of law which determines its rights and duties under that law." * The exponents of constitutive theory want the institution of recognition to be under a system of law and that is why, Lauterpacht, the chief exponent of constitutive theory, posits a legal duty on the part of existing States to recognize any community that has in fact acquired the characteristics of statehood. The act of recognition is thereby defined as a clearly legal act, with new States having the legal right to be recognised and established States having the legal duty to recognize them. Similar reasoning is used to posit a legal duty to recognize new governments that in fact come to power in existing States." [19] On the other hand, exponents of declaratory theory contend that international personality does not depend upon recognition. They regard the State as the ultimate source of international rights and duties. According to them, there is no legal duty to recognise State even after it has attained Statehood. Thus, according to the declaratory theory, recognition depends upon the discretion or sweet will of the recognising States. States are, in practice, not prepared to be bound by any norms in this connection. However as was aptly remarked by an eminent writer,[20] "Non-recognition based on political considerations has lost most of its meaning. It no longer produces all the effects it was meant to in the past ...... Since institutions of international law are but reflex of history, they are produced by it and in turn influence its further course. That is why in the long turn the institution of recognition will surely be more and more affected by inevitable trend towards greater mutual understanding and towards the adoption of principles and criteria reflecting the growing co-operation of States of different political and economic structure."

---

[10] See Kazimierz Grozybowski Soviet Public International Law (A.W. Sijthoff, Leyden (1970), p. 69.

[11] Ibid at p. 70 M. Lachs has also observed : "We face today the waning legal importance of recognition...... Non-recognition based on political considerations has lost most of its meaning. It no longer produces all the effects it was meant to in the past." "Recognition and Modern Methods of International Co-operation." BYBIL, Vol.. XXXV, (1959) p. 252 at p. 259.

[12] See Oppenheim, Supra note 1 at p. 128.

[13] J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition, (1989), p. 133 ; see also Svarlien, An Introduction to the Law of Nations, pp. 97-98.

[14] L. Oppenheim. International, Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 128.

[15] See note 1, at p. 128.

[16] Ibid, at pp. 128-129.

[17] Ibid. at p. 129.

[18] Herbert W. Briggs, "Recognition of States : Some Reflections on Doctrine and Practice", A.J.I.L. Vol. 43 (1949), p. 113 at p. 121.

* Asked in I.A.S. (1967), Q. No. 3.

[19] Edwards Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 88.

Modes of Recognition*

Recognition may be of two kinds—De facto and de jure recognition. The practice of States shows that in first stage the State generally give de facto recognition. Later on, when they are satisfied that the recognized State is capable of fulfilling international obligations, they confer de jure recognition on it. That is why, it is sometimes said, de facto recognition of State is a step towards de jure recognition. We will now discuss in a little greater detail both kinds of recognition.

De facto Recognition

According to Prof. G. Schwarzenberger, "When a State wants to delay the de jure recognition of any State, it may, in the first stage grant de facto recognition." The reason for granting de facto recognition is that it is doubted that the State recognized may be stable or it may be able and willing to fulfil its obligations under international law. Besides this, it is also possible that the State recognized may refuse to solve its main problems. De facto recognition means that the State recognized possesses the essential elements of statehood and is fit to be a subject of international law. However, the effects of de jure recognition are more far-reaching. In the words of Oppenheim, "The de facto recognition of a State or government takes place when, in the view of the recognising State the new authority although actually independent and wielding effective power in the territory under its control, has not acquired sufficient stability or does not yet offer prospects of complying other requirements of recognition such as, willingness or ability to fulfil international obligations." [21] In the view of Judge Lauterpacht, de facto recognition shows that the recognizing State wants to establish its relations with the recognised State without establishing diplomatic relations. As remarked by Prof. Oppenheim, De facto recognition is, in a sense, provisional and liable to be withdrawn if the absent requirement of recognition fails to materialize." [22] In the view of Judge Philip C. Jessup, "De facto recognition is a term which has been used without precision when properly used to mean the recognition of the de facto character of a government, it is objectionable and indeed could be identical with the practice suggested of extended recognition without resuming diplomatic relations." [23]

De jure Recognition

De jure recognition is granted when in the opinion of recognizing State, the recognized State or its Government possesses all the essential requirements of statehood, and it is capable of being a member of the international community. As pointed out by Prof. H.A. Smith, the British practice shows that three conditions precedent are required for the grant of de jure recognition of a new State or a new Government. The three conditions are as (i) A reasonable assurance of stability and permanence ; (ii) The

---

[20] M. Lachs, see supra note 11.

* C.S.E. (1987) Q. 6 (a).

 Asked in I.A.S. (1974), Q. No. 2 ; For answer of this question see the two kinds of recognition and the distinction between them discussed below.

[21] See Oppenheim, see supra note 14, at pp. 134-35.

[22] Ibid at p. 136.

[23] Phillip C. Jessup. A Modern Law of Nations, p. 57.

Government should command the general support of the population; and (iii) It should be able and willing to fulfil its international obligations.[24] Further, "Recognition de jure results from an expressed declaration or from a positive act indicating clearly the intention to grant this recognition such as the establishment of diplomatic relations." [25] De jure recognition is final, and once given cannot be withdrawn. As pointed out earlier, for de jure recognition and the intention to establish diplomatic relaitons are necessary.

Distinction between De facto and De jure Recognition*

As observed by Prof. G. Schwarzenberger, "De jure recognition is by nature provisional and may be made dependent on conditions with which the new entity has to comply. It differs from de jure recognition in that there is not yet a formal exchange of diplomatic representatives. De jure recognition ......is complete, implying full and normal diplomatic relaiton." In the words of Kelsen :"......de jure recognition is final, whereas de facto recognition is only provisional and thus may be withdrawn." [26] According to Prof. Oppenheim, so far as the legislative and other internal acts of the State recognized are concerned, there is hardly any difference between de facto and de jure recognition.[27] Thus we see that from the point of legal effect, there is hardly any difference between de jure and de facto recognition of a State. As a matter of fact, de facto Government enjoys same immunities from suits as de jure Government. However, diplomatic courtesies and representations are usually not accorded to de facto government except in extraordinary circumstances occurring in times of war. Thus, "The distinction between de jure and de facto recognition is in essence that the former is the fullest kind of recognition while the latter is a lesser degree of recognition, taking account on a provisional basis of present realities." [28]

In Luther v. Sagor,[29] it was held that there is no distinction between de facto and de jure recognition for the purpose of giving effect to the internal acts of the recognized authority. The facts of this case are as follows :—

In June, 1918, Russia nationalised timber and other industries. Consequently, the mill of the plaintiff was acquired. In August, 1920, the representatives of the Russian Government entered into a contract with the defendant to sell some timber, etc. The plaintiff requested the Court to declare that all the goods purchased by the defendant under the said contract were his property. The defendant contended that Russia was a Sovereign State and by the act of a Sovereign State, the ownership of the plaintiff was ended. Britain had given de facto recognition to Russia. The court decided in favour of the defendant. Warrington, L.J. held : "...... there is no difference for the present purposes between a Government recognised as such de jure and one recognised de facto. In the latter case, as well as in the formal the government in question acquires the right to be treated by the recognising State as an independent Sovereign State ......"[30]

This rule has been applied in a number of cases. For example in Bank of Ethopia v. National Bank of Egypt. and Liquori,[31] the court ruled that in view of the fact that the British Government granted recognition to the Italian Government as being the de facto Government of the area of Abyssinia, which was under Italian control, effect must be given to an Italian decree in Abyssinia dissolving the plaintiff bank appointing liquidator.

---

[24] H.A Smith, Great Britain and the Law of Nation, Vol. I, p. 79.

[25] Philip Marshall Brown "Legal Effects of Recognition", A.J.I.L., (1950), p. 617 at p. 639.

* See also for I.A.S. (1970), Q. No. 4 and P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 3 ; P.C.S. (1982) Q. No. 2 ; P.C.S. (1983) Q. 2(b) ; C.S.E. (1984) Q. 5(b) ; C.S.E. (1988) Q. 6 (a) ; C.S.E. (1993) Q. 6(b) ; IAS (2001) Q. 8(a) ; IAS (2003) Q. 5(b) ; IAS (2009) Q. 6(a).

[26] "Recognition in International Law", AJIL, Vol. 35 (1941), p. 605 at p. 612.

[27] Oppenheim, see supra note 14, at p. 136.

[28] Oppenheim's International Law, note 1, at p. 155.

[29] (1921) 3 K. B. 532 ; see also Williams v. Bruffy, (1917) U.S. 178 at p. 186 and Underhill v. Hernandez, (1897) 168 U.S. 230 at p. 253.

[30] Adopted from L.C. Green, International Law Through Cases Third Edition (1970), pp. 133-134.

[31] (1937) Ch. 517.

Another leading case on the point is The Arantzazu Mendi.[32*] The facts of the Arantzazu Mendi case are as follows :

The Arantzazu Mendi was a Spanish ship registered at Bilbao. After the occupation of Bilbao by insurgents led by General Franco, the republican Government of Spain passed a decree taking the Arantzazu Mendi in its possession. At this, the ship was in the High Seas. When the ship reached London on August 11, 1937, the onwer of the ship held a writ for taking possession of the ship. The ship was arrested by the Admiralty-Marshall. The Republican Government made a conditional appearance as the defendant. In March, 1938, General Franco passed a decree taking the said ship and other ship in his possession. Till April, 13, the owners of the ship consented to the decree in General Franco and declared the ship to be under him. On the same day, the Republican Government issued a writ but the officers of the Government of Franco argued that the same was ineffective because it was against a foregin Sovereign State which does not consent to be under its jurisdiction. The Republican Government of Spain was a Government recognised de jure by Britain while the National Government under General Franco was a Government recognised de facto by Britain. The House of Lords dismissed the writ and declared the warrant of arrest as invalid. Lord Atkin observed : "By 'exercising de facto administrative control' or 'exercising effective administrative control' I understand exercisng all the functions of a Sovereign Government ....It necessarily implies the ownership and control of property whether for military or civil purposes, including vessels whether warship or merchant ships. In those cirumstances, it seems to me that recognition of a Government as possessing all those attributes in a territory while not subordinate to any other Government in that terrtory is to recognise it as sovereign, and for the purposes of international law as a foreign State." He further observed : "There is ample authority for the proposition that there is no difference for the present purpose between a recognition of a State de facto as opposed to de jure. For these reasons I think it was established by the foregin office letter that the National Government of Spain at the date of writ was a foreign State and could not be impleaded."

As pointed out earlier, one of the main differences between de facto and de jure recognition is that in de facto recognition diplomatic relations are not formally established. Diplomatic relations are formally established only after the grant of de jure recognition. The majority of jurists are of the view that so far as the legal effects are concerned, there is hardly any difference between the two types of recognition. According to Wiliam W. Bishop, if at all there is difference, it is political rather than legal.[33] In the view of Prof. Kelsen, "From the juristic point of view, the dinstinction between de jure and de facto recognition is of no importance. Any codification of International Law relating to recognition can ignore it." [34] In the view of Fenwick and Judge Lauterpacht, there are certain differences between de facto and de jure recognition. They have pointed out that in case of succession only the State, which has been granted de jure recognition will be deemed to be the successor State. It may, however, be pointed out that in last few years, the judicial decisions have not subscribed to this view. "Since succession to liabilities is same, whether de facto or de jure recognition is extended, it cannot be argued consistently that a difference arises in succession of rights." [35]

It is, therefore clear from the above discussion that if at all there is a difference between de facto and de jure recognition, it is chiefly political rather than legal. In de jure recognition formal diplomatic relations are established whereas in de facto recognition diplomatic relations are not established. To conclude in the words of Prof. Charles L. Cochran, "Whatever the merits of the arguments for or against the distinction between de facto and de-jure recognition, it is clear that the difference, if any, is becoming less clear.

---

[32] (1939) A.C. 256.

[*] See also for I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 7 (b) and I.A.S. (1968), Q. No. 11 (a).

[33] See William W. Bishop, Jr. International Law : Cases and Material, 2nd Ed. (1962), p. 289.

[34] H. Kelsen, "Recognition in International Law", AJIL, Vol. 35 (1941), p. 605 at p. 613.

[35] Charles L. Cochran, "De-facto and 'De-jure Recognition : Is there a Difference ?" AJIL, Vol. 62 (1968), p. 457.

The existence of de facto recognition is becoming a moribund issue simply by not being raised as a possbility by the Government." [36]

Recognition of Insurgency*

Insurgency denotes the state of political revolt in a State. Insurgency, presupposes a civil war.[37] "Insurgency is used to denote the condition of political revolt in a country where the rebels have not attained the character of belligerents." Thus "Insurrection is a war of citizens against the State for the purposes of obtaining power in the whole or part. It always implies a sustained armed struggle by a group of citizenry against an established order." [38] In fact, insurgency is an intermediate stage between tranquillity and belligerency. In the view of Judge Lauterpacht if the State recognizes the insurgents of another State, it would imply that it would not treat such insurgents as violators of law. It also implies that such a State wishes to establish relations with such insurgents on a temporary basis. The effect of insurgency is that it partially internationalises the conflict. In the view of Judge Lauterpacth, it is not against international law to recognize insurgents as a de facto government over the territory under their control. It is merely an acknoiwedgment of fact situation for practical purposes.

Essential Conditions for Recognising Insurgents

Following are the essential conditions for recognition of insurgents :—

(1) Control over a considerable part of the territory ;

(2) Considerable support to the insurgents from the majority of the people living in the territory ; and

(3) Insurgents should have the capacity and will to carry out the international obligations.

Effects of recognition of insurgency—The recognition of insurgency is less important than the recognition of belligerents. The following effects ensue from the recognition of insurgency :—

(1) They (i.e. insurgents) are not treated as pirates ;

(2) The rebels of civil strife are treated as hostes generis humani (the public enemy) until they are recognized as insurgents ;

(3) The international rules of war become applicable to them.

Recognition of belligerency **

"When the insurgents are well organized, conduct hostilities according to laws of war and have a determinate territory under their control they may be recognized as belligerents whether or not the parent State has already recognized that status."[39] As in the case of a recognition of a State recognition of belligerency is the question of policy and not of law. Consequently some States find it convenient to recognise belligerency and some do not. The policy of State in this regard hinges upon national interest of recognizing State." [40] The belligerency is in fact the final status of three stages of the ascending intents of the conflict which presents a 'violent challenge to the sovereign authority within a State'. "Recogniton of belligerency is the acknowledgment of a juridical fact that there exists a state of hostilities between two factions contending for power or authority." [41]

Essential conditions for the recognition of belligerents

Recognition of belligerency is treated to be an unfriendly act until the following conditions are present :

---

[36] Ibid at p. 460.

* See also for IAS (1971), Q. No. 6; IAS (1957), Q. No. 3; PCS (1982), Q. No. 7 (e) ; P.C.S. (1983) Q. 8 (b).

[37] Kelsen "Recognition in International Law", AJIL, Vol. 35 (1941), p. 605 at p. 616.

[38] R.P. Dhokalia, "Civil Wars and International Law", AJIL, Vol 11 (1971), p. 219 at p. 225 ; see also Chen Tichiang, The International Law of Recognition, p. 398 ; H. Lauterpacht, Recognition in International Law, p. 275.

 See also for IAS (1957), Q. No. 3 ; IAS (1955), Q. No. 8 ; PCS (1982), Q. No. 7(e) ; PCS (1983) Q. 8(b).

[39] Philip C. Jessup, A Modern Law of Nations, p. 53.

[40] M.K. Nawaz "Bangladesh and International Law", AJIL (1971), p. 251 at 259.

[41] Ibid

(1) The armed conflict is to be of general character ;

(2) The insurgents occupy and administer a considerable portion of the national territory.

(3) They conduct hostilities through armed forces under a responsible authority. Moreover, they conduct hostilities in accordance with the rules of war ; and

(4) The hostilities are to be of such magnitude that the foreign States may find it necessary to define their attitude towards the belligerents and the established government.

Effects of recognition of belligerents.—Following are the effects or consquences of the recognition of belligerency :

(1) From the date on which the recognition of belligerency is accorded international law rules governing the conduct of hostilities apply.

(2) The conflict is internationalised and the belligerents get some rights under International Law.

(3) The relations between the recognized belligerent authorities established government and the recognising States are governed by International Law rather than municipal law.

Distinction between recognition of States and Government.*

Generally a State is recognized when it possesses essential elements of Statehood. The recognition of a State means that it has been included as a member of international community. There is a difference between recognition of State and of a government. Once a State is recognized, it becomes a member of international community. By recognition the international community determines that the recognized State possesses the essential qualities of a State, and is able and willing to fulfil its international obligations. But so far as the recognition of a government is concerned, it simply means that the government recognized is entitled to represent the state concerned and that it depends on facts and circumstances. For example if there is a civil war in a State and through revolution the government of that State changes, the other States have to take a decision as to whether to grant recognition to the said government or not. If the change in the government takes place in accordance with the constitutional provision through peaceful means, then such a government ordinarily receives recognition from other States and the existing ambassadors continue without any change or their formal reappointment on the same post. For example, after the replacement of Congress (I) government by the National Front Government recently recognition of the new government was implicit in continuance of the existing diplomatic envoys. The position is, however, different when the change takes place by the use of force or revolution. In such a case other States have to see whether the new government commands the respect of the people. Besides, it has also to be ascertained as to whether the new government has signs to become permanent or stable. When the other States are satisfied that the new government commands the support of the majority of the people and may become stable, other States accord recognition to such a government. Ordinarily it is seen that recognition of government is given simultaneously with the rcognition of the State. For example, most of the States which recognized Bangladesh also recognized simultaneously its government. The distinction between recognition of State and Government has been aptly summed up by P.E. Corbett in the following words : "The recognition of governments is a different matter, but one clouded with similar ambiguities. What is involved is not the acknowledgment of statehood but decision as to who is entitled to act for a given State.[42]

As in the case of recognition of States, in respect of the recognition of a government also states do not accept any obligation and much depends on their discretion or sweet will. This can be explained with the example of China. Most of the

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1957), Q. No. 3 and P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 5 ; C.S.E. (1987), Q. 6(a) ; P.C.S. (1988), Q. 6, P.C.S. (1990) Q. 8(a) ; P.C.S. (1991) Q. 7 (a).

[42] P.E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (1971), p. 66.

States accepted China as a State but for many years they did not recognise the Government of Communist China on the mainland of China and Formosa which is practically a government in exile on an island 70 miles off the Chinese mainland, having support of less than two per cent of the Chinese population, was officially held by the majority of States to be the de jure government of China's immense territory and seven hundred million people. P.E. Corbett has, therefore, suggested that "......the decision should be in the hands of an organisation of that universality, and the U.N. is our nearest approach. Agreement that the Committees which pass upon credentials of delegates to the General Assembly and the Security Council should be their decision confirm or deny, in such a way as to bind all members, the title of the delegates senders to govern, would be a long step in the right direction." [43]

Recognition of governments serves three functions—(i) it ensures that only regimes which clearly deserve such status are accepted as governments of states ; (ii) it assures new governments that others will respect their status ; and (iii) it serves to inform courts, government agencies and nationals of recognising states that a particular regime is in fact the government of another state.[44] Lately some scholars have expressed the view that recognition of governments should be abolished because decision in respect of recognition of new government often depends on policy and the current doctrine on the effects of recognition or non-recognition creates unnecessary confusion.[45] But it has been correctly pointed out that "......... abolishing recognition of governments would be a mistake. This is not to argue that existing institution is perfect. Far from it advocates of abolition are correct in their basic criticism of recognition as it has been practiced and in their insistence that any government in effective control of its state should have its status acknowledged and respected. If recognition of governments is to perform its proper functions and confusion among acknowledgments of status, communication, and approval is to be avoided, recognition decisions must be based solely on whether the new government has control of that state." [46]

*Is there a duty to recognize. —As pointed out earlier a State is generally recognized when it possesses the essential conditions and elements of statehood as noted earlier. In the view of Judge Lauterpacht, if a State possesses the above mentioned essential elements of statehood, International Law posits a duty on other States to recognise such a community. The view of Judge Lauterpacht is not supported by the parties of States. In practice, States have not consented to any such obligation. "Practice indicates, however, that although established States normally recognise new State and new governments, that in fact exist they have not consented to law norms that obligate them to do so." [47] Kelsen also subscribes to this view. He writes : "such an obligation, however, desirable is not stipulated by positive international law. Existing States are only empowered, they are not obligated to perform the acts of recognition. Refusal to recognise the existence of a new State is no violation of general international law." [48]

*Facultative Theory of Recognition or is recognition a political or discretionary act ?—As pointed out earlier, a State to be recognized should possess the above-mentioned elements of statehood. But International Law does not provide as to how the above-mentioned essential elements are to be ascertained. In fact the granting of recognition depends upon the discretion of the recognizing State. In other words, International law leaves the States free to determine as to whether a particular State possesses the essential elements of statehood. In the view of Judge Lauterpacht, International Law posits a duty on the existing States to recognize any community which possesses the essential elements of statehood. This view does not seem to be correct because neither it is supported by the practice of States nor does International Law impose any such duty upon States. As pointed out earlier, the granting of recognition depends much upon the discretion of the State. The practice of the States shows that recognition is a political function. "Recognition constitutes the weakest link in international law. Since recognition tends to enhance the prestige of recognized community, and also sometimes its material resources, recognition is accorded prematurely to sympathetic regimes and is protectedly withheld from unsympathetic ones"[49] Prof. Schwargenberger has also remarked : "In the absence of established rules or treaty obligation to the contrary, recognition is a matter of discretion." "Recognition of a new State or government is a political diplomatic function .... It is determined by reasons of expediency and high State policy. No State or group of persons organized politically has legal claim to recognition though it may possess moral claim." [50]

---

[43] P.E. Corbett, The Growth of World Law (1971), p. 67.

[44] M.J. Patterson, "Recognition of Governments should not be abolished" A.J.I.L., Vol. 77 (1983) p. 31.

[45] Ibid.

[46] Ibid., at pp. 49-50.

* See also for PCS (1976), Q. No. 3 ; For answer of this question see also theories of recognition discussed earlier.

[47] Edward Collins, see supra note 19 at p. 89.

[48] Kelsen, Supra note 31, at p. 610.

 See also for IAS (1972), Q. No. 10(c) ; IAS (1969), Q. No. 4 and IAS (1960) Q. No. 4 ; CCS (1979) Q. No. 8 (a) ; C.S.E. (1992) Q. 5 (d).

Since recognition of a new State is a political diplomatic function, States sometimes grant premature recognition to a new State. A premature recognition is granted to new State although it has yet not attained statehood. Since the granting of recognition is a discretionary act, granting of premature recognition is not forbidden. Whatever be the reasons which prompt an existing State to recognise a new State, even though prematurely, it cannot be regarded as violative of international law because granting of recognition is a matter which depends upon discretion of the recognising States.

According to the Soviet view also, recognition is a political act and it is in the establishment of diplomatic relations which facilitate co-operation between States, that the political meaning of recognition above all consists.[51] The People's Republic of China also seems to follow this view.[52] In respect of recognition, the British practice is also based on political realism.[53] In practice, India also considers recognition as a political and discretionary act. The practice of States shows clearly that recognition is political function and it ultimately depends upon the discretion of the States. For example, China was not recognized by many countries for a long time although China possessed all the essential elements of statehood. The obvious reason for this was that it was in the political interests of States not to recognize China.

Suggestions.—Judge Philip C. Jessup has suggested that the matter of the existence of the statehood of a new State must be subject to the collective decision. In his view, unless a declaration is made in regard to the existence of the statehood of any political community, the members of the U.N. should not recognise such a new State. The General Assembly may make such a declaration on the recommendation of the Security Council. In the words of Judge Jessup, "The declaration of the General Assembly might also include a statement of the position that members of the U.N. would not independently accord recognition to new State." [54] If this suggestion is accepted and implemented, recognition will cease to be a political and discretionary act and will become a matter under the International collective control. Percy E. Corbett also agrees with the view of Judge Jessup. He writes : "Since any group satisfying conditions will, judging now by 23 years (now 60) of experience almost certainly desire the prestige and other advantages of membership in the U.N., its application could be treated at the same time as a submission of its claim to statehood, and its admission accepted as a conclusive evidence of this status and of international personality."[55]

---

[49] A.V. Levontin, The Myth of International Security, pp. 122-23.

[50] Philip Marshall Brown, "Legal Effects of Recognition, AJIL Vol. 44 (1950) p. 617.

[51] See Academy of Sciences of U.S.S.R., International Law, p. 117.

[52] See James C. Hsiung, "China's Recognition, Practice and its Implications in International Law" in China's Practice of International Law ; Some case studies Edited by Jerome Alan Cohen (1972), p. 14 at p. 23.

[53] See J.G. Merrils, "Recognition and Construction", ICLQ, Vol. 20 (July, 1971) p. 476.

[54] Philip C. Jessup, A Modern Law of Nations, pp. 47-48.

[55] P.E. Corbett, the Growth of World Law (1971), p. 64.

Legal effects of recognition.* —As pointed out earlier, recognition is, a political diplomatic function and depends upon the discretion of the recognizing State. But once recognition is accorded, there ensue certain legal effects. The recognized State acquires certain rights, privileges and immunities under international law as well as municipal law. In the words of Starke, "Recognition produces legal consequence affecting the rights, powers and privileges of the recongised States or government both at International Law and under the municipal law of States which have given it recognition." [56] Some jurists are of the view that since recognition is a political act, there ensue no legal effects except the special agreements which are made at the time of granting recognition. For example, Philip Marshall Brown holds this view.[57] But this view does not seem to be correct. "The typical act of recognition has two legal functions. Firstly, the determination of statehood, a question of law : Such individual determination may have evidential effect before a tribunal. Secondly, the act of recognition is a condition of the establishment of formal, optional and bilateral relations, including diplomatic relations and the conclusion of treaties. It is this second function which has been described by some jurists as 'constitutivist' although here it is not a condition of statehood." [58] Kelsen has rightly written that by the grant of recognition, legal relations are established between the recognising and the recognised States and their relations are governed by the rules of international law.[59]

Following are the main effects of recognition :

(1) The recognized State becomes entitled to sue in the courts of the recognized State ;

(2) The courts of the recognizing State given effect to the past[60] as well as present legislation and executive acts of the recognized State.

(3) In case of de jure recognition, diplomatic relations are established and the rules of international law relating to privileges and immunities apply.

(4) A recognised State is entitled to sovereign immunity for itself as well as its property in the Courts of the recognising State.

(5) The recognised State is also entitled to the succession and possession of the property situated in the territory of the recognising State.

For example, State X deposited some gold in State Y. There is a rebellion in State X and the rebels are successful in establishing a parallel government. After some time Y grants de jure recognition to the new government. The new government claim the gold deposited by the old Govt. The new government which has been granted de jure recognition will be entitled to the succession and possession of the gold deposited by the old government for recognition of a government means the recognised government has effective control over the State and is fit to represent that State.

It is clear from the above discussion that after being recognized, the new State becomes a member of the international community. After the grant of de jure recognition the State recognized becomes entitled to establish diplomatic relations with other States. Since it becomes a member of international community, it requires certain rights as well as duties under international law.

---

* See for IAS (1973), Q. No. 11(b) and IAS (1955), Q. No. 2 ; CCS (1979), Q. No. 8(a) ; IAS (2009) Q. 6(a).

[56] Starke, supra note 13 at p. 146 : Edward Collings also writes; "Although recognition is essentially a political act, it is important to realize that the consequences of non-recognition are of both political and legal importance." Supra note 16 at p. 89.

[57] Philip Marshall Brown, See Supra Note, 22 at p. 640.

[58] Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Second Edition (1973), p. 93.

[59] Kelsen, see Supra note 34, at p. 609.

[60] For retroactive of recognition. See Boguslawski and Another v. Gdynia Amervka Line, (1950) 2 All E.R. 355 ; see also Luther v. Sagor (1921) 3 KB 532 ; Guarantee Trust Co. v. U.S. 340 U.S. 140 ; U.S. v. Pink, 315 U.S. 203.

 P.C.S. (1983) Q. 2(b). For answer see also recognition of government discussed earlier.

Consequence of Non-recognition*

Although recognition is essentially a political act, there are certain political as well as legal consequences of non-recognition as a State. 'Recognition can bring, inter alia, an opportunity to establish diplomatic and consular relations with recognising States ; an increase in stability at home and prestige abroad ; access to foreign aid, loans and trade ; and, the case of a new government of an established State, access to State funds on deposit in the banks of recognizing States. A decision to withhold recognition can be a powerful or an important political weapon, depending upon the relative power of the non-recognizing and unrecognized entities." [61] There may be following consequences of non-recognition of State :—

(1) An unrecognised State cannot sue in the courts of non-recognising State. In Russian Socialist Federated Soviet Public v. Cirbaria,[62] the New York Court had observed that such a State cannot sue, as matter of right, in American courts. In Guarantee Trust Co. of New York v. U.S.,[63] it was laid down that the court is not competent to recognise such a State. It is the function of the Executive. Similarly in U.S. v. Pink[64] the Supreme Court of the United States of America laid down the principle that the court shall decide the cases of only those States which has been recognised by the United States of America. The British Courts have also given similar decisions. For example, in re Al Fin Corporation's Patent,[65] it was held that the Court shall recognise the executive acts of only those States who have been recognised.

Thus, where a new government is established in a State as an outcome of rebellion and it is recognised by some governments as de jure Government, while some have not recognized at all, the new government can intervene in judicial proceedings instituted to proceed against the assets of the State claiming sovereign immunity in the State which have recognised either de facto or de jure but it cannot sue in the courts of States which have not recognized it. It can institute actions to take possessions of the assets of the State in the courts of those States which have recognized it. Where the recognised Government has expropriated the property of a company belonging to a citizen, and bestowed title in a State Corporation. The Corporation sells the oil to a Multinational Corporation. The Multinational Corporation shall enjoy a firm title to the oil in those States which have recognized it.*

(2) A State which has not been recognised, is not entitled to enter into diplomatic relations with the non-recognising States.

(3) The diplomatic representatives of a State which has not been recognised do not possess immunities from legal processes in foreign States.

(4) Such States are also not entitled to get their property situated in foreign States. A leading case on this point is Bank of China v. Wells Fargo Bank & Union Trust Co.[66] In this case, the defendant was a Californian Bank, in which the money of Bank of China was deposited. Bank of China was a Chartered Bank according to the Chinese Law having two-thirds stocks of the Government of China and the rest of the Chinese citizens. In 1949, the Bank of China filed a suit in the District Court to get the money deposited in the defendant Bank. On June 27, 1945, the defendant Bank was informed through cable from Shanghai that the Bank of China had been taken over by the Chinese People's Liberation Army. On 26th January, 1950, the New People's Republic Government of China requested the court that the suit of the plaintiff be dismissed and they should be substituted in place of the plaintiff. On the other hand, the Nationalist Government of China said that it was the

---

* See for IAS (1955), Q. No. 2 ; C.S.E. (1982) Q. 6, P.C.S. (1988) Q. 6 ; I.A.S. (2009) Q.6(a).

[61] Edward Collins, see Supra note 49.

[62] New York Court of Appeals, 235-255.

[63] (1938) 304 U.S. 126 at p. 137.

[64] (1942) 315 U.S. 203 ; 86 L. Ed. 796.

[65] (1970) Ch. 160 ; see also Zeiss case, (1967) I.A.S. 853.

 See for C.S.E. (1982) Q. 6 (a) : see also the fourth print discussed below.

 C.S.E. (1982) Q. 6(b).

* C.S.E. (1982) Q. 6 (c).

[66] (1952) 104 F. Supp. 59.

lawful claimant of the said money on the ground that America has recognised only it. Moreover, the court cannot bring about change in the management of the Bank on the basis of acts of a government which has not been recognised. The Court held : "It is not a proper function of a domestic court of the United States to attempt to judge which government best represents the interests of the Chinese State in the Bank of China. In this situation, the court should justly accept, as the representative of the Chinese State, that government which our executive deems best able to further the mutual interests of China and the United States. Since the court is of opinion that it should recognize the Nationalist Government of China as legally entitled to exercise, the Controlling corporate authority of the Bank of China in respect to the deposit in suit, the motion for summary judgment in favour of the Bank of China, as controlled by the Nationalist Government, is granted ......"

Implied Recognition

Ordinarily, recognition is a unilateral act of State and when a State recognizes another State it makes the declaration in regard to the same either orally or in writing. But sometimes recognition may be implied. In other words, the recognition of a State may be implied by the attitude and other circumstances of a State. Recognition depends upon the discretion of a State. Implied recognition may be inferred when circumstances indicate that the State concerned has been accepted as a member of the international community. In practice such an implied recognition may be only de facto. But in the following circumstances such a recognition may also be deemed to de jure recognition :

(1) When the recognized State and the recognizing State enter into a bilateral treaty and formally sign it ;

(2) The beginning of formal diplomatic relations, exchange of Consuls, etc.

In addition to the above-mentioned conditions following circumstances may also indicate implied recognition : (i) Participation of the State concerned in a multi-lateral treaty ; (ii) Participation in international conference ; and (iii) The start of negotiations between the recognising and the recognized States.

Recognition subject to a condition

Since recognition is said to be a political diplomatic function and depends much upon the discretion of the recognizing State, recognising States often impose certain conditions along with their grant of recognition. For example in 1878 while recognizing Bulgaria and Rumania, Germany imposed the condition that the said States shall not discriminate their citizens on the basis of religion. It may, however, be noted that under international law such a condition is meaningless. It can never imply that if the condition is not fulfilled the recognition shall be withdrawn. According to international law, recognition denotes that the recognized State has attained statehood and has become a member of the international community. Hence such a condition will have no effect. In the words of Starke, "It is true, however, that if recognition should under International Law become purely and simply the cognitive act of registering the statehood or of government capacity, it could not be subject to any such extrinsic terms of conditions." [67] To conclude in the words of another author "......the very essence of recognition is that the recognising State thereby declares that it has satisfied itself that the recognised authority possesses the distinguishing marks of a State. To say that one recognises that has been, subject to its conduct being satisfactory in other particulars, is sheer nonsense. It is like telling a pupil that her sum is correct if she will promise to be a good girl." [68]

Collective Recognition*

By collective recognition we mean the recognition granted by number of States collectively. For example, when a State is admitted to the United Nations, it will mean collective recognition by those States which voted in favour of the admission of such a

---

[67] Starke, note 13, p. 159.

[68] Baty, "So-called De-facto Recognition" 31 Yale L.J. (1922), p. 469.

* See also for P.C.S. (1990) Q. 8(a).

State. In its advisory opinion on Condition of admission of a State to the United Nations,[69] the International Court of justice also opined that if a State is admitted as a member of the United Nations, it will amount to collective recognition by the States who voted in favour of the admission of such a State. It may, however, be noted here that recognition is the free act of each State. The collective recognition will therefore not mean that all the members of the United Nations have recognized such a State.

Is withdrawal of Recognition possible ?

Recognition de jure is final and once given cannot be withdrawn. If the recognized State finds that the State recognized de facto is not capable of fulfilling its international obligation or lacks the signs of stability, it will not grant de jure recognition to such a State. In other words, we may say that in certain circumstances, de facto recognition may be withdrawn. But de jure recognition once given can never be withdrawn, because if after granting de jure recognition a State wants to withdraw its recognition then it will have no meaning under International law. Under International Law, recognition means that the State recognized has attained statehood. The simple fact of withdrawal of recognition by a State would not necessarily mean that the State recognized has ceased to be a State.

Retroactive Effects of Recognition

Jurists are of the view that de jure recognition has retroactive effect. In other words, after a State is recognized, its acts done prior to recognition are also recognized. As pointed out by J.M. Jones, this rule is based on policy of the States, rather than on any juristic logic. When a State recognizes another State it often recognizes the past acts of such a State with a view to establish friendly relations with such a State. Civil Air Transport Incorporated Co. v. Central Air Transport Corporation,[70] is a leading case on the retroactive effect of recognition. In this case, the appellants were a registered corporation in Delware State of the United States of America and the respondent corporation was an institution under the national government of China. After the revolution in China Chiang Kai Shek fled away to Formosa. Consequently, the Chairman of the respondent Corporation also fled away from Hongkong to Peking and declared his loyalty towards the Peking Government. The Peking Government declared respondent corporation was its property. After fleding away from China the government of Chiang-Kai-Shek established its headquarters in Formosa and sold the property of the respondent corporation to an American firm. This property included 40 air-crafts which were lying at an airfield in Hongkong. The Court had to decide whether the Chiang-Kai-Shek government was entitled to sell this property. In other words, the courts had to decide the retroactive effects of the grant of de jure recognition to the communist government by England, i.e. whether past acts of de jure government can be valid only if such a government is the same which had been granted de facto recognition previously. The court also ruled that the retroactive effect of a de jure recognition of a government did not mean that the legal acts performed by other de jure government would become invalid. Lord Simon of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council observed : Primarily, at any rate, retroactivity to recognition operates to validate act of a de jure government which has subsequently become the new de jure government and not invalidate acts of previous de jure government." [71] In other words, at the date when the transaction regarding the sale of the property of the respondent corporation took place, the nationalist China was de jure government of China and hence it was entitled to sell its property. In short, the granting of de jure recognition of a communist government of China would not invalidate the legal acts of the former de jure government of China.

In British Courts such retroactive operation is extremely wide. Thus : (a) A cause of action based upon the existence of a particular State or Government at the date of institution of proceeding, is nullified if before or at the time of the hearing the British Government recognises another State as government as having been in existence at the date the action commenced ; (b) A judgment of a Court of first instance based upon the existence of a particular State or Government at the date of judgment may be set aside on appeal if before or at the time the appeal is heard, the British Government recognises another State Government as having been in existence at the time the judgment was delivered." [72] But the correct position has been aptly summed up by Brownlie[73] in the following words : "British and American Courts have applied the principle of retroactivity in following or interpreting the views of the executive in matter of recognition but Oppenheim describes the rules as one of convenience rather than of principle." Once again one ought not to generalize except to say that on the international plane there is no rule of retroactivity. When a State makes a late acceptance of the existence of a State than in the field of the basic rights and duties of existence, this recognition ex hypothesi cannot be 'retroactive' because in a special sense it is superfluous. In the sphere of optional relation and voluntary obligation may or may not be, since the area is one of discretion."

---

[69] I.C.J., Rep. (1948), p. 4.

[70] (1953) A.C. 70 ; See also Gdynia Wmeryka Linie (Zeglugowe Spolka Akcyjna) v. Boguslnwski, (1953) A.C. 11.

[71] Adopted from I.C. Green, International Law Through Cases, Edition (1970), p. 147.

Thus retroactive effect of recognition and its extent depends upon the intention of the recognising state.[74]

Estrada Doctrine

This doctrine was propounded by Mr. Estrada, the Foreign Minister of Mexico. In this doctrine he declared that regarding the establishment of diplomatic relations with other States, Mexico Government considers itself free to determine it in accordance with the facts and circumstances of each case. In other words if the Mexico Government considers that after the change of government in any State through revolution, a revolutionary government commands the support of the people, it may establish diplomatic relations with it. This doctrine has been subject to servere criticism because it disregards the rules of International Law. It encourages the individual appraisal in this field. However in practice it takes a new way so far as the recognition of new States are concerned. As pointed out by Philip C. Jessup,......... the Estrada doctrine properly assumes that diplomatic representatives should be considered as accredited to the State and not to the government." [75] This doctrine, therefore, does not seem to be correct and needs to be discouraged.

Stimson Doctrine

This doctrine was propounded by Mr. Stimson, Secretary of State of the United States of America. This doctrine is also often called the doctrine of non-recognition. According to this doctrine if a State grants recognition to another State in violation of international treaty, such a recognition would not be valid. By international treaty, the Stimson doctrine mainly meant the Pact of Paris, 1928, or Kellog Briand Pact, through which the State parties renounced war as an instrument of their national policy. The League Assembly also passed a resolution that any State who violated the Pact of Paris, 1928, would not be granted recognition. The Secretary of the State of the United States of America prpounded this doctrine after Japan attacked Manchuria in 1931. In this doctrine the American Secretary of States declared that any contract or treaty which was contrary to the Paris Pact of 1928 would not be acceptable. It may be noted here that China, Japan and America were all parties to the Paris Pact, 1928. Although this doctrine has much to recommend itself, it is not always followed by the States so far as the grant of recognition to new State is concerned. States refuse to accept any such obligation and treat recognition as a political diplomatic function.

Hallestein Doctrine

This doctrine was propounded in the context of the division of Germany into two i.e. East and West Germany. According to it, no State should have diplomatic relations with both the Germany. This doctrine has become inadequate and obsolete in the present times and circumstances. Now both, East Germany and West Germany, have become the members of the United Nations. Some States supporting the State of Pakistan referred this doctrine in the context of Pakistan and Bangladesh. But this doctrine has no relevance, legal or political, in the present times and circumstances especially because, inter alia, the unification of Germany has now been effected.

---

[72] Starke, note 13 at p. 173.

[73] See note 58, at p. 97-98.

[74] See Gdynia Ameryka Lenie (Zeglugowe Spolka Akchjna) v. Boguslawaski, (1953) AC 11.

[75] Philip C. Jessup—A Modern Law of Nations, p. 58.

India's Practice and Policy of Recognition of States and Governments*.—Recognition of a new State is often described as "a political diplomatic function." [76] "Recognition, or the withholding of recognition is often used as a political instrument to express approval or disapproval of a new State Government or a territorial change." [77] It may, however, be noted that "In the practice of States, the birth of a new State, the establishment of a new Government, or a territorial change, is frequently recognised by states." [78] This is true of India also. Like most other countries, India has also granted recognition to States and governments as a matter of course or routine. India has generally accorded recognition to State as soon as the conditions of statehood were fulfilled."[79] In some cases, however India was also guided by certain other considerations. It will be desirable to discuss briefly some of such cases in which recognition was not granted by India as a matter of course or routine.

China.—The first of such cases which deserves mention here is relating to China. India was one of first States to recognise People's Republic of China. (The First Country, outside the Communist block, to recognise China was Burma). India recognised China on 30th December, 1949. While many countries in the world were still waiting or were withholding recognition of China, India accorded recognition. Subsequently India's example was followed by many other States.[80]

Israel.—Probably diametrically opposed to the above case was the case of India's delayed recognition of the State of Israel. Israel, emerged as a sovereign State on May 14, 1948, and was, within a short time recognised by a number of States. But India delayed the recognition of Israel for more than two years and even when she recognised Israel on 17th September, 1950, the announcement simply stated : "The Government of India has decided to accord recognition to the Government of Israel." In this announcement, India did not express her willingness to establish (nor did it establish) diplomatic relations with the State of Israel. India has not yet established diplomatic relations with the State of Israel. India's policy in regard to Israel has been subjected to severe criticism inside as well as outside the country. Her belated recognition and non-establishment of diplomatic relations with Israel was due to the attitude of Arab States towards Israel. However, India's announcement makes at least one thing clear that India recognises the fact of the statehood of Israel. It has been aptly remarked, "In recognising Israel, India once more reiterated her determination to subscribe to the principle of de factoism, even if it was at the risk of some misunderstanding or alienating the sympathies of some of her best friends in the world. At the same time it is quite true that to a degree India's policy was a matter of expedience governed by the consideration that restraint was essential.........Further, by recognsing Israel, though not establishing diplomatic relation with her to this date, the Government of India has clearly provided weighty reasons for thinking that it distinguishes between recognition as a legal act and the establishment of diplomatic relations as a purely political act, a view confirmed by the State practice of the most countries." [81]

In January 1992, India decided to establish diplomatic relations with Israel. Subsequently this decision was immediately implemented and diplomatic relations were set up with Isreal. India took this decision in view of changed international situation. It may be noted here that earlier China, Soviet Union and some other countries had set up diplomatic relations. One of the main reasons for this was the forthcoming West Asia Peace talks in Moscow beginning on January 29, 1992.

---

* IAS (2009) Q. 6(a).

[76] Philip C. Marshal Brown, "Legal Effects of Recognition," AJIL Vol. 44 (1950), p. 617 at p. 639.

[77] Max Sorensen's Manual of Public International Law (1968), p. 267.

[78] Ibid.

[79] See K.P. Misra, "India's Policy of Recognition of States and Governments' AJIL, Vol. 55 (1961), p. 398 at p. 422.

[80] See also Q. Wright, "The Chinese Recognition Problem," AJIL, Vol. 49 (1955) p. 322.

[81] K.P Misra, see Supra note 79 at pp. 408-409.

Spain.—Next typical case is that of Spain which was recognised by India on May 2, 1956. In this case also India had delayed recognition because of political considerations. In the press communique issued on the said date, wilingness to establish diplomatic relations was clearly expressed. This is a sharp contrast to the case of Israel discussed earlier. Yet another important thing in this case was that, while expounding India's policy of recognition, Pandit Nehru stated that it was India's policy "to recognise any country that was an independent functioning country represented in U.N." Thus weightage was given to the fact of a country being represented in the U.N.

Bangladesh.—Another important case which deserves mention is that of Bangladesh which also evoked criticisms from certain countries. India recognised Bangladesh on 6th December, 1971. India's recognition of Bangladesh was widely welcomed inside the country and Indian jurists justified it. Some Indian writers even expressed the view that the elements of statehood were present in Bangladesh long before 6th December, 1971.[82] On the other hand, India's action was subjected to criticism and was regarded as premature. Thus while recognition in respect of Israel, Spain, Vietnam and East Germany had been delayed, India was very quick to accord recognition to Bangladesh. India was the first country to recognise Bangladesh. This was obviously due to expedience and political considerations.

Cambodia.—So is also the case of India's recognition of Royal Cambodian Government headed by Prince Sinhanouk. On April 1, 1975, India accorded full diplomatic recognition to the Royal Cambodian Government headed by Prince Sinhanouk in a joint communique issued at the end of the visit of the Foreign Minister of the Royal Government Mr. Sarin Chhal who claimed 97 per cent of the Cambodian territory under control of his government.[83]

Vietnam and Germany.—A brief mention of cases of North Vietnam and East Germany will not be out of place here. In both these cases, India waited for sufficiently long time before according recognition. In case of Vietnam it may be argued that her refusal to recognize was "a kind of moral pressure" that it wanted "to use for attaining the objectives set forth by the Geneva Conference." [84] The same can be said about East Germany. India might be waiting to see whether unification of Germany took place or they remained as two distinct States. Despite these weighty reasons, involvement of expediency, national interest and political considerations cannot altogether be ruled out.

Provisional Revolutionary Government of Vietnam.—A brief mention of India's recognition of the Provisional Revolutionary Government (PRG) of South Vietnam will also be desirable here. On April 30, 1975, South Vietnam surrendered unconditionally to the communists. Within hours of surrender of the Saigon regime, India accorded full diplomatic recognition to the PRG of South Vietnam. The announcement was made in the Lok Sabha by Mr. Bipinpal Das, Deputy Minister for External Affairs. This was again based on the principle of de factoism.

Recognition of the new Government of Afghan Republic under the New President.—On 1st May 1971 Afghanistan was proclaimed a democratic republic with Mr. Nur Mohammad Tarakki as President of the newly constituted Revolutionary Council. This Government was established after a coup replacing former President Daoud. India recognised the new Government on 2nd May, 1978. India was thus one of the first countries to accord recognition to the new Government of Afghanistan. Soviet Union and Bulgaria also recognised the new Government on the said date.

---

[82] See for example, Dr. Debiprosad Pal, "Bangladesh in the Eye of International Law" A.I.R. (July, 1971), Journal section, p. 102 and O. Chinappa Reddy, "Bangladesh and the Question of Recognition", Lawyer (February, 1972), p. 19.

[83] The Times of India, April 2, 1975.

[84] See K.P. Misra, Supra note 78, at p. 421.

On the basis of the above discussion, it may be concluded that while in many cases India has accorded recognition to States and governments on the principle of de factoism and as matter of course or routine, in some cases, however, she has either delayed recognition or accorded quickly being influenced by her national interest, expediency and political consideration. Recognition being a diplomatic political function, it need not be over-emphasised that this is in no way contrary to international law. India's practice is in conformity with the norms and principles of international law as well as general practice of States in this connection.

CHAPTER 12

STATE SUCCESSION*

Definition and meaning of 'State Succession.'—"A succession of government occurs when the government of a State is replaced with a new one. State succession occurs when a State ceases to exist or a new State is formed within the territory of an existing State or territory is transferred from one State to another State. When a succession situation arises, the point of chief legal interest is the effect, if any, on the international rights and obligations of the State or States concerned." [1] According to Oppenheim, "A succession of international person occurs when one or more international persons take place of another international person, in consequence of certain changes in the latter's condition." [2]

The rule of State succession was incorporated from the Roman law by Grotius.[3] In Roman Law when a person dies his rights and duties are succeeded by his successors. This principle was applied by Grotius in International Law as well. Later on, there were certain international treaties through which the rules of State succession were developed. The Law of State Succession is still developing.

Term "State Succession" misnomer.—According to T.T. Poulose, "Under traditional rules of International Law the term 'State Succession' is used when there is transmission of the rights and obligations of one State to another in consequence of territorial sovereignty." Further "the term 'State succession' has been regarded as inaccurate because it is based on municipal law analogy of the actual demise of a person and the transmission of his rights and liabilities to his successor, used by classical International law writer like Gentilis, Grotius, Pufendorf and Vattel,"[4] D.P.O. ' Connell also writes, "The term 'State succession' has been objected to as begging the question which any investigation of the consequences of change of sovereignty seeks to resolve. It seems to suggest that the State which extends its sovereignty over a specific territory thereby becomes invested with all the juridical consequences of its predecessor's acts, that is, in law as well as in fact, the latter's successor". The significance of the term is to be limited, however, to the factual situation which arises when one State is substituted for another in sovereignty over a given territory, and in this sense it enjoys the authority of an extensive literature. It does not necessarily presuppose a juridical substitution of the acquiring State in the complex of rights and duties possessed by the previous sovereign.[5] Ordinarily, the practice of States shows that no general succession takes place. "With the extinction of international person disappears its rights and duties as a person." [6] This seems to be correct to a great extent. But to say that no succession takes place among the States would not be correct. Most of the jurists agree that when an international person extincts or disappears then some of its rights and obligations are succeeded by other international persons which take place. There is, however, controversy and uncertainty as to which rights and duties devolve on the successor.[7]

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 3; P.C.S. (1989) Q. 4(a) ; UPPCS (2001) Q. 7(a).

 See also for P.C.S. (1995) Q. 9(a)

[1] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 105.

[2] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, 8th Edition, p. 157. See also Oppenheim's International Law, Ninth Edition, Vol. I, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Longman Group UK Limited and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, p. 208.

[3] Charles G. Fenwick, International Law (Third Indian Reprint, 1971), p. 172.

 See also for I.A.S. (1966), Q. No. 4 ; See also for I.A.S. (1966), Q. No. 4 ; PCS (1995) Q. 9(a).

[4] T.T. Poulose, "State Succession in India," IJIL. Vol. 10 (1970), p. 175.

[5] D.P.O.' Connell, State Succession in Municipal Law and International Law, Vol. 1 (1976), p. 3.

[6] Oppenheim, Supra note 2, at p. 159 ; See also Oppenheim's International Law, note 2, p. 210.

[7] Oppenheim's International Law, note 2, at p. 209.

Kinds of State Succession*

State Successions are of two types—(1) Universal succession ; and (2) Partial succession. "If the legal identity, of a community is completely destroyed there is said to be a 'total succession' of States. If the territory is lost while personality and legal responsibility remain unimpaired, the process, is described as 'partial succession'. This does not imply a total or partial succession respectively to the legal relation of the previous sovereign, but is merely an abbreviated way of defining the extent of the change." [8]

Universal succession.—Universal succession takes place under the following circumstances :—

(a) When one State is completely absorbed in another State either through subjugation or voluntary merger.

(b) When a State breaks into several parts and each part becomes a separate international person or are annexed by surrounding international persons.[9]

Partial succession.—Partial succession takes place—

(a) When a part of the State revolts and after achieving freedom becomes a separate international person. The breaking away of Bangladesh and becoming international person is a glaring example of partial succession. A part of state may also become independent through agreement or any other peaceful means.

(b) When a part of a State is ceded to another State.

(c) When a sovereign State loses a part of its independence by joining the federal State or when a State accepts the suzerainty or becomes a protectorate of another State.

Principle of the Continuity of States

The succession of Governments is based on the principle of the continuity of States. The change in the Government of a State does not affect the legal personality of the State.[10] The new Government succeeds to the rights and obligations of the predecessor Government.[11] This principle is based on the common interests of international community. The importance of the international agreements will suffer a set-back in case the treaty obligations are disregarded in consequence of the change of Government of a State.[12] But the treaties entered into by a State come to an end in case it is completely absorbed in another State. This rule also applies in a case when a part of State revolts and after becoming an international person, refuses to follow the treaties entered by its parent State.[13] For example, Bangladesh is not bound by the treaties entered into by Pakistan.

Reference may be made here to The Tinoco Arbitration : Great Britain—Costa Rica (1923)[14], wherein :—

In January, 1917, the Government of Costa Rica under President Alfredo Gonzalez, was overthrown by Federico Tinoco, the Secretary of War. Gonzalez fled. Tinoco assumed power, held an election, and established a new constitution in June, 1917. His Government continued until August, 1919, when Tinoco retired, and left the country. His Government fell in September following. After a provisional government under one Barquero, the old constitution was restored and elections were held under it. The restored government was a signatory to this treaty of arbitration. On the 22nd of August, 1922, the constitutional congress of the restored Costa Rican Government passed a law known as Law of Nullities No. 41. It invalidated all contracts between the executive power and private persons, made with or without approval of the legislative power between January 27, 1919, and September 2, 1919, covering the period of the Tinoco government. It also nullified the legislative decree No. 12 of the Tinoco government, dated June 28, 1919, authorizing the issue of the fifteen million colones currency notes. Great Britain claimed that the Royal Bank of Canada and the Central Costa Rica Petroleum Company were British corporations whose shares were owned by British subjects ; that the Banco International of Costa Rica and the Government of Costa Rica were both indebted to the Royal Bank in the sum of 998,000 colones, evidenced by 998, one thousand bills held by the Bank ; that the Central Costa Rica Petroleum Company owned by due assignment, a grant by the Tinoco government in 1918 of the right to explore for and exploit oil deposits in Costa Rica, and that both the indebtedness and the concession have been annulled without right by the Law of Nullities and should be expected from its operation. She asked for an award that she was entitled on behalf of her subjects to have the claim of the bank paid, and the concession recognized and given effect by the Costa Rican Government. The Government of Costa Rica denied its liability for the acts or obligations of the Tinoco government and maintained that the Law of Nullities was a legitimate exercise of its legislative government power. It further denied the validity of such claims on the merits, unaffected by the Law of Nullities.

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 2(c).

[8] O'Connell, see Supra note 5, at p. 4.

[9] See also theory of Universal Succession referred on the next page.

 See also for P.C.S. (1967), Q. No. 6.

[10] See Lazard Brothers v. Midland Bank Ltd., (1933), A.C. 283 : 102 LJKB 191 ; See also Dr. Ram Babu Saxena v. The State, A.I.R. 1950 S.C. 155 at p. 163.

[11] See Moore, Digest of International Law, Vol. 1, p. 249.

[12] See Kaplan and Katzenbach, The political Foundations of International Law, p. 113.

[13] D.P. O'Connell, "Independence and Prolems of Succession" in William V. O'Brien. The New Nations in Independence Law and Diplomacy (London, 1965), p. 20.

[14] 1, United Nations Reports of International Arbitral Awards, p. 369.

William H. Taft, Arbitrator held that the Law of Nullities in decreeing the invalidity of the Amory Concession worked no injury to the Central Costa Rica Petroleum Company Ltd., its sole stockholder, of which Great Britain can complain, because the concession was in fact invalid under the constitution of 1917. Expounding the law on the subject he observed : "The courts of the restored government are bound to administer the law of the restored government under its constitution and their decisions are necessarily affected by the limitation of that instrument. This may prevent the Court from giving full effect to international law that may be at variance with the municipal law which under the restored constitution the national courts have to administer. It is obvious that the obligations of a restored government for the acts of the usurping de facto government if succeeds cannot, from the international standpoint, be prejudiced by a constitution which though restored to life is for the purpose of this discussion, exactly as if it were new legislation which was not in force when the obligations arose." Mr. Taft, Arbitrator, quoted with approval the following observation of Dr J.B. Moore[15] : Changes in the government or the internal policy of a State do not as a rule affect its position in International law. A monarchy may be transformed into a republic or a republic into a monarchy; absolute principles may be substituted for constitutional, or the reserve ; but, though the government changes, the nation remains, with rights and obligations unimpaired." Further, "The principle of the continuity of States has important results. The State is bound by engagements entered into by governments that have ceased to exist; the restored government is generally liable for the acts of the usurper .... The origin and organization of government are questions generally of internal discussion and decision. Foreign powers deal with the existing de facto government when sufficiently established to give reasonable assurance of its permanence, and of the acquiescence of those who constitute the State in its ability to maintain itself and discharge its internal duties and its external obligations". According to Mr. Taft, this statement of law "announces the general principle which has had such universal acquiescence as to become well-settled international law."

Theories of State Succession*.—Prof. D.P.O.' Connell classifies the theories of State Succession into the following categories :

I. Theories of Continuity. II. Negative Theories. III. Theories Importing International Law. IV. Communist Theory of State Succession.

---

[15] Digest of International Law, Vol. I, 249 ; emphasis added.

* See for I.A.S. (1972), Q. No. 6.

I. Theories of Continuity*

(a) The theory of universal succession—According to this theory, "change of rules .... whether effected by cession of territory, by revolution or by death, cannot involve the replacement of one right or duty by another, but only a replacement of their subjects. If a ruler acts in a private capacity his contracts expire with his death or expulsion ; but if he acts in his princely office his commitments relate not to himself but to people through whom in virtue of the social contract, he ultimately derives his authority." [16] This theory was in vogue up to the middle of the nineteenth century. According to this theory, succession takes place by virtue of a legal principle antecedent to the enacted law of any society, and therefore, antecedent to the positive law of nations. But it may be noted that "Succession occurs, not in virtue of an external legal prescription, but in virtue of a legal quality which reposes in the objects of succession." [17]

(b) The theory of popular continuity.—According to this theory, "Change of Sovereignty involves no more than a change in the fictitious element in political organisation, the real element surviving intact. Obligations of a political character, such as, treaties attach to the element of sovereignty and lapse with it, obligations of a patrimonial character, including most economic and judicial matters attach to society and remain attached." Thus, "While the emphasis in this theory is upon legal continuity, therefore, the degree of continuity, actually achieved is, in virtue of this transformation, considerably less than that achieved in the theory of Universal Succession." [18]

(c) The theory of organic substitution.—This theory emphasises more the nature of change itself than the legal effects of political change. When States appear and disappear, the people and territory are integrated in a new organic being. There is a change in the juridical element of organisation, which does not occur in cases of change of government. The legal institutions which attach to the factual elements survive the change while those which attach to the organisational element do not survive it. This theory does not radically, differ with the preceding ones. In the words of D.P.O' Connell, "...... this means that the successor State takes over all the rights and duties of its predecessor, save those which are essentially political, if it substitutes itself factually in the property of its predecessor it must also substitute itself in the encumbrances upon that property." [19]

(d) The theory of self abnegation.—The State is at liberty to take over or reject whatever suits it in the previous legal order. It integrates within its own legal order all existing law which is compatible therewith and which is not expressly repealed. This theory emphasises the continuity rather than disruption and constructs the legal bonds of continuity on the basis of tacit consent of all the parties concerned.[20]

II. Negative Theories.—Since the Universal Succession theory did not take into account the existing facts of international practice, negative theories were developed during the latter half of the nineteenth century and early part of the twentieth century. According to these theories "the sovereignty of the predecessor State over the absorbed territory is abandoned. A hiatus is, thus, created between the expulsion of one sovereignty and the extension of the other. The successor State does not exercise its jurisdiction over the territory in virtue of a transfer of power from its predecessor, but solely because it has acquired the possibility of expanding its own sovereignty in the manner dictated by its own will. None of the incidences of sovereignty passes to the successor State. The latter seizes what it can and repudiates what it will." [21]

---

* UPPCS (2003) Q. 6.

[16] D.P.O.' Connel, State Succession in Municipal Law and International Law, Vol. I (1967), p. 9.

[17] Ibid, at p. 11.

[18] Ibid.

[19] Ibid at p. 13.

[20] "While the State is formally at liberty to take over or reject whatever suits it in the previous legal order, it is in fact materially required in the interest of realizing its own aims to permit only the least disturbance thereof. Therefore, in practice, it integrates within its own legal order all existing law which is compatible therewith and which is not expressly repealed." Ibid. at p. 14.

III. Theories Importing International Law.—According to this theory, International Law, based on the positive practice of State "directs the successor State to discharge certain of its predecessor's obligations, and vests in it, certain of its predecessor's rights. This approach is useful with respect to the affect of change of sovereignty on relationships governed by international law, such as, treaties and indeed. It may be the only feasible approach with respect to these. But it is quite irrelevant to the solution of problems raised by change of sovereignty with respect to relationships governed exclusively by municipal law and even of the problem of the survival of that law itself.[22]

IV. Communist Theory of State Succession.—The main emphasis under this theory is that a successor State is unencumbered by the economic and political commitments of the predecessor.

Conclusion.—Prof. D.P.O'Connel has rightly concluded, "The law of State Succession in the mid-twentieth century has reached a position of crisis because evident moral and sociological pressures emphasise the need for continuity and avoidance of disruption, while theory remains enmeshed in the nineteenth century conception of sovereign will. The problem is to give expression in normative form to a reconciliation of two competitive pressures, that of stability in the international and internal orders, and that of adjustment of legal relationship to the social and economic effect of change. The solution lies in a presumption of continuity which concrete analysis may rebut." [23]

Rights and Duties arising out of State Succession*

When an international person takes the place of another international person following rights and duties arise :

(1) Political Rights and Duties.—No succession takes place in respect of political duties and rights. As remarked by Prof. Oppenheim, "No succession takes place, thereof, with regard to rights and duties of the extinct State arising either from the character of latter as an international person or from its purely political treaty".[24] Hence the succeeding State is not bound by the political treaties of the former State. The successor State is not bound by the treaties of peace or neutrality entered into by the extinct State. But it may be noted that, "International Practice as to succession to treaties is not sufficiently abundant and uniform to permit an attempt at generalisation. The State practice is haphazard and inconsistent. Even the same State adopts different attitudes at different times".[25] When a State relinquishes its life as such through incorporation into or absorption by another State either voluntarily or as a result of conquest or annexation, the general opinion of International jurists is that treaties of the former are automatically terminated. The result is said to be produced by reason of complete loss of personality consequent on extinction of State life.[26] Thus, the forceable incorporation of Hanover into the Prussian Kingdom destroyed the previous treaties of Hanover. The admission of Texas into the United States of America by joint resolution extinguished the treaties of the Independent Republic of Texas.[27] The position was same when Korea merged into Japan.

---

[21] Ibid. at pp. 14-15.

[22] Ibid. at p. 17.

[23] Ibid, at pp. 34-35. In the words of another author, "The State practice as to succession to treaties is haphazard and inconsistent. The practice is more dictated by public policy of the respective States than by any legally accepted principle. Large scale economic considerations tend to override legal reasoning. Generally speaking, States have attempted to thwart any principle which is politically detrimental to their vital interests, "P.K. Menon," International Practice as to Succession of New States to Treaties of their Predecessor", AJIL Vol. 10 (1970), p. 459 at p. 467.

* See for IAS (1968), Q. No. 3 ; IAS (1957) Q. No. 4 and PCS (1967).

[24] Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition pp. 158-59.

[25] P.K. Menon, Supra note 23, at p. 476.

[26] Hyde on International Law, Vol. III, p. 1529.

[27] Ibid, at p. 1531.

No succession of rights and duties ordinarily takes place in such cases and as political and personal treaties presuppose the existence of a contracting state, they are altogether extinguished. It is a debatable point whether succession takes place in cases of treaties relating to commerce or extradition but here again majority of writers are of the opinion that they do not survive merger or annexation.[28] When as a result of amalgamation or merger, a State loses its full and independent power of action over the subject-matter of a treaty previously concluded the treaty must necessarily lapse.[29] "Thus treaties of alliance or of arbitration or of neutrality or of any other political nature fall to the ground with the extinction of the State which concluded them."[30] Reference may also be made here to Terlinden v. Ames[31] where the question was whether an Extradition Treaty between Prussia and America, which was entered into in 1882, could be given effect to after the incorporation of Prussia into the German Empire. The question was answered in affirmative. It was pointed out inter alia that the constitution of the German Empire left sufficient independent power and sovereignty to the States composing the confederation to enable them to act upon these treaties, and it was observed by Fuller C.J. who delivered the opinion of the Court, that where Sovereignty in respect of the execution of treaties is not extinguished and the power to execute remains unimpaired as void. But where the power of the State concerned to execute the treaty is altogether gone, the treaty cannot but be regarded as void.[32]

(2) Local rights and duties.—A genuine succession takes place in respect of local rights and duties. In respect of land, rivers, roads, railways, etc., therefore, the succeeding State succeeds the rights and duties of the former State. In German Settlers in Poland[33] the Permanent Court of International Justice, in its advisory opinion, held that private rights do not end by the change of sovereignty.

(3) Fiscal property debts.—According to Oppenheim,[34] succession takes place in regard to fiscal property. But he adds that no private person gets the right to claim the old debts from succeeding international person. So far as the question of foreigners is concerned, the position is a little different. They may seek the protection of their government and may pressurize the succeeding international person to pay the whole debts.

*Public debts.—There is a controversy in regard to the succession of public debts. Jurists are of view that it depends upon the discretion of the succeeding international person whether to pay the public debts of the former State.[35] Part IV of Vienna Convention on State Property, Archive and Debts, 1983 deals with state debts i.e. the financial obligation of a predecessor state towards another state or an international organization. Article 36 of the convention provides that the succession of a state does not as such affect the rights and obligations of creditors. Further when the successor State is newly independent state, no State debts shall pass to the new State, unless an agreement between the two states provides otherwise, according to the convention. Such an agreement, however, shall not infringe the principle of the permanent sovereignty of every people over its wealth and natural resources, nor shall its implementation endanger the fundamental economic equilibria of the newly independent State (Article 38). In case of separation of part of the territory the State debt of the predecessor State should pass to the súccessor State in an "equitable proportion "taking into account the property, rights and interest passing to the successor States (Article 40).

---

28. Dr Ram Babu Saxena v. The State, AIR 1950 SC 155 at p. 162; Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, p. 152.
29. Ibid, at p. 162 ; Hyde on International Law, Vol. III, p. 1535.
30. Oppenheim's International Law, note 2, at p. 211.
31. 184 US 270.
32. AIR 1950 S.C. 155 at p. 162.
33. PCIJ (1923), Series B, No. 6.
34. L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, pp. 159-161.

* See also for P.C.S. (1995) Q. 9(a).

35. When one State absorbs another State, for example it always 'succeeds' to the public property of the extinct State but only occasionally "succeeds" to its liabilities for illegal acts committed against other States". Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 106 ; see also The Treaty of Versailles (1919), Article 254-257.

Vienna Convention on Succession of States Property, Archives and Debts, 1983 was signed on 8 April, 1983. It has yet not come into force. For becoming effective, it requires 15 states to be bound by it. As of 5 August 2009, only 7 (seven) states have so far ratified it. One of the main flaws of the conventions is heavy reliance throughout on equity as a guiding principle. Another defect that has been pointed out is undue emphasis on succession of states in a simple case of independence, typically from a colonial power. Moreover this convention does not seem to be a useful guide to settling the complex problems of succession resulting from the break up of a state.

(4) *Contracts.—Most of the jurists are of the view that the succeeding State should be bound by the contract entered into by extinct State. But in the West Rand Central Gold Mining Co. Ltd v. King,[36] the King's Bench of England ruled just the reverse. In this case, the Court ruled that the succeeding State is entitled to decide whether it would accept the financial obligations of the former State. The facts of this case are as follows :—West Rand Central Gold Mining Co. Ltd., was a registered Company in England. It was engaged in the work of digging of gold mines in Transval. In October 1899, two parcels containing gold were seized by the officers of the South African Republic. According to the law prevailing at that time, it was the responsibility of the South African Republic to return the said parcels of gold or equivalent money in lieu of the parcels. Meanwhile war broke out between Britain and South African Republic and the latter was conquered by Britain on October 11, 1899. West Rand Central Gold Mining Co. Ltd., filed a petition to claim the parcels of gold on the ground that after conquering the South African Republic, the obligations of the South African Republic automatically became the obligations of Britain. It was, therefore, argued that the British Government was liable to return either the parcels of gold or pay its value in money. The Court rejected the contentions of the company and held that the conquering State is not liable to fulfil the private contractual obligations of the conquered State. International Law does not impose any obligations upon the conquering State to fulfil the obligations of the conquered State. The court further observed that acts of State are beyond the jurisdiction of the Municipal court. Conquest of South African Republic being act of State the appellant company can get no relief in a Municipal court. It may, therefore, be said that much depends upon the discretion of the succeeding State. In the absence of express understanding a conqueror assumes no obligation of the conquered State. There is a difference between the private right of individuals in private property and contractual rights which are sought to be enforced against the sovereign. Lord Alverstone[37] observed : "It must not be forgotten that the obligations of the conquering State with regard to private property of private individuals particularly by land as to which the title had already been perfected before the conquest or annexation are altogether different from the obligations which arise in respect of personal rights by contract .... cession of territory does not mean the confiscation of the property of individuals in that territory." [38]

Illustration.—A company registered in India was carrying on trade in Sikkim before it became part of India. The Government of Sikkim confiscated a few consignments sent to company's office in Sikkim from India. Soon thereafter Sikkim became part of India. The company claims the consignments or their value from the Government of India.

The facts of this problem resemble that of the case of West Rand Central Gold Mining Co. Ltd v. King discussed above. As held in this case conquering State or for that matter the State, (i.e. India) in which new State (i.e. Sikkim) merges, is not liable for the acts of latter state (i.e. Sikkim). Moreover, merger of state is an act of state which is beyond the jurisdiction of a municipal court. The Government of India is not therefore liable to return the consignments or their value. As a matter of fact and practice it depends upon the discretion of the succeeding state (i.e. India) to deny or accept the claims of the company.

---

* P.C.S. (1985) Q. 3—the facts of the case given are those of West Rand Central Gold Mining Co. Ltd. v. King which has been discussed below ; P.C.S. (1988) Q. 10(c) ; C.S.E. (1991) Q. 8(b).

[36] (1905) 2 KB 391 ; See also for UPPCS (2001) Q. 7(a) ; IAS (2005) Q. 8(b).

[37] Ibid, at p. 411.

[38] See also Cook v. Sprige, (1899) AC 572 at p. 578.

 C.S.E. (1987) Q. 6 (b) (i).

(5) Concessionary contracts.—Although much depends upon the discretion of the succeeding State so far as the contracts in general of the former State are concerned, the position is different in respect of the concessionary contracts. By concessionary contracts, we mean the contracts through which certain concession, such as, digging of mines, laying of railways, etc. are given through contracts. These are mostly of local nature. Succeeding State may or may not be bound by such depending concessionary contracts upon the facts and circumstances of each concessionary contract. In Premchibar v. The Union of India,[39] wherein the Government of India rejected the application of a former Portuguese citizen for extension of the period of licence granted to him by the then Portuguese Government, the Supreme Court of India held, "In such a case the residents of territories did not carry with them the rights which they possessed as subjects of the ex-sovereign, and that as subjects of the new sovereign they had only such rights as are granted or recognised by him, so far as the relations between the subject and the sovereign are concerned. "Further, whether new sovereign has recognised the rights of the new subjects as against himself and has undertaken the liabilities arising thereunder is a question of fact depending upon the new sovereign after the requisition territory concerned." In this case the petitioner was a citizen of former Portuguese territory. On December 20, 1961 Portuguese territory was merged in India and the petitioner adopted Indian citizenship. About three months before merger of Portuguese territory in India, the petitioner had obtained a licence for importing goods worth about 10 lakhs pounds and on the basis of the said licence he had even advanced some money. After acquiring Indian citizenship he requested the Government of India to extend the period of licence, but his application was rejected. He filed a writ-petition in the Supreme Court and contended that the rejection of his application amounted to the violation of his fundamental right mentioned in the Constitution and that he was discriminated which was also contrary to the provision of the Constitution. But the Supreme Court dismissed his petition. State of Gujarat v. Vora Fiddali,[40] and State of Rajasthan v. Shyamlal,[41] also deserve mention in this connection.[42]

(6) Laws.—So far as the laws of the former State are concerned, civil law continues until it is changed by the succeeding State.[43]

(7) Unliquidated damages for torts.—No succession takes place in respect of unliquidated damages for torts. This was held in Robert E. Brown's claim.[44] The facts of this case are as follows :

Robert E. Brown was an American citizen. In 1894, he went to South Africa and started the work of digging gold mines. After some, time the head of the State of South Africa declared that in the eastern part of that area, State would undertake the work. Robert Brown submitted an application of licence for carrying on digging of goldmines but it was rejected. Later on, the Government withdrew its earlier order for carrying on digging of goldmines. Robert E. Brown filed a suit in 1895 for recovery of compensation. But the case could not proceed because in the meantime Great Britain conquered South Africa and incorporated it in its Empire. The Government of America contended that her citizen, Mr Brown, had been authorized to carry on digging of goldmines but this right was subsequently snatched from him before South Africa was annexed by Britain. It was agreed to refer this dispute to arbitrators. The arbitrators had to decide mainly two questions : (1) Whether South Africa refused to do justice to Robert E. Brown ? and (2) If justice was denied to him, whether the succeeding State of South Africa would be responsible for the loss and damages. In other words, whether Britain was liable to pay compensation ? In reply to the first question, the arbitrators held that justice was denied to Robert E. Brown because if the case had proceeded, South Africa would have been liable to pay damages. In reply to the second question referred to them, the arbitrators decided that the peace agreement under which South Africa surrendered before Great Britain, Britain did not undertake the liability for torts committed by South Africa, hence Britain was not liable. But if the former State had accepted or had decided to pay the compensation, then the succeeding State should pay the damages for torts.

---

[39] AIR 1966 SC 442. See also Rajavi Amar Singh v. State of Rajasthan, AIR 1958 SC 228 at pp. 230-231 ; see also State of Madras v. K.M. Rajagopalan, AIR 1955 SC 817, Reilly v. The King, (1934) AC 176 ; Noakes v. Doncaster Amalgamated Colliers Ltd., (1940) AC 104.

[40] AIR 1964 SC 1043.

[41] AIR 1964 SC 1495.

[42] For detailed study. See D.P.O'Connell Economics Concessions in the Law of State Succession, BYBIL, Vol. (1950), pp. 93-124.

[43] In Virendra Singh and others v. State of U.P., AIR 1954 SC 447 at p. 452, the Supreme Court observed "........all authorities are agreed that it is within the competence of the new Sovereign to accord recognition to existing rights in the conquered or ceded territories and, by legislation or otherwise, to apply its own laws to them ; and these laws can, and indeed when the occasion arises must be examined and interpreted by the municipal courts of the absorbing State". For detailed study see also Shabtai Rosenne, "Effect of Change of Sovereignty upon Municipal Law," BYBIL, Vol. XXVIII (1950), pp. 267-292.

[44] American and British Claim Arbitration Tribunal, Nov. 1923 in BYBIL (1924), pp. 220-221.

(8) Nationality.—The nationals of the former State lose their nationality at the extinction of the State and become the nationals of new international person. In this connection it may, however, be noted that generally such nationals are given a certain period within which they have to decide whether they continue their loyalty towards the former State or will accept the citizenship of the succeeding State.[45]

(9) Succession to property in foreign State. —As regards the succession to property in foreign State, jurists are of the view that succeeding States become the successors of such property.

Part II of the Vienna Convention on State Property, Archives and Debts 1983 deals with "State Property." Article 11 of the convention provides that unless otherwise agreed, the passing of state property will take place without compensation. Article 12 provides that property, rights and interests owned by a third State should not be affected by succession of states. Article 13 asks the predecessor state to take all measures to prevent damage or distruction to State property which passes to successor State. As regards succession in case of newly independent States Article 15 allows special reference to be made to bilateral agreements between the predecessor State and the newly independent State but it shall not infringe the principle of the permanent sovereignty of every people over its wealth and natural resources."

(10) Succession to State Archives.—Article 25 of the Vienna Convention on State Property, Archives and Debts, 1983 lays special emphasis on preserving the integral character of grounds of State archives of the predecessor State. The convention provides that the passing of or appropriate reproduction of State archives of the predecessor State to a newly independent successor State should be determined in such a manner that "each of those States can benefit as widely and equitably as possible" from those archives. Bilateral agreements between the two states should not "infringe the right of the peoples of those states to development, to information about their history, and to their cultural heritage.

(11) Succession of States in Respect of Treaties.* —The traditional doctrine of the State succession in respect of treaties have been rejected by the large number of newly independent States. These newly independent States have relied upon the rules of "moving treaty frontiers" and "clean state." These rules are not simply reactions against the inheritance treaties and devolution agreements but were necessitated by the changing times and circumstances. On 23rd August, 1978, Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties was adopted. The Convention entered into force on November 6, 1996. The provisions of the convention show that the clean State rule has been followed and due recognition has been given to the consent of States. The clean State rule is similar to negative theories and communist theory discussed earlier. According to 'Clean State' rule, a newly independent State is unencumbered by the obligations and commitments of the predecessor State. It has, therefore, full freedom to continue or discontinue the treaties of the predecessor State. The 'moving treaty

---

[45] See AIR 1954 SC 447 at p. 454.

* See also for P.C.S. (1995) Q. 9(d) ; UPPCS (2001) Q. 7 (a) ; IAS (2005) Q. 8 (b).

frontiers' rule is based on the association of a territory with an already established State and on the basis of the prior legal nexus a newly independent State is entitled to claim its succession to multilateral treaties.

Article 1 of the Vienna Convention on Succession of States in Respect of Treaties, 1978 which deals with the scope of the convention provides that the convention applies to the effects of a succession of states in respect of treaties between states. As regards agreement for the devolution of treaty obligations or rights from a predecessor State to a successor State, Article provides that the obligations or rights of a predcessor State under treaties in force in respect of a territory at the date of succession of States do not become the obligations or rights of the successor State towards other State parties to those treaties by reason only of the fact that the predecessor State and the successor State have concluded an agreement providing that such obligations or rights shall devolve upon the successor State. So is the effect of, as provided by Article 9, unilateral declaration by successor State regarding treaties of the predecessor State.

Article 11 of the Convention which deals Boundary Regimes, clearly provides that a succession of states does not as such affect : (a) a boundary established by a treaty, or (b) obligations and rights established by a treaty and relating to the regime of a boundary. Obviously to avoid chaos regarding established situation, clean State rule does not apply here.

Article 15 of the Convention deals with Succession in Respect of Part of Territory. It provides : When part of the territory of a state, or when any territory for the international relations of which a state is responsible, not being part of the territory of that State, becomes part of the territory of another State :

(a) treaties of the predecessor State cease to be in force in respect of the territory to which the succession of States relates from the date of the succession of States ; and

(b) treaties of the successor State are in force in respect of the territory to which the succession of State relates from the date of the succession of States, unless it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that the application of the treaty to that territory would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions for its operation.

As regards the position of newly independent States in respect of the treaties of the predecessor State, a general rule is laid down in Article 16 which provides that the newly independent State is not bound to maintain the treaty in force, or to become a party to, any treaty by reason only of the fact that at the date of the succession of States the treaty was in force in respect of the territory to which the succession of states relates. This provision clearly follows clean State rule.

Article 24 deals with conditions under which a Bilateral treaty is considered as being in force in the case of a succession of States. It provides : A bilateral treaty which at the date of a succession of states was in force in respect of the territory to which the succession of States relates is considered as being in force between a newly independent state and the other State party when : (a) they expressly so agree; or (b) by reason of their conduct they are to be considering as having so agreed. So far as the position between the predecessor State and the newly independent State is concerned, Article 25 provides that a treaty which under Article 24 is considered as being in force between a newly independent state and the other State party is not by reason only of that fact to be considered as being in force also in the relations between the predecessor State and the newly independent State. A brief reference may also be made to the provisions of the convention relating to uniting and separation of states. Article 31, which deserves a special mention in this connection provides :

When two or more States unite and so form one successor State, any treaty in force at the date of succession of state in respect of any of them continues in force in respect of the successor State unless :

(a) the successor state and the other State party or State parties otherwise agree ; or

(b) it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that the application of the treaty in respect of the successor State would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions for its operation.

Article 34, which deals with succession of States in cases of separation of parts of a State, provides as follows :

1. When a part or parts of territory of a State separate to form one or more States, whether or not the predecessor State continues to exist :

(a) any treaty in force at the date of the succession of States in respect of the entire territory of the predecessor State continues in force in respect of each successor State so formed ;

(b) any treaty in force at the date of the succession of States in respect only of that part, of the territory of the predecessor State which has become a successor State continues in force in respect of that successor State alone.

2. Paragraph 1 does not apply to :

(a) the States concerned otherwise agree ; or

(b) it appears from the treaty or is otherwise established that application of the treaty in respect of the successor State would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions for its operation.

As regards multilateral treaties, Article 17 provides that a newly independent State may, by a notification of succession, establish its status as a party to any multilateral treaty which at the date of the succession of states was in force in respect of the territory to which the succession of State relates. But this rule does not apply if it appears from the treaty or is otherwise that the application of the treaty in respect of the newly independent State would be incompatible with the object and purpose of the treaty or would radically change the conditions for its operation. Similarly when according to the object and purpose of the treaty, the participation of any other State in the treaty must be considered requiring the consent of all the parties, the newly independent state may establish its status as a party to the treaty only with such consent. As regards participation in treaties not in force at the date of the succession of states, Article 18 provides that a newly independent state may by a notification establish its status as a contracting state if at the date of succession of states the predecessor state was a contracting state in respect of the territory to which that succession of state relates.

As regards succession to reservations, Article 23 provides that when a newly independent state establishes its status as a state party or as a contracting state to a multilateral treaty by a notification of succession under Article 17 or 18, it shall be considered as maintaining any reservation to that treaty which was applicable at the date of the succession of states in respect of the territory to which the succession of states relates unless when making the notification of succession, it expresses a contrary intention or formulates a reservation which relates to the same subject-matter as that reservation.

The convention also contains provision for settlement of disputes in respect of the application of the conventions, provisions relating to consultation and negotiation, conciliation, judicial settlement and arbitration, settlement by common consent and other provisions in force for the settlement of disputes are contained in Articles 41 to 45.

This convention became effective on November 6, 1996. The convention required 15 ratifications to become effective. So far 21 countries have ratified it.

This convention has proved to be controversial because it distinguishes between newly independent states and cases of separation of parts of states.

Article 16 states all newly independent states receive "a clean states" whereas Article 39 (1) states that all other new states remain bound by the treaty obligations of the state from which they separated. Moreover Article 17 states that newly independent state may join multilateral treaties to which their former colonizer were a party without the consent of all other parties in most circumstances whereas Article 9 states that all other new states only join multilateral treaties to which predecessor states were a part of with the consent of other parties.

Succession regarding membership of the United Nations

The question of the succession regarding membership of the United Nations arose for the first time after the partition of India into India and Pakistan. India was originally the member of the United Nations having signed the United Nations Charter at San Francisco. Later on, it was ratified by the Government of India. After partition, Pakistan claimed that since it was a part of India which was an original party to the United Nations Charter, it should get the membership of the United Nations in succession automatically. The General Assembly of the United Nations rejected this claim of Pakistan. According to General Assembly, when a State becomes international person, it can become the member of the United Nations only after it is admitted in accordance with the provisions of the Charter. That is to say, a State to be admitted to the United Nations, should apply for the membership. A State is admitted as the member of United Nations by the decisions of the General Assembly by 2/3 majority of the members present and voting on the recommendation of the Security Council. Thus the principle of succession does not apply in case of the membership of the United Nations.

Succession in Respect of International Organisations.—Ordinarily, the succession of International Oraganizations depends upon the constituent instrument or special agreements. "While as a rule devolution of rights and competencies is governed either by the constituent instruments of the organs in question or by special agreements or decisions of their organs, the requirement of continuity of international life demands that succession should be assumed to operate in all cases where that is consistent with or is indicated by the reasonably assumed intention of the parties as interpreted in the light of the parties of the organisation in question." [46] The law regarding the succession of International Organisation has been clarified by the International Court of Justice in its Advisory Opinion of 1950 in the following case :—

Status of South West Africa.[47]—Trusteeship Council of the United Nations succeeded to all rights and duties of the Mandatory Commission. That is to say, all the territories which were under the Mandatory Commission came under the control of the Trusteeship Council. Thus, South West Africa also came under the control of the Trusteeship Council. In the beginning, South Africa accepted the control of the Trusteeship Council and sent its reports, etc. to the United Nations in this connection but later on South Africa contended that after the extinction of the League of Nations, South West Africa ceased to be under control of any international institution and became a part of the South Africa, and as such Trusteeship Council had no control over it. Consequently, South Africa refused to follow the directions and control of the Trusteeship Council. In 1950, the General Assembly referred this matter to the International Court of Justice for its advisory opinion. The International Court of Justice advised that Mandatory Commission was an Institution of international status and the Mandatory Commission had created an international status of South West Africa which could not be modified unilaterally by South Africa. Besides this, the functions and purpose of the Mandatory Commission and Trusteeship Council are same. Keeping in view the desirability of the requirement of continuity of international life, the Trusteeship Council succeeded all the functions of the Mandatory Commission. Consequently, the South West African Republic was a Trust Territory under the control of Trusteeship Council and hence South Africa was bound to follow the directions and control of the Trusteeship system of the United Nations. The conclusion that the United Nations succeeded to the supervisory functions of the League of Nations in the matter of Mandated Territories flow partly from the principle adopted by the court that the regime established for the mandates was of an international status as distinguished from a purely contractual agreement.[48] The other principle that the court applied was that if the nature, functions and purposes of the new international organisation are the same, succession may take place in regard to the functions and powers of an international organisation.

---

[46] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. 1, Eighth Edition, p. 158.

[47] ICJ Rep. (1950), p. 79 ; for more details see Chapter on "Trusteeship Council".

Question of Application of the Rules of State Succession in respect of division of India into two Independent States (India and Pakistan)*.— After the passing of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, India and Pakistan became two independent dominions. There was no controversy regarding the status of Pakistan. Pakistan emerged as a new State in the horizon of International community. But a controversy arose in respect of India as to where India emerged as a new State having acquiesced new international personality. By the Independence Act of 1947, British India was divided into two independent states on the basis of equality on the basis of International agreements rights, property, obligations etc. were divided between the two states. It was not, therefore, a case of cession. The Supreme Court has expressed the same view in Virendra Singh v. State of U.P.[49] In fact, it was a case of dismemberment of British India. Therefore, the principle of state succession will apply to determine the rights and obligations of both the states. So far as Pakistan is concerned there took place state succession in respect of local rights and obligations.The rules of International law of state succession applied in respect of law, property situated in foreign countries etc. But there was no state succession of political rights and duties consequently it was not bound by political treaties earlier entered into by Britain.

In respect of India also the abovementioned rules of International law applied. But the position is not clear in respect of India. Although, in respect of India also, the rules of state succession applied in some respects, such as local rights and duties, law, property situated foreign in countries etc. but in other respects India's international status continued to be the same as was during the British period. Exercising its influence, Britain got India become a member of the League of Nations and International Labour Organization, in 1919. Even after India became an independent sovereign state, India continued to remain the member of these international organizations. Similarly, India had become an original member of the United Nations and continued to remain so even after she become an independent sovereign state. Thus even before independence, India's international personality had been recognized. But a similar thing did not happen in respect of Pakistan. After emerging as a new independent state Pakistan claimed that it should also be recognized as an original member of the United Nations because it became an independent state in consequence of the division of the sub-continent of India into India and Pakistan. But this claim of Pakistan was rejected by the General Assembly of the United Nations. According to the General Assembly, whatever the territory, population etc. of a state after emerging as a new state, it can become a member of the United Nations only in accordance with the provisions of the U.N. Charter on the other hand, India was not regarded as a new state. India was and original member of the U.N. and continued to remain so even after independence.

---

[48] Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. 1, Eighth Edition, p. 169.

* See also for UPPCS (2003) Q. 6.

[49] AIR 1954 SC 447, 454.

CHAPTER 13

INTERVENTION

Meaning and definition of the word "Intervention"*

The word 'intervention', has been defined as dictatorial inference by a State in the affairs of another State for the purpose of maintaining or altering the actual condition of thing." [1] In principle, international law prohibits intervention. The prohibition of intervention "is the corollary of every State's right to sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence." [2] But as pointed out by Hans Kelsen, international law does not prohibit intervention in all circumstances. According to him, when one State intervenes in the affairs of another State through force, then as a reaction against this violation, international law permits intervention. In the view of Quincy Wright, "Intervention may be diplomatic as well as military. A diplomatic communication of peremptory or threatening tone, implying possible use of military or other coercive measures may constitute intervention."

The principle of non-intervention propounded under the Charter under Article 2(7) is applicable to the United Nations and not to the States.[3] In fact, the principle of non-intervention by States has been propounded in Article 2(4) of the United Nation's Charter. Article 2(4) runs as follows : "All members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force, against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations." This principle has been re-affirmed by the General Assembly through its resolution 2131 (xx) of December 1965. "The principle of non-intervention is in fact the search of an ideal of equality and sovereignty of the States. In accordance with this principle a State should not interfere in the affairs of another State. The Governments of States also accept this principle. But so far the real practice is concerned this principle is not followed by the States." [4] Dr. Thomas Frank has even pronounced the death of Article 2(4) and proceeded to tell us who killed it.[5] But as pointed out by Prof. Louis Henkin, "......... the death certificate is premature and the indictment for legicide must be redrawn to change lesser through aggravated degrees of assault. Article 2(4) lives and while its condition is grave indeed, its maladies are not necessarily terminal." [6] He adds : "For me, if Article 2(4) were dead indeed, I should have to conclude that it rules—not mocks us from the grave. In fact, despite common mis-impressions Article 2(4) lives and can live. No government, no responsible official of Government, has been prepared or has wished to pronounce it dead. Article 2(4) was written by practical men who knew all about national interest. They believed the norms they legislated, to be in their nation's interest, and nothing that has happened in the past 25 years (now 59 years) suggests that it is not." [7]

---

* See for IAS (1957), Q. No. 5 ; PCS (1974), Q. No. 10(a) ; PCS (1972), Q. No. 9 : PCS (1978), Q. No. 9(a) : PCS (1981), Q. 3 ; PCS (1982), Q. 5(b); C.S.E. (1991), Q. 5(b) ; C.S.E. (1992) Q. 6(a) ; UPPCS (2001) 7 (a); UPPCS (2004) Q. 7(c) ; UPPCS (2006) Q. 8 (b); IAS (2005) Q. 5 (c) ; IAS (2008) Q. 7 (a).

[1] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 305; See also Oppenheim's International Law, Ninth Edition, Vol. I, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Longman Group U.K. Limited and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, p. 430.

[2] Ibid at p. 428.

[3] Nicholas Greenwood Onuf, "The Principle of Non-Intervention, the United Nations and the International System," Int. Orgn., Vol. XXV (1971), p. 209 at p. 212.

[4] "Civil Wars and International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. II (1971), p. 219 at p. 233.

[5] Thomas Frank, "Who killed Article 2(4) or Changing Norms Governing the Use of Force by States", AJIL, Vol. 64 (1970), p. 809.

[6] Louis Henkin, "The reports of the Death of Article 2(4) are Greatly Exaggerated", AJIL, Vol. 65 (1971), p. 544.

[7] Ibid at p. 547.

In 1970, the General Assembly adopted unanimously a resolution[8] entitled Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the U.N. The resolution declared : "Every State has the duty to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in acts of civil strife or terrorist acts in another State or acquiescing in organized activities within its territory directed towards the commission of such acts, when the acts referred to in the present paragraph involve a threat or use of force." [9] As regards the principle of non-intervention the resolution added : "No State or group of States has the right to intervene directly or indirectly for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State. Consequently, armed intervention and all other forms of interference or attempted threats against the personality of the State or against its political, economic and cultural elements, are in violation of international law.

No State may use or encourage the use of economic, political or any other type of measures to coerce another State in order to obtain from it the subordination of the exercise of its Sovereign rights and to secure from it advantages of any kind. Also, no State shall organize, assist, foment, finance, incite or tolerate subversive, terrorist or armed activities directed towards the violent overthrow of the regime of another State, or interfere in civil strife in another State." [10]

It has been rightly remarked that the above resolution contains "a far reaching interpretation of the fundamental principle embodied in Article 2 of the Charter. For instance, the additional principles relating to the prohibition of the use of force make it clear that force may not be used not only across existing international boundaries, but also across international lines of demarcation ; that acts of reprisal involving the use of force are included in the prohibition ..."[11] Further, "It is noteworthy that the General Assembly declared further that the 'principles of the Charter' which are embodied in this Declaration constitute basic principles of international law" ; and appealed to all States, including the non-members, 'to be guided by these principles in their international conduct and to develop their mutual relations on the basis of the strict observance of these principles'. This is but one important example of the legislative activity of the General Assembly, leading to the creation of new international law applicable to all States." [12] Thus, non-interference in the internal affairs of States has become firmly established in international relations and international law as a fundamental and generally recognized principle.[13] Reference may also be made to the Declaration on the Enhancement of the Effectiveness of the Principle of Refraining from the Threat or use of Force in International Relations adopted by the General Assembly on 18 November 1987.[14] This Declaration solemnly declared :

1. Every State has the duty to refrain in its international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the U.N. Such a threat or use of force constitutes a violation of international law and the Charter of the U.N. and entails international responsibility.

2. The principle of refraining from the threat or use of force in international relations is universal in character and is binding regardless of each State's political, economic, social or cultural system or relations of aliance.

3. No consideration of whatever nature may be invoked to warrant resorting to the threat or use of force in violation of the Charter of the U.N.

---

[8] General Assembly Resolution 2625 (XXV) of 24th October, 1970 GA, Official Records, Twenty-fifth Session, Suppl., No. 28 (1971), pp. 121-124.

[9] Ibid. at p. 122-123

[10] Ibid. at p. 123.

[11] Prof. Louis B. John, "The Development of the Charter of the United Nations ; the Present State "in The Present State of International Law and other Essay", (1973) p. 39 at p. 50.

[12] Ibid, at p. 52 ; emphasis added.

[13] Valentin Yaroslavatsev, "Non-Interference—A Basic Principle," New Times, No. 20 (May 1977). p. 18 at p. 19.

[14] See A/42/766 and Corr. 1.

4. States have the duty not to urge, encourage or assist other States to resort to the threat or use of force in violation of the Charter of the U.N.

5. States shall fulfil their obligations under international law to refrain from organizing, instigating, assisting or participating in paramilitary, terrorist or subversive acts, including acts of mercenaries, in other States or acquiescing in organized activities within their territory directed towards commission of such acts.

6. States have the duty to abstain from armed intervention and all other forms of interference or attempted threats against the personality of the State or against its political, economic and cultural elements.

7. No State may use or encourage the use of economic, political or any other type of measures to coerce another State in order to obtain from it the subordination of the exercise of sovereign rights and to secure from it advantages of any kind.

8. In accordance with the purpose and principles of the U.N. States have the duty to refrain from propaganda for wars of aggression.

The preamble of the above Declaration (of 18 November, 1987) recalls "that this principle is enshrined in Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter of the United Nations and has been reaffirmed in a number of international instruments" and reaffirms "the obligation to maintain international peace and security in conformity with the purposes of the United Nations." Thus what has been stated above of the Declaration of 1970 is also true of this Declaration and may be regarded as authoritative interpretation of Article 2(4) of the Charter or extension of the Charter itself. It uses the term 'use of force' which is definitely a much wider term. In case concerning Military and Para-Military Activities in and Against Nicaragua (1986), Judge Nagendra Singh (who was then the President of the World Court) in his separate opinion, aptly remarked : "......... it represents the contribution of the court in emphasizing that the principle of non-use of force belongs to the realm of jus cogens and is the very corner stone of the human effort to promote peace in a world torn by strife. This aspect does need to be emphasized."

Article 2(4) and the limits of the use of force.*—Article 2(4) as noted above contains prohibition of the unilateral use of force or threat thereof by States in their international relations. The only exception of this recognised under the U.N. Charter is individual and collective self defence as contained in Article 51. But in an article,[15] Reisman has given a very dangerous interpretation. He has tried to justify the use of force to oust a repressive government. He argues : "Coercion should not be glorified, but is native and indeed subversive of public order to insist that it never be used, for coercion is a ubiquitous feature of all social life and a characteristic and indispensable component of law. The critical question in a decenralized system is not whether coercion has been applied but whether it has been applied in support of or against community order and basic policies and whether it was applied in ways whose net consequences include increased congruence with community goals and minimum order." [16] He has suggested that while interpreting Article 2(4), attention should be given to the spirit of charter and not merely the letter of the provision.[17] This is indeed a very dangerous interpretation of the article 2(4) and must be refuted. Schacter[18] has rightly refuted and criticised Reismans' interpretation of Article 2(4). In his view, Reisman's argument is not only against text of the charter it is also against the interpretation which states have given in the past decades. He has rightly remarked, "It would introduce a new normative basis for recourse to war that would give powerful states an almost unlimited right to overthrow governments alleged to be unresponsive to the popular wili or to the goal of self-determination."[19]

---

* See also for C.S.E. (1992) Q. 8(b).

[15] W. Michael Reisman, "Coercion and Self-Determination : construing Charter Article 2(4)", AJIL, Vol. 78 (1984) p. 642.

[16] Ibid, at p. 645.

[17] Ibid.

[18] See Oscar Schacter, "The Legality of Pro-Democratic Invasion", AJIL, Vol. 70 (1984) p. 645.

[19] Ibid, at p. 649.

In the Corfu Channel case (1949) the U.K. had contented that it had used armed force in the cause of international justice but such a contention was rejected by the International Court of Justice.[20] According to Schacter, "The fragility of international organisation enhances the danger. This is surely not the time for international lawyers to weaken the principal normative restraint against the use of force. The world will not be made safe for democracy through new wars or invasions of the weak by the strong." [21]

Prof. M.K. Nawaz has also refuted the interpretation of Article 2(4) given by Reisman and has supported the views of Schacter.[22] He has aptly remarked, "The up-shot of all this is to say that no state under international law, especially the U.N. Charter, can intervene with armed forces either to change the existant government or to create political environment for installing a government of its liking. Nor can it so act militarily to suppress the processes of self-determination : the only exception being a state that cannot go to the aid of another state, if an armed attack occurs against it, presumably at the request of the attacked state." [23]

So long as the words "armed attack" are retained in Article 51, this seems to be the correct interpretation of the charter. This interpretation also finds support from the verdict of the International Court of Justice indicating interim measures in case Concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America).[24] The world court held by a majority of fourteen votes to one, the right to sovereignty and to a political independence possessed by the republic of Nicaragua, like any other State of the region or of world, should be fully respected and should not in any way be jeopardized by any military and paramilitary activities which are prohibited by the principles of international law, in particular the principle that states should refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or the political independence of any states, and the principle concerning the duty not to intervene in matters within the domestic jurisdiction of a state, principles embodied in the United Nations Charter and the charter of the organization of American States.

It may be noted that outlining the policy of U.S. in Nicaragua President Reagan openly declared that unless the Nicaraguan Government sought democracy the only other alternative for the rebels would be to have their way and take over. With this policy in view, the U.S. was giving $10 million military aid to contras. But as rightly indicated by the International Court of Justice in its final verdict in June 1986, by a majority of 12 to 3 votes, the aiding of contra rebels with money and military hardware, U.S. supported attacks on Nicaraguan ports and oil installations and U.S. intelligence flights over Nicaraguan territory constituted an infringement of Nicaragua's sovereignty and a flagrant violation of the principles of the U.N. charter which ban unlawful use of force by one state against another. The world court held that there is no rule in customary international law permitting another state the right of collective self-defence on the basis of its own assessment of the situation. Where collective self-defence is invoked, it is to be expected that the state for whose benefit this right is used will have declared itself to be the victim of an armed attack.[25] Further, the lawfulness of the use of collective self-defence by the third state for the benefit of the attacked state also depends on a request addressed by that state to the third state. The requirement of a request by the state which is the victim of the alleged attack is additional to the requirement that such a state should have declared itself to have been attacked.[26] This case clearly illustrates the dangers involved in Reisman's thesis about Article 2(4). The interpretation given by Schacter and Prof. Nawaz is correct and has much to commend itself.

---

[20] See Oscar Schacter, "The Legality of Pro-Democratic Invasion", AJIL, Vol. 70 (1984) p. 650.

[21] Ibid.

[22] Dr. M.K. Nawaz, "What Limits on the Use of Force? Can Force be Used to Depose an Oppressive Government?" IJIL, Vol. 24 (1984), p. 406 at p. 410.

[23] Ibid; see also Rahmatullah Khan, "The War on Terrorism", IJIL, Vol. 45, No. 1 (January-March, 2005) p. 1 at p. 7.

[24] ICJ Rep. (1984) p. 169.

[25] I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 14, at p. 104.

[26] Ibid, p. 104-105.

Reference may also be made here to a recent case of International Court of Justice, namely Case Concerning Legality of use of Force (Yugoslavia v. United States of America).[27] It may be noted here that on 29 April, 1999 Yugoslavia filed as many as ten separate applications instituting proceedings against the U.S., the U.K., Spain, Portugal, the Netherlands, Italy, Germany, France, Canada and Belgium alleging that they were guilty 'for violation of the obligation not to use force" and requested for the indication of provisional measures. The above case is one of the said ten cases, the International Court of Justice rejected the request for indication of provisional measures on the ground that in the absence of the consent by the United States the Court cannot exercise jurisdiction. The Court ordered that the case be removed from the list. However, the World Court remarked :

"Whereas there is a fundamental distinction between the question of the acceptance by a state of the Court's jurisdiction and the compatibility of particular acts with international law; the former requires consent; the latter question can only be reached when the Court deals with merits after having established its jurisdiction and having heard full legal arguments by both parties;[28]

Further, "whereas whether or not states accept the jurisdiction of the Court they remain in any event responsible for acts attributable to them that violate International law including humanitarian law; whereas any disputes relating to the legality of such acts are required to be resolved by peaceful means, the choice of which, pursuant to Article 33 of the Charter, is left to the parties;[29]

In this context the World Court asked the parties that they "should take care not to aggravate or extend the dispute."[30] Lastly the Court observed : "whereas, when such a dispute gives rises to a threat to the peace, breach of the peace or act of aggression, the Security Council has special responsibilities under Chapter VII of the Charter.[31]

Grounds of intervention*

The coming into force of the Charter of the U.N. has brought about revolutionary changes regarding the valid grounds of intervention. Most of the traditional grounds have ceased to be valid. The charter has, however, introduced a new ground, namely, Collective Measures or Collective Intervention founded on the concept of Collective Security. Broadly speaking, there are now only two valid grounds of intervention—one for the states i.e. self-defence and the other for the United Nations i.e. Collective intervention or enforcement action under Chapter VII of the Charter. A critical discussion of the following grounds is being undertaken with a view to see which of these grounds are still valid :

(1) Self-defence ; (2) on humanitarian grounds ; (3) to enforce treaty rights ; (4) intervention to prevent illegal intervention ; (5) balance of power ; (6) for protection of persons and their property ; (7) collective intervention ; (8) intervention to maintain international law ; and (9) intervention in civil wars.

(1) *Self-defence. —Self-defence has been a valid ground of intervention for long time. On the ground of self-defence a State may intervene in the affairs of another State. In this connection Mr. Webster, the Secretary of United States of America propounded a very important principle in the famous case, The Caroline (1841). In this case Mr. Webster declared that the necessity of self-defence should be instant, overwhelming and leaving

---

27. Decided on 2 June, 1999.
28. Para 30 of the judgement.
29. Para 31 of the judgement.
30. Para 32, ibid.
31. Para 33, ibid.

* See P.C.S (1968), Q. No. 9 : For answer see also definition of "Intervention" discussed earlier, P.C.S. (1990) Q. 9(b) ; See also for C.S.E. (1992) Q. 69 (a) ; UPPCS (2001) Q. 6 (d) ; UPPCS (2004) Q. 7(a); IAS (2005) Q. 5(c).

 See for I.A.S. (1964), Qs. No. 2 and 7 ; P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 4 ; P.C.S. (1965), Q. No. 1 ; P.C.S. (1977) Q. 9 ; C.S.E. (1982) Q. No. 5(c) ; P.C.S. (1983), Q. 6 ; P.C.S. (1988) Q. 2(b) ; UPPCS (2003) Q. 7(a) ; IAS (2003) Q. 8 (a).

no choice of means and no moment for deliberation.[32] This principle was affirmed by Nuremberg Tribunal in 1946.[33] The test laid down in The Caroline was finally affirmed by the International Court of Justice in the Corfu Channel case.[34]

The facts of the Caroline case are as follows :—

In Canada, which was then the colony of Britain, some revolutionaries were trying to overthrow the government. The ship named Caroline was carrying arms and men from across the river Niagra (within the territory of America) to assist the rebels. The British Government lodged a protest against the American Government but with no effect. Consequently the British soldiers crossed the river, seized the ship in the American territory and left it floating. The American Government protested and asked the British Government to justify its action on the ground of self-defence and self-preservation The American Secretary of State. Mr Webster propounded the above-mentioned test. England failed to justify its action on the basis of this test and had to express regrets.

The facts of the *Corfu Channel case (1949) are as follows :

North Corfu Channel is between Albania and Greece. A part of it is within the maritime belt of Albania. Before May 1946, the British ships had removed the mines from the channel and had ensured that it was safe for the passage of ships. That very month some British ships were fired at from the territory of Albania resulting in damage to the ships. In addition to this, after some time the British ships suffered loss and damages due to mines which were laid in the territorial waters of Albania. This also resulted in the loss of lives of some persons. Consequently, the British ships removed mines and explosive substance from the said portion without seeking permission of the Albanian Government in this connection. Albania protested against this and contended that it was a clear violation of Albania's Sovereignty. On the other hand, due to the loss and damage to the British ship by mines laid down by Albania, Britain raised this matter in the Security Council. The Security Council advised Albania and Britain to refer this matter to the International Court of Justice. In the beginning, Albania raised the objection in regard to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in this matter. The International Court of Justice rejected the objection of Albania. Ultimately Britain and Albania agreed to refer the matter to the International Court of Justice for adjudication. Albania and Britain entered into a special agreement and through this agreement referred the following two questions for adjudication of the Court : (1) Was Albania liable under International Law for explosions in its maritime belt and if the answer is yes whether, Albania is liable to pay damages for the same? (2) Whether Britain violated the Sovereignty of Albania by removing the explosive substance, mines, etc., from the territorial waters of Albania ?

---

[32] In his note dated April 24, 1841, Mr Webster Wrote "......... it will be for Her, Majesty's government to show upon what state of facts and what rules of national law the destruction of the 'Caroline' is to be defended. It will be for that government to show a necessity of self-defence instant, overwhelming, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation. It will be for it to show, also, that the local authorities of Canada, even supposing the necessity of the moment authorised them to enter the territories of the United States at all, did nothing unreasonable or excessive ; since the act, justified by the necessity of self-defence, must be limited by that necessity, and kept clearly within it. It must be shown admonition or remonstrance to the persons on board the "Caroline" was impracticable, or would have been unavailing. It must be shown that day light could not be waited for : that there could be no attempt or discrimination between the innocent and the guilty ; that it would not have been enough to seize and detain the vessel; but that there was necessity, present and equitable for attacking her in the darkness of the night, while unarmed to the shore, and while unarmed men were asleep on board killing some and wounding others, and then drawing her into the current above the cataract, setting her on fire and careless to know where there might not be in her the innocent with the guilty ; or the living with the dead, committing her to a fate which fills the imagination with horror. A necessity for all this the government of the United States cannot believe to have existed."

[33] The Nuremberg Tribunal observed : "it must be remembered that preventive action in foreign territory is justified only in case of 'an instant and overwhelming necessity of self-defence, leaving no choice of means and no moment of deliberation" (The Caroline's case, Moore's Digest of International Law, Vol. 11, p. 412).

[34] ICJ Rep. (1949), p. 4.

* See also for IAS (1957) Q. No. 6(b), IAS (1977) Q. No. 10(d); P.C.S. (1964) Q. No. 4(b).

The International Court of Justice answered the first question in favour of Britain. That is to say, the Court decided that Albania was responsible for explosions in its territorial waters. The Court answered the second question in favour of Albania. That is to say, Britain violated the Sovereignty of Albania by removing the explosive substances from the territorial waters of Albania without its permission. The Court observed that Albania was under an obligation to inform Britain about the mines and explosive substance in the North Corfu Channel. Albania did not give any such warning to the warships of Britain. In addition to this, no such endeavour was made by Albania as might prevent the harm caused to the warships of Britain. The Court, therefore, ruled that Albania was liable for the loss and damage caused to the British warships on account of explosions and was also liable to pay compensation to Britain.

The Court observed :

> "It is generally recognised and in accordance with international customs that States in time of peace have a right to send their warships through straits used for international navigation between two parts of the high seas without the previous authorization of a coastal State, provided that passage is innocent. Unless otherwise prescribed in an international convention, there is no right for a coastal State to prohibit such passage through straits in time of peace."

But by removing mines etc. from territorial waters of Albania without its permission, Britain was guilty of the violation of Albanian sovereignty. However, in view of the gravity of Albanian act of firing on British ships the world Court did not award any compensation on this account.

The test propounded by Mr Webster is still valid with the only difference that intervention on the ground of self-preservation is no more allowed. Thus instead of self-defence and self-preservation the valid ground now is only self-defence, that too very much limited and curtailed by Article 51 of the Charter of the U.N. However the concept of self-defence as expounded under Article 51 includes the defence of others and is called the right of individual and collective self-defence.

The United Nations Charter enshrines the principle of individual and collective self-defence in Article 51.[35] Article 51 provides : "Nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self defence if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations, until the Security Council has taken the measures to maintain international peace and security. Measures taken by members in exercise of this right shall be immediately reported to the Security Council and shall not in any way effect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary in order to maintain or restore international peace and security." The right of self-defence under Article 51 is subject to following conditions : (i) There should be an armed attack ; (ii) The right exists until Security Council has taken any action ; (iii) It should be reported to the Security Council ; (iv) It is subject to the review by Security Council ; (v) This right shall not affect the responsibility of the Security Council for the maintenance of peace and security ; (vi) The right is not available against a non-member of the United Nations.[36] Thus, "The beginning of an armed attack is condition precedent for resort to force in self-defence".[37] This may be explained with the help of following illustration : (i) State A receives information that its neighbour State B is preparing to invade its territory. In order to forestall the invasion A attacks B and disperses the troops amassed in B. A and B are both members of the U.N. B brings a complaint against A in the Security Council that State A has committed aggression. A pleads self-defence.* (ii) Similarly, the territories of a big and powerful State "X" lie between the territories of two small states "A" and "B". State "A" is towards the east and the State "B" is towards the west of the State "X". After certain border incidents during the course of which a few soldiers belonging to each of the three States were killed and wounded, the State "X" attacked States "A" and "B" and occupied major portions of their territories. The Security Council tried to intervene but the reply was given by the State "X" was that the States "A" and "B" were about to attack "X" and the latter had started military operations ~~in~~ order to protect its interests. The State "X" also contended that it alone could determine whether or not such danger existed. In illustration (i) intervention by State A is not justified under Article 51 of the Charter. Similarly in illustration (ii) intervention by "X" is also not justified because Article 51 of the Charter permits the right of self-defence only if "an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations." [38] In both the above illustrations, armed attack had not taken place but the contention was that preparations were being made to launch the attack. Moreover, in the second illustration, X's contention that it alone could determine whether or not such danger existed, is not justified because Article 51 of the Charter clearly provides that "measures taken by members in exercise of this right......... shall not in any way affect the authority and responsibility of the Security Council under the present Charter to take at any time such action as it deems necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security."

---

[35] According to Josef L. Kunz : "Under general international law, States have the right to use military force as sanctions, Article 51 gives he same right of self-defence plus the right of defence of others incorrectly-called self-defence." "Sanctions in International Law," AJIL, Vol. 54 (1960), p. 324 at p. 328.

[36] Julius Stone, Legal Control of International Conflicts (London, Stevens & Sons, 1954), p. 244.

[37] "The Use of Force in Self-Defence," BYBIL, Vol. 37 (1966) p. 266 ; see also Josef L. Kunz, "Individual and Collective Self-Defence in Article 51 of the Charter of the U.N." AJIL Vol. 41 (1947), p. 872.

Thus, alarming military preparations by a neighbouring State would not justify resort to anticipatory force by the State which believed itself threatened." It has been rightly remarked : "The principal lesson of the League experience and two world wars is that the plea of self-defence should be held within strict confines, so that States may be precluded from embarking upon aggressive wars in the name of self-defence. The Charter of the United Nations has rightly restricted self-defence to armed attack. The solemn words of the preamble of the U.N. Charter that the 'scourge of war which twice in our life-time has brought untold sorrow to mankind' warn against an interpretation of the Charter which extends the scope of self-defence beyond the limits of Article 51.[39] In case concerning Military and Para-Military Activities in and Against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America)[40], the International Court of Justice held that the right of collective self-defence pre-supposes that an armed attack has occurred.[41] Further, under international law in force today—whether customary international law or that of the United Nations system—States do not have a right of "collective armed response to acts which do not constitute an "armed attack." [42] As regards the definition of an armed attack, the world court observed : "......... an armed attack must be understood as including not merely action by regular armed forces across an international border but also 'the sending by or on behalf' of a state of armed bands, groups, irregulars or mercenaries, which carryout acts of armed force against another state of such gravity as to amount an actual armed attack ...... or its substantial involvement therein." [43]

---

* Asked in P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 4.

 Asked in P.C.S. (1975), Q. No. 8.

[38] As rightly remarked by Judge Philip C' Jessup : "This restriction in Article 51 very definitely narrows the freedom of action which States had under international law. A case could be made out for self-defence in the traditional law where the injury was threatened but no attack had yet taken place. Under the Charter, alarming military preparations by a neighbouring State would justify a resort to the Security Council, but would not justify resort to anticipatory force by the State which itself threatened." A Modern Law of Nations (New York, Macmillan, 1948), p. 166; see also Quincy Wright, "The Cuban Quarantine" AJIL, Vol. 57 (1963), p. 546.

[39] M.K. Nawaz, "Limits of Self-Defence : Legitimacy of Use of Force Against Economic Strangulation ?", IJIL, Vol. 16 (1976), p. 252 at p. 264.

[40] I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 14.

[41] Para 233 of the majority judgment.

[42] Para 211 of the majority judgment.

[43] Ibid. pp 103-104.

*Distinction between self-defence and self-preservation.—A few words will not be out of place here to explain the distinction between "self-defence" and 'self-preservation'. Under the traditional or general international law, there was hardly any distinction between the two terms. However, it must be noted that the term 'self-preservation' is much wider than the term 'self-defence'. Under the traditional international law, intervention on the ground of self-preservation was permitted. Even military preparations in the neighbouring State could justify intervention in the affair of that State. The Charter of the U.N. does not at all mention the term 'self-preservation'. The Charter recognizes retaliatory measures or use of force only on the ground of 'self-defence'. As compared to 'self-preservation', right of 'self-defence' is a very much restricted right and can be exercised only when an armed attack occurs. Other conditions mentioned in Article 51, as explained earlier, must also be fulfilled.

Distinction between self-defence and self-help : It is sometimes said, international Law, in its technical aspects, is a primitive law functioning in a society yet in an embroynic state and characterised by the technique of self-help." This view does not seem to be correct. The traditional or general international law recognised the right of self-help in many situations. The Charter of the U.N. has greatly restricted this right. The Charter confers on each ~~State the~~ right of individual and collective self-defence in case an armed attack occurs. Thus in case of an armed attack, even the Charter recognises the right of self-help. But this right recognised under the Charter is subject to several restrictions as pointed out earlier including the review by the Security Council. The right recognised under the Charter is thus distinct from that of self-help and is therefore, and rightly too, referred as the right of 'self-defence'. As remarked by Gerald Fitzmaurice, "The Charter frowns on self-help ; it goes far towards rendering unenforceable by direct action the whole of international law except the breach of peace. Article 2(4) of the Charter provides that all members shall refrain in their international relation from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations. Moreover, it is one of the purposes of the U.N. to maintain international peace and security, and to that end : to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about the peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of peace.[44] The Charter, however, recognises the right of individual and collective self-defence if an armed attack occurs. But even this right which may to some extent be called the recognition of the right of self-help is subject to the review and control of the Security Council which, as Article 24 provides, has the primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security and acts on behalf of the members of the U.N.

Thus, there is a difference between self-defence and self-help. Self-help is a right which existed in the primitive legal order. In an advanced international legal order, it is prohibited. So long as international law was a primitive legal order, there was provision for self-help in the form of war and reprisal. On the contrary, self-defence is based on the illegality of war. As aptly pointed out by Josef L. Kunz, "Self-defence as a truly judicial institution presupposes an advanced legal order and international self-defence is therefore closely bound up with a more advanced international organisation.[45] As pointed out earlier, Article 51 of the U.N. Charter which provides the right of self-defence, also provides for its limitations. Moreover, it is subject to the control of the Security Council.

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1985) Q. 10(b).

 Asked in P.C.S. (1975) Q. No. 1.

 Asked in I.A.S. (1964), Q. No. 7.

[44] Article 1(1) of the United Nations Charter.

[45] Josef L. Kunz, "Individual and Collective Self-Defence in Article 51 of the Charter of the U.N.", AJIL, vol. 41 (1947), p. 872 At p. 875.

(2) *Intervention on humanitarian ground.—Intervention was permitted in past on humanitarian grounds. After coming into force of United Nation's Charter, the United Nations has done commendable work in the field of human rights. If at all intervention is permitted on humanitarian grounds, it may be done only by the United Nations. On the basis of Articles 1, 55 and 56, it may be said that Charter provisions relating to human rights create legal obligation upon the members in respect of human rights. But the Charter does not authorise any State to intervene in the affairs of another State. This is clear from Article 2(4). Even U.N. has been prohibited, under Article 2(7), from intervening in the domestic affairs of Member States. Consequently, on the ground of human rights alone, even the U.N. cannot intervene in the affairs of any member State. It can, however, do so by connecting or linking the matter of human rights with that of the maintenance of international peace and security. That is to say, if under Article 39 the Security Council determines that violation of human rights in any State poses a threat to peace or amounts to breach of peace then the Security Council may intervene for then the provision of Chapter VII of Charter become applicable.[46] The glaring example of this is recent intervention by the U.N. in Iraq on behalf the Kurdish people.

(3) To enforce treaty rights.—Intervention was also permitted in past under International law to enforce treaty rights. The Charter of the U.N. does not permit intervention on this ground.

(4) Intervention to prevent illegal intervention.—In past there have been several cases of intervention by States in order to prevent illegal intervention by other States. Intervention by one State in the affairs of another State on this ground is no more permissible.

(5) Balance of Power.—In past there have been many cases of intervention in order to maintain balance of power. Under the United Nations Charter this is not at all valid ground. Thus no State can intervene in the internal or external affairs of another State in order to maintain the balance of power. As a matter of fact, International law today tends to convert the system of balance of power into a system of collective security. The system of balance of power has been replaced by a system of collective security.[47]

Though intervention by a State or U.N. in the domestic affairs of a State on the ground of balance of power is no more permissible, politically reference of this ground is still not uncommon. A major nuclear confrontation between the two super powers—the U.S. and the U.S.S.R., has so far been avoided on the basis of balance of power in respect of nuclear weapons. It would not be wrong to say that in all talks of disarmament between the two super powers, balance of power forms the basis directly or indirectly. Besides, whenever India protests against U.S. supply of dangerous weapons to Pakistan, reference of the disturbance of balance of power in the sub-continent is made.

(6) For Protection of persons and property.—In past, International Law permitted intervention by a State for protection of the persons and property of its citizens. This ground is no more permissible under the Charter of the U.N.

(7) Collective intervention or collective measures.—Under the U.N. Charter 'Collective intervention' can be made to check an aggression on the breach of international peace and security. Under Chapter VII, Security Council has been empowered to take collective action if there exists a threat or a breach of international peace and security or an aggression has taken place. In the first stage, the Security Council takes such collective measures as do not involve the use of force. But if such an action does not prove to be adequate, the Security Council is empowered to employ armed

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1964) Q. 9(b) ; C.C.S. (1981) Q. 5(b).

[46] See also Chapter on "Human Rights".

 See for P.C.S. (1969), Q. No. 2.

[47] For a detailed discussion of this see Chapter on "Collective Security".

 See also for P.C.S. (1985) Q. 5 ; For detailed answer see also Chapter on "The Security Council".

forces. The United Nations took such action in Korea (1950) and in Congo (1961). The recent example of such action is Gulf War (1991) for the vacation of Iraqi aggression and occupation of Kuwait. (See Appendix II.) This has been discussed in detail in Chapter on "The Security Council".

(8) Intervention to maintain International Law.—Before the establishment of League of Nations and United Nations, International Law permitted intervention for maintenance of International Law. Intervention on this ground is no more permissible.

(9) Intervention in Civil Wars.—In view of the continuous growth of International community, nations of the world have established close relations with each other. If anything happens in a State, it is quite natural that it makes its effect on other States as well. If there is a civil war in a State, it is likely to affect directly or indirectly other States. In past there have been interventions by States in affairs of other States on this ground. For example, in 1934-38 Germany and Italy intervened in the war of Spain. In 1968, Russia intervened in the Civil War of Czechoslovakia. Similarly, Russia intervened in the affairs of Hungary. The question arises how far such type of intervention is justified in view of the fact that United Nation's Charter has propounded the principle of non-intervention by States in the affairs of other States. Jurists are of the view that Russian interventions in Czechoslovakia and Hungary were not justified. But Russia claimed that it intervened in the affairs of Czechoslovakia and Hungary on the request of their respective governments. It has been suggested that in civil war the United Nations should have the right to intervene. The United Nations should take necessary action to check such type of war. Prof. R.P. Dhokalia has pointed out that a successful example of intervention by United Nations is the case of Congo in 1961. In Congo United Nations succeeded in ending the civil war and in establishment of law and order.[48] It may be noted here that the U.N. can intervene in civil war only if the Security Council first determines under Article 39 of the Charter that it poses a threat to the peace, breach of the peace, or amounts to an act of aggression. If the Security Council makes this determination, provisions of Chapter VII of the Charter become applicable. The recent examples of such intervention by the U.N. Security Council are : (i) intervention in Iraq on behalf of the Kurdish people and (ii) intervention in civil war of Yogoslavia ; and (iii) Somalia.

Conclusion.—In view of the above discussion it may be concluded that a State may intervene in the affairs of another State only on the ground of self defence. The U.N. may intervene in the domestic affairs of member State on the ground of maintenance or restoration of international peace and security. That is to say, it can take collective measures or can make collective intervention if an aggression has taken place or there is a threat to international peace and security. The U.N. may also intervene in case of civil wars between two member States or in case of violation of human rights in a member State if the Security Council under Article 39 first determines that the civil war or the violation of human rights poses a threat to international peace and security.

Intervention under League of Nations and United Nations and the Concept of Domestic Jurisdiction*.—Article 2(7) of the United Nations' Charter provides, "Nothing contained in the present Charter authorises the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State ...." According to Prof. Quincy Wright, it is clear that the obligations which arise from the implementation of the provisions of Charter are matters which are not within the domestic jurisdiction of any State. Article 2(7) has made it clear that the prohibition regarding non-intervention by the United Nations in the domestic jurisdiction of any State will not apply to the Security Council when it takes any enforcement or preventive action against any State for the maintenance of international peace and security.

---

[48] R.P. Dhokalia, "Civil Wars and International Law", IJIL Vol. II (1971), p. 219 at p. 238 ; see also "Biafra, Bengal and Beyond : International Responsibility and Genocidal Conflict," AJIL, Vol. 66 (1972), p. 89 at p. 94-95.

* See also for I.A.S. (1971), Q. No. 11 (a) ; P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 10(e) and P.C.S. (1967), Q. No. 8 ; C.C.S. (1981), Q. 5(a) ; C.S.E. (1994) Q. 8(a).

Comparison with League of Nations.—Article 15 of the Covenant of the League of Nations was to a great extent, similar to Article 2(7) of the United Nations' Charter. Article 15 of the Covenant of the League of Nations provided that the League of Nations could not intervene in matters which were "solely within the domestic jurisdiction" of the States. Prof. Julius Stone[49] has pointed out the following differences in the League provisions and the provisions of the United Nations' Charter :—

(i) Under the League of Nations, the League Council had to decide whether a matter was within the domestic jurisdiction of a State or not. There is no such provision in the United Nations' Charter. According to Prof. Kelsen, this will mean that under the United Nations' Charter each State is free to determine whether a particular matter is within its domestic jurisdiction or not. Prof. Julius Stone does not agree with this view. In his view, each organ of the United Nations before which the matter arises is entitled to determine whether a particular matter is within the domestic jurisdiction of a State or not.

(ii) Under the League of Nations, any State which claimed that a particular matter was within its domestic jurisdiction, had to prove it. There is no clear provision in this connection in the United Nations' Charter.

(iii) Under the League of Nations, a matter could be within the domestic jurisdiction of a State if it was not covered by international law. Under Article 2(7) of the United Nations' Charter, it is not necessary.

Thus the provisions of the Covenant of League of Nations and the United Nations' Charter are different. As regards the words "a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of a State", Prof. Brierly has expressed the view that no matter which is regulated by international law can be a matter within the domestic jurisdiction of a State.[50] Thus it is clear that United Nations cannot intervene in domestic jurisdiction of any State. But "what these matters would be was not settled once and for all in advance. This was left to be decided pragmatically in the practice of the United Nations".[51] On a perusal of the historical perspectives, debates and conferences, it is clear that the representatives of the States in San Francisco Conference intended that the United Nations should neither discuss nor pass any resolution in regard to matters which are within the domestic jurisdiction of any State.[52] However, this conception has undergone significant changes. It is now well recognized that the discussions in the United Nations and the passing resolution to implement the provisions of the Charter do not amount to intervention in the domestic affairs of any State.[53] Inclusion of any matter in the agenda of General Assembly, discussion on it, its study or the passing of a general resolution would not amount to intervention[54] Famous Indian Jurist M.S. Rajan has also made it clear in his book, that the resolutions of the General Assembly which are passed to fulfil international obligations of members are within the jurisdiction of the United Nations. As pointed out above, the United Nations is empowered to intervene in civil wars of States. Examples of Congo and Cyprus may be cited in this connection. In his view when the civil wars reach a stage which endangers international peace and security it becomes necessary for the United Nations to take necessary collective action.[55] [49] Julius Stone, Legal Control of International Conflicts (London, Stevens & Sons), 1954 pp. 254-56.

---

[50] J.L. Brierly, "Matters of Domestic Jurisdiction," BYBIL, Vol. 6 (1925), at p. 8.

[51] G. Schwarzenberger, Power—Politics, Second Edition (1951), p. 449 ; see also Waldock, 31 BYBIL, p. 96.

[52] D. Gilmour, "The meaning of 'Intervene' within Article 2(7) of the U.N. Charter,—An Historical Perspective," I.C.L.Q., Vol. 16 (1967), p. 300 at p. 349.

[53] Ibid, at p. 251.

[54] See Quincy Wright, "Is discussion Intervention?" A.J.I.L., Vol. 50 (1956), p. 102

[55] See R.P. Dhokalia, "Civil Wars and International Law", IJIL, Vol. II (1971), p. 219 at p. 238.

Legitimacy of use of force against economic coercion : Example of Bangladesh.[56]— It is generally and universally recognized that human rights were openly violated in Bangladesh in 1971. Even after the elections, the elected representatives of the people were not allowed to form their government. The violation of human rights in Bangladesh reached such a magnitude that it ceased to be a matter within the domestic jurisdiction of a State and became an international matter. In the view of Dr L.M. Singhvi, the influx of lakhs of refugees to India endangered international peace. Besides this, the crime of genocide, which was perpetrated, was an international crime and did not come within the domestic jurisdiction of any State. "The Genocide Convention is the expression of the world's conscience through law and makes it plain by affirming that crimes referred to in Articles II and III thereof are a matter of international concern and so outside the matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State of Article II, Para 7 of the United Nations' Charter."[57]

The United Nations could intervene in Bangladesh on humanitarian grounds for the genocide committed and atrocities caused by Pakistani armed forces were clear violation of human rights and posed a grave threat to peace. It must however be noted that the U.N. could intervene only if the Security Council determined under Article 39 that the situation there posed a threat to the international peace and security. But under the charter no state can intervene in the affairs of another state on the ground of violation of human rights. But it has been pointed out : "......the essence of aggression is that a State poses a threat to the socio-political fabric of another State. All the underlying idea of individual self-defence is that if a State's fabric is threatened by another State, it has a right to take all the steps it may deem necessary to terminate that threat to protect itself .... An obvious corrollary to this is that a State's right of self-defence is not confined to cases of armed attack only."[58]

It was alleged by Pakistan that Indian armed forces went into action on 21st November, 1971, and from 3rd December, they were collaborating with the guerrillas of Bangladesh. The Indian representative in the U.N. admitted that India took military initiative on 21st November, 1971, but he added that it should not be looked at in isolation from other events which had occurred and were occurring. The influx of refugees continued and it endangered India's social and political life. As pointed out by Prof. K.P. Misra, "...... civil aggression as it took place in India cannot be excluded from the concept of aggression. Once this is accepted it logically allows the victim of aggression the right of self-defence.[59] This is the only justification which one can give in favour of India's action. The provisions of the Charter as they stand at present do not permit such type of intervention.[60] But it has been pointed out, "A large number of the Third World and Socialist States have taken the view that the term 'force' must be construed as to include not only physical or armed force, but also all forms of coercion, including those of economic, political and other character." [61] Further, overwhelming majority of States now subscribe to the view that "economic and other forms of coercion are violative of the principle of non-intervention." [62]

---

[56] See for P.C.S. (1972), Q. No. 9; C.C.S. (1981), Q. 5(b).

[57] V.R. Krishna Iyer, "Laws Trust with the Dead in Bangladesh vis-a-vis Punishment of Humanicidists "National Herald," February 4, 1972.

[58] K.P. Misra, The Role of the Indo-Pakistan Conflict, 1971 (Vikas Publications House, Pvt. Ltd., Delhi, 1973) p. 130.

[59] Ibid ; see also S.K. Kapoor, "Humanitarian Intervention : Could U.N. Intervene in Bangladesh on Humanitarian Grounds ?" Law Review, Vol. 2, (Sept. 1974), p. 9.

The situation with which India was confronted was unprecedented and if India had not taken the said action probably it would have become impossible to ensure the return of the refugees. The framers of the charter probably never envisaged such a situation. The U.N. Charter should, therefore, be suitably amended to cover such situations. It would not be wrong to say that India's action has already modified thinking of the international community in this respect. The General Assembly on 18 November, 1987 adopted a Declaration on the Enhancement of the Effectiveness of the Principle of Refraining from the Threat or use of Force in International Relations. In this Declaration, the General Assembly solemnly declared :

"States have the duty to abstain from armed intervention and all other forms of interference or attempted threats against the personality of the State or against its political, economic and cultural elements."

Monroe Doctrine[*].—This doctrine was propounded by President Monroe of United States of America. This doctrine was in fact the reaction of the treaty which Nepoleon had entered into with some European States. In American continent all those States which were previously the colonies of Spain and other States, had become independent. The European States wanted to re-establish their colonies in America and wanted to help Spain. In the background of these events the American President Monroe made a declaration in 1823 which is called Monroe doctrine. The Monroe doctrine contained three important points : (i) The States of American continent would no more be made subject of colonisation in future. (ii) America would not interfere in the mutual wars of European States. (iii) If European States interfered in the affairs of American continent, America would consider it unfriendly act, and would take necessary action in this connection. In short, Monroe doctrine was based on the principle of non-intervention. Through this doctrine, President Monroe declared that America would neither interfere in the affairs of European States nor would it tolerate the interference of European States in the States of American continent. "The importance of the Monroe doctrine is largely of a political, not of a legal character......while its claim to legal validity has never been admitted, it has not been actively opposed by the European powers. It was given a quasi-legal status by Article 21 of the Covenant which lays down that it does not affect, regional understandings like Monore doctrine." [63] In the presence of U.N. Charter it has lost all its significance.

Drago Doctrine.—This doctrine is called Drago doctrine because it was propounded by Mr. Drago, foreign minister of Argentina. In fact, this is complementary of the Monroe doctrine. According to this doctrine European States could not intervene in the affairs of States of American continent on the ground of claiming public debts. This principle was propounded because European States had started using military force to enforce the claims of their citizens. For example, England, Germany and Italy had enforced blockade against Venezuela. This blockade was imposed because Venezuela had failed to fulfil its financial obligations. As noted earlier, Drago doctrine is complementary to Monroe doctrine and has less significance than he Monroe doctrine. It may be noted here that United Nation's Charter has propounded the principle of non-intervention and in this context both Monroe doctrine and Drago doctrine have lost their importance and utility.

---

[60] For Example Prof. M.K. Nawaz writes : "The Charter of the United Nations has rightly restricted self-defence to armed attack. The solemn words of the Preamble of the U.N. Charter that the 'scourge of war which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind' warn against an interpretation of the Charter which extends the scope of self-defence beyond the limits of Article 51. International Law 'de legelatta' prescribes the exercise of force as a measure of self-defence in case of economic strangulation 'Limits of Self-Defence : Legitimacy of Use of Force Against Economic Strangulation ?" IJIL, Vol. 16 (1976), p. 252 at p. 264 ; See also discussion under the heading "Article 2(4) and the Limits of the Use of Force" made earlier in this Chapter.

[61] V.S. Mani, "The Concept of Economic Coercion", India Quarterly, Vol., XXXIII No. 3 (July-September, 1977, p. 334 at p. 337.

[62] Ibid, at p. 341.

[*] See also for I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 3(a) : I.A.S. (1961), Q. No. 5, for answer of this question see also discussion of the law of intervention made earlier.

[63] Oppenheim, see supra note 1 at p. 316.

Historical precedents of intervention on the grounds of self-defence and on other grounds

Following are some of the main historical precedents of intervention :

(1) The Caroline, 1841[64].*

N.B.—The facts of this case and the principles propounded have been discussed earlier under the ground of 'Self-defence'.

(2) Corfu Channel case (1949)[65] : N.B.—This has been discussed earlier in this Chapter.

(3) Case of Korea, 1950.—In 1950, North Korea invaded South Korea. This invasion was also not justified on the ground of self-defence. The Security Council of the United Nations, therefore, decided to take enforcement action against Korea. China also intervened in Korea. China claimed that the presence of the United Nations forces in Korea was against the interest and self-preservation of China. But the United Nations declared the intervention of China as illegal intervention.[66]

(4) Russian intervention in Hungary, 1956.—In 1956, there took place a Civil War in Hungary. Russia sent its forces in Hungary and, suppressed the revolt there. Imri Negi, the then Prime Minister of Hungary, requested the United Nations to intervene. Before the United Nations could take action, Imri Negi was removed from the Post of Prime Ministership. Russia claimed that she intervened in Hungary on the request of the Hungarian Government. But the United Nations established an Enquiry Committee which reported that Russian intervention in Hungary was not justified. The Civil War in Hungary started in October 1956. The people of Hungary wanted complete independence and with this objective in view they wanted to get rid of Russian influence and control. Imri Negi was the favourite leader of the people and they wanted to make him the Prime Minister. Martial law was declared in Hungary but even this failed to establish peace. Ultimately Imri Negi was made the Prime Minister. Respecting the wishes of the people he announced his decision to do the following : (a) To give representation to all the political parties in the Government ; (b) To have relations with Soviet Union on the basis of equality and to end Russian control in Hungary ; (c) To ensure withdrawal of Russian armed forces from Hungary ; and (d) To hold elections from the Legislative Assembly of Hungary. But in the meantime Janos Kadar established a parallel government at a distance of 50 miles from Budapest and asked Soviet Union to intervene in Hungary. On the other hand, Negi reacted by ending the Warsaw Pact. But Soviet Union contended that Warsaw Pact can be terminated with the consent of all parties to the treaty. At the request of Kadar, Russian armed forces entered Hungary. The wishes and aspirations of the Hungarian people were ruthlessly crushed by force. Negi took asylum in Yugoslavian embassy and later on he was expelled and sent to Rumania. The Soviet Union argues that she intervened under the provisions of the Warsaw Pact and at the request of Hungary. At the instance of the Communist Party, people's movement was crushed by force. Such an intervention is not permissible under the U.N. Charter.

---

[64] The Caroline Case, Moore's Diggest of International Law, Vol. II, p. 412.

* See also for I.A.S. (1957), Q. No. 6(c).

[65] I.C.J. Reports (1949), p. 5.

[66] See also Chapter on "Security Council" for a little detailed discussion.

 See also for I.A.S. (1957), Q. No. 5 : To elaborate it connect it with principle of non-intervention discussed earlier.

(5) Intervention by U.K., France and Israel in Egypt (1956)*.—In 1956, Egypt nationalised Suez Canal on the ground of obtaining money to build Aswan Dam. France, Britain and Israel reacted strongly against this action of Egypt and jointly made armed intervention in Egypt in order to prevent Egypt from nationalising the Suez Canal. This was a flagrant violation of provisions contained in Articles 2(4) and 51 of the U.N. Charter. The problem was resolved through the efforts of Soviet Union, Security Council and General Assembly. Subsequently it was agreed that Egypt was entitled to realise taxes for the use of canal but the canal would remain free from international politics and would remain open for shipping, to all States.

(6) *The case of Goa.—After the exit of Britishers from India, Goa could not become a part of the Indian Republic because the Portuguese continued their occupation over Goa. India was committed to free Goa which was an integral part of India historically, geographically and on other grounds. In between 1947 and 1961, the people of Goa several times revolted against the established government but the rulers of Goa ruthlessly suppressed their revolt. In 1955 unarmed satyagrahis were fired at. Consequently India recalled its Consul and ordered the closure of the offices of the Portuguese Consul in Bombay and Madras. In 1961, certain incidents took place because of which it became necessary for India to take some action. In 1961 the Portuguese soldiers fired at Indian ships. Besides this, the fishing vessels were also fired at. The Portuguese aircrafts also crossed Indian borders several times. The Indian Government protested against this and communicated warning for the same but with no response. Consequently, it became necessary and expedient for India to take some action. On December 17, 1961 Indian forces entered Goa, and within a short time liberated Goa, Daman and Diu. This action of India was severely criticized by Western Countries. The then Prime Minister of India, Sri Nehru propounded a doctrine similar to that of Monroe doctrine in 1955. In this declaration Prime Minister Nehru made it clear that India would not tolerate the Portuguese presence on her land. After the exit of Britishers, the Portuguese should also have left India, but they continued their occupation over the land. Consequently, India had to take the said action to end the occupation of Portugal over Indian land.

It may be noted here that in the last 25 years, the States of Africa, Asia and other States have started wars of liberation. They have contended that on this ground intervention in the internal affairs of a State may be permitted.[67] It would not be wrong to say that the United Nation's Charter can be enforced in civil wars of a State.[68] In the view A. Rigo Sureda,[69] Portugal lost legal title to Goa when it was declared a non-self governing territory within the meaning of Article 73 of the UN. Charter. According to the principle of self-determination, as expounded by the General Assembly in its Declaration of Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relation and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations : Every State has the duty to refrain from any forcible action which deprives peoples of ....their right to self-determination and freedom and independence. In their action against, and resistence to, such forcible action in pursuit of the exercise of their right to self-determination, such peoples are entitled to seek and to receive support in accordance with the purposes and principles of the Charter.[70] The General Assembly further declared that "Principles of the Charter which are embodied in this Declaration constitute basic principles of the International law" and appealed to all States, including the non-members, "to be guided by these principles in their international conduct and to develop their mutual relations on the basis of the strict observance of these principles." "All these declarations are not ordinary international treaties or conventions and were not subject to ratification. Nevertheless, there is a wide consensus that these declarations actually established new rules of international law binding upon all States. This is not treaty-making but a new method of creating customary international law.[71]

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1967), Q. No. 5(b).

 See also for C.S.E. (1983) Q. 7(b) (i).

[67] See R.P. Dhokalia, Supra note 43 at p. 236.

[68] Ibid, at p. 250.

[69] A. Rigo Sureda, The Evolution of the Right of Self-Determination (A.W. Sijhoff, Leiden, 1973), p. 353.

[70] General Assembly Resolution 2625 (xxv) of 24th October, 1970 : General Assembly Official Records, Twenty-fifth Session, Suppl. No. 28 (1971) at p. 124.

The Goans were fighting for their liberation and were entitled to seek Indian help for their liberation and self determination. India assisted the Goans in their efforts to achieve this objective. Thus although it is very difficult to find a precedent to justify India's action in Goa, yet it can be justified on the support of U.N. resolutions. A General Assembly resolution is generally of recommendatory nature and lack binding force. But a resolution interpreting the provisions of the U.N. Charter or expounding general or customary international law, creates legal implications and may assume binding force. In the light of the above discussion, it would not be wrong to contend that India's action in Goa can be justified on the ground that it was to give support to Goans asserting their right to self-determination which has become a binding principle of international law for "Peoples under alien subjection." [72] It has been argued by some authors[73] that under special circumstances, the principle of self-determination may be applied even to a non-colonial setting. But this is very controversial. It is, however, now generally agreed that the principle of self-determination has become binding principle of international law in the context of colonialism.

It may, be noted that justification or otherwise of Indian action in Goa has now only an academic interest because on 31st December, 1974, a treaty between India and Portugal was signed wherein Portugal has recognised the full sovereignty of India over Goa, Daman and Diu, Dadra and Nagar Haveli.

(7) *American intervention in Cuba.—In 1962, America enforced blockade against Cuba and justified its action on the ground of self-preservation. America referred in this connection, Article 3 of the Treaty of Havana. America claimed that the nuclear weapons which were going to be supplied by Russia, would have jeopardised the security of America. The jurists are, however, of the view that the Cuban blockade enforced by America was not justified on the ground of individual and collective self-defence. "It is difficult to find out that the Soviet Union violated any obligation of international law in shipping misiles to, and installing them in Cuba, at the request of the Castro Government." [74] Further, "The quarantine itself was a preventive measure to be enforced with conventional weapons, prior to an armed attack by Cuba or the Soviet Union upon the United States, or any other American country and without authority of the United Nations or the consent of all the States which might be injured by its application. It could not, therefore, be justified under the terms of Article 2, paragraph 4, of the Charter and the recognized exceptions, such as that in Article 51 to this general prohibition against the threat or use of force in international relation." [75]

(8) Vietnam.—In Vietnam also, America had tried to justify its action on the ground of individual and collective self-defence. But the majority of the jurists have expressed the view that American action is not covered under Article 51 of the Charter, which

---

[71] Louis B. John, "The Development of the Charter of the United Nations : the Present State" : in the Present State of International Law and other Essays, Edited by Prof. Marten Bos. (1973), p. 33 at p. 52.

[72] Rupert Emerson, "Self-determination", Revisited in the Era of Decolonization", Occasional Papers in International Affairs, No. 8 (Dec. 1964). Harvard University Centre for International Affairs, Cambridge, Mass, 1964, p. 64.

[73] Ved P. Nanda, "Self-determination in International Law : The Tragic Tale of Two Cities—Islamabad (West Pakistan) and Dacca (East Pakistan)", AJIL, Vol. 66 (1972), p. 321 at p. 336, see also for a little detailed study of the Principle of self-determination ; S.K. Kapoor, "The Principle of Self-determination Under International Law and the Indian Practice" Lawyer, Vol. VIII—(11 November, 1976), p. 167. See also Suprata Chowdhury, "Portuguese Territories in India—Some Aspects of International Law", A.I.R. 1957 Journal Section, pp. 23-31.

* See also for P.C.S. (1967), Q. No. 5(c).

[74] Quincy Wright, "The Cuban Quarantine," AJIL, Vol. 57 (1963), p. 546.

[75] See also Covey Oliver, "International Law and Quarantine in Cuba," AJIL (1963), p. 588. Brunson Machsney, "Some Comments on the 'Quarantine' of Cuba", Ibid., p. 592; Myres S. MacDougal, "The Soviet-Cuban Quarantine and Self-Defence", Ibid, p. 597; "Intervention and Cuba in 1961", Proc. ASIL (April 27-29, 1961) p. 2 ; For Contra see also Leonard C. Meeker, "Defensive Quarantine and the Law", AJIL, Vol. 57 (1963), p. 515.

provides the right of individual and collective self-defence. Prof. Quincy Wright[76] and William Standard[77] have repudiated the claim of America that its action was justified on the ground of collective self-defence. As rightly pointed out by the Lawyers Committee on American Policy Towards Vietnam, the U.S. intervention in Vietnam was illegal".[78] The Committee based its decision on the following points : (i) The Unilateral military intervention of the United States violates the Charter of the U.N. The Charter's exceptional authorisation of individual and collective self-defence "if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations" cannot apply in the case of Vietnam. (ii) The military presence of the U.S. in Vietnam violated the Geneva Accords of 1954. (iii) The U.S. was not committed by the SEATO Treaty or otherwise to intervene in Vietnam. (iv) The intensity and destructiveness of U.S. Warfare in Vietnam was contrary to international law.

(9) American Intervention in Cambodia.—America had tried to justify its intervention in Cambodia on the ground of collective self-defence. Jurists have refuted the American claim. American Intervention in Cambodia is not justified on the ground of collective self-preservation.[79] The U.S. action does not satisfy even the traditional law requirements for military intervention, because "the preventive action in foreign territory is justified only in case of an instant and overwhelming necessity for self-defence, leaving no choice of means, and no moment for deliberation, (The Caroline case, Moore's Digest of International Law, II, 412)."[80] Further, "the only legal remedy available to the U.S. was to take the issue to the U.N. Cambodia like the U.S. is an independent Sovereign member of the U.N. and a recourse to the U.N. would have been the appropriate action for the U.S. Instead, President Nixon took the law into his own hands on the mistaken hope that in politics the end justifies the means and that he would be rejected by the American electorate and condemned by history, only if his gamble failed. Legal considerations do not appear to have weighed with him".[81]

(10) The Afghan Issue—Soviet Afghan Treaty of Friendship.—The contention of the then Soviet Union was that it sent Soviet troops to Afghanistan at the request of Afghan Government and that it was in conformity with the Soviet-Afghan Treaty of Friendship, Good-neighbourliness and co-operation and Article 51 of the United Nations Charter. Under Article 4 of the Treaty, Soviet Union had pledged to come to the rescue of Afghanistan if it was involved in armed conflict. This Treaty, it may be submitted is in conformity with Article 52, para 1 of the Charter. The essential condition under which Article 51 can be validly invoked is that "an armed attack occurs". Though ordinary border conflicts do not constitute "armed attacks", these words also do not necessarily connote a full-fledged war. Arms and weapons were being supplied to the dissidents in Afghanistan to strengthen the anti-Soviet elements so as to engineer the overthrow of the new Afghan regime headed by Babrak Karmal. In this context, President Babrak Karmal was fully entitled and competent to seek Soviet assistance and the Soviet Union was justified in responding to the request. As regards the contention that Soviet Union sent troops at the request of Kabul, this statement has been corroborated by the new Afghan regime at the U.N. and elsewhere several times. Even if the words 'armed attack' are given very narrow and strict interpretation and it is conceded that Article 51 could not be validly involved,

---

[76] "Legal Aspects of the Vietnam Situation", AJIL (1966), pp. 750-69; see also J.N. Moore, "The Lawfulness of Military Assistance to the Republic of Vietnam" AJIL (1967), pp. 1-34.

[77] "U.S. Intervention in Vietnam is not Legal", AJIL (1966) pp. 633-34, see also R.P. Dhokalia, "Civil War and International Law", IJIL, (1971), p. 219 at pp. 241-42.

[78] The New York Times (January 15, 1967), p. E 9 appearing in Edward Collins' International Law in a Changing World (1969), pp. 378-84.

[79] B.S.N. Murty, "The U.S. intervention in Cambodia", IJIL (1970) p. 196 at p. 198.

[80] Ibid, pp. 197-198.

[81] Ibid. at p. 202 ; For detailed study see also Richard A. Falk, "The Cambodian Operation and International Law", AJIL (1971), p. 1 ; William Rogers, "The Constitutionality of Cambodian Incursion", AJIL (1971) p. 26 ; John Norton Moore, "Legal Dimensions of the Decision to Intercede in Cambodia", AJIL (1971), p. 38.

sending of troops by Soviet Union under Soviet-Afghan treaty at the request of Kabul does not constitute violation of International Law including the Charter of the U.N. so long as Soviet troops remain in Afghanistan and do not attack any other Sovereign State. It may be noted here that on 15 October, 1986, the Soviet Union started pulling out some of its troops stationed in Afghanistan. Earlier the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachov declared on 28 July, 1986 that six Soviet regiments would be withdrawn from Afghanistan before the end of this year. Subsequently, all Soviet troops were withdrawn from the Afghanistan.

(11) *Argentine Intervention in Falkland Islands.—Falkland islands were discovered by Spanish navigators in the 16th century. Nearly 150 years later, a British navigator, John Strong passed through the islands, and without occupying them, named "Falkland" after Viscount Falkland who was the treasurer to the British navy in those days. Thus Falkland Islands first belonged to Spain followed by France. They became British in 1765, Spanish in 1770 and Argentine from 1822 to 1833. On 2nd January, 1833, at Port Soleded, British captain John James Orslow, in command of the Corvette "Clio" took the Islands by force, expelling the Argentine population and authorities residing in them.[82] Since at that time in war much less use of force, was not prohibited, under international law, annexation of territory by force could not be termed as illegal. War was then considered as an attribute of sovereignty. The position has altogether changed after the adoption of the Charter of the United Nations. The Charter prohibits not only, war but also 'use of force' for the settlement of international disputes.

On 2 April, 1982, the military government of Argentina declared that the country's armed forces had 'recovered' Malvinas (Falkland), South Georgia and South Sandwick Island through a successful military operation. On 3, April, 1982 Britain ordered a large naval task force to the Falklands and froze Argentine assets in retaliation of military invasion. On April 4, 1982, the Security Council passed a resolution calling for immediate withdrawal of Argentine troops from Falkland Islands. On 30 April, 1982, Argentine accepted, rather was forced to accept due to British action, the Security Council resolution to withdraw its forces from Falkland Islands.

Argentina's action was clearly violative of Article 2(4) and Article 2(3) of the U.N. Charter. It amounted to aggression and therefore, Britain was justified to exercise her right of self-defence under Article 51 of the Charter. The Argentine action cannot be justified even on the ground of the principle of self-determination.[83] Unlike, India's action in Goa, inhabitants of the Falkland Islands had opted to remain in and with Great Britain, they even resisted the capture of the Islands by Argentina. But as a colonial situation, British action deserves condemnation. Sooner it quits the Islands the better.

(12) American Intervention in Grenada.—On 25 October, 1983, America and 6 Caribbean countries (Antigua, Barbados, Dominica, Jamaica, St. Jucia and St. Vincent) attacked Grenada. The U.S. claimed that its troops had participated in the joint action to protect U.S. citizens and evacuate those who wished to leave and to provide support for the Eastern Caribbean forces in helping the people of Grenada and restore order in that country.

America is guilty of making unilateral armed intervention in Grenada.[84] It is a flagrant violation of International Law including the Charter of the U.N. America has sought to justify its action in Grenada on the following three grounds—(1) Safety of innocent people including 1,000 Americans ; (2) To arrest or check increasing disorder in Grenada, and (3) To establish law and order in governmental institutions in Grenada. The first ground is totally unjustified because in accordance with international law including the charter of the U.N., no State is entitled to intervene in the affairs of another State except on the ground of self-defence. As regards the ground of self-defence, a member State of the U.N. can intervene in the affairs of another State if an armed attack on it has taken place. Moreover, other conditions mentioned in Article 51 of the charter must be fulfilled. It may be added here that leaving apart the legal position even on facts American action cannot be justified. Out of 1000 Americans in Grenada, 800 are the students of a Medical College. The Chancellor of the said Medical College made it clear that there was no danger to the security of American students. Therefore, legally or otherwise, American claim is untenable.

---

* See also for C.S.E. (1988) Q. 8(b).

[82] For more details see Madan Lal, "The Falkland Crisis : A Preliminary Assessment" Foreign Affairs Reports, Vol. XXXI No. 6 (June, 1982) pp. 99-113.

[83] See also Thomas Frank, "Dulce et Decorum Est The Struggle of Legal Principles in Falklands War," AJIL, Vol. 77 (1983) p. 109.

[84] See also Christopher C. Joyner, "The U.S. Action in Grenada Reflections on the Lawfulness of Invasion", AJIL, Vol. 78 (1984) p. 141 at p. 144 ; "International Lawlessness in Grenada", AJIL Vol. 78 (1984) p. 174.

The second ground is also untenable. The disorder, if any, in Grenada is internal and domestic affairs of Grenada and no other State is entitled to intervene in Grenada on this ground.

The third ground is also untenable and unjustified. On the basis of facts also American claim is wrong because the military coup had not led to an increase of disorder in Grenada. Even if there was some increase in the disorder, the conditions were rapidly returning to normalcy.

It may, therefore, be concluded that American intervention in Grenada cannot be justified on any ground whatsoever. It is clear and flagrant violation of the rules of International Law including the Charter of the U.N. and deserves to be condemned by all the member-States of the U.N. and other States.

(13) *U.S. Intervention in Nicaragua.—On 9 April 1984, Nicaragua filed a case against the United States of America in the International Court of Justice at Hague charging the U.S. with waging of "covert" war to topple the Government in Managua (Nicaragua). Nicaragua told the world court that (i) more than 6,000 counter-revolutionaries raided Nicaragua in last month, (ii) they mined the three main sea ports damaging ships besides threatening to cut off Nicaragua economically from the rest of the world, and (iii) the Reagan Administration was seeking $21 million in funding to support contra activities. President Reagan of the U.S. expressed the view that Nicaragua's Sandinista government must be overthrown if it continued to refuse to share power. He further said that unless the Nicaraguan government sought democracy the only alternative for the rebels would be "to have their way and take over."

In case concerning Military and Para Military Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. U.S.)[85] International Court of Justice indicated interim measures on 10 May, 1984 holding unanimously that the U.S. should immediately cease and refrain from any action restricting blocking or endangering access to or from Nicaragua ports, and in particular the laying of mines. The world Court further held that the right to sovereignty and to political independence possessed by Nicaragua, like any other State of the region or of the world should be fully respected and should not in any way jeopardized by any military and para-military activities which are prohibited by the principles of international law, in particular the principle that States should refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any States and the principle concerning the duty not to intervene in matters within the domestic jurisdiction of a State, principles embodied in the U.N. Charter and the charter of the organization of American States.

The world Court gave its final verdict on 27 June, 1986. The Court held : "......the arming and training of the contras is a violation of the prohibition of the force (as laid down in the U.N. charter) ......The financing of the contras undoubtedly constitutes intervention in Nicaraguan Sovereignty by the U.S.A." The U.S. government announced its decision to ignore the verdict of the court. The U.S. charged that the objectives of the court were being subverted by Nicaraguan's effort to use the court as a political weapon. Thus there was no justification whatsoever for the U.S. to intervene in the affairs of Nicaragua. American intervention in Nicaragua was a flagrant violation of the basic provisions of the U.N. charter. The U.S. assumed upon itself the role of international policeman in central America. This is prohibited by the charter of the U.N. and deserves to be universally condemned. The main reason given by the U.S. to give aid to Nicaraguan rebels was to overthrow dictatorship or oppressive government or to restore democracy. International Law does not permit intervention on this ground.

---

* See also for C.S.E. (1996) Q. 8(c).

[85] I.C.J. Rep. (1984) p. 169.

(14) U.S. Attack on Libya (1986).—On 15 April, 1986 American aircrafts attacked two cities of Libya—Tripoli and Bengazi. According to the American government, the said air attack was a reprisal against terrorist activities against American nationals and was launched to discourage Libya from engaging in such terrorist activities. It was the immediate reaction of Berlin explosion wherein one American and one Turkish had dead. Holding Libya responsible for the explosion, President Ronald Reagan of the U.S. declared that such attacks would be repeated if Libya did not cease terrorist activities against the Americans.

The main target of the attack was the residence of Col. Gaddaffi. Though Col. Gaddaffi himself escaped, his 15 months adopted daughter died and his two sons were injured. The matter was raised in the Security Council and an endeavour was made to condemn American action through a resolution but it was defeated by triple veto exercised by the U.S., U.K., and France. However, the General Assembly of the U.N. on 21 November, 1986 passed a resolution condemning the U.S. military attack against Libya. The resolution affirmed the right of Libya to receive appropriate compensation for the material and human loss inflicted upon it. The U.S. attack was rightly described as violation of international law including the charter of the U.N. Besides being violative of Article 2(4) of the U.N. charter American action was also not justified on the ground of reprisal. There was no reasonable proportion between American air attack and the alleged terrorist acts of Libya. As regards triple veto exercised by the U.S., U.K., and France, though it cannot be termed as a violation of the U.N. charter, it is definitely an abuse of the power conferred on the permanent members of the Security Council.

(15) Dropping of supplies by Indian Aircrafts in Sri Lanka, despite opposition of Sri Lanka.—The dropping of supplies in Jaffna (Sri Lanka) by Indian aircrafts on humanitarian grounds amounted to intervention in the internal affairs of Sri Lanka and cannot be justified on any ground whatsoever under international law. As held by the International Court of Justice in Case Concerning Military and Para-Military Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. U.S.) [Judgment dated 27 June, 1986] in the absence of the request of a sovereign State concerned, entry of aircrafts in the air space of that State amounts to intervention. Since Indian action was not on the request of Sri Lanka, rather it was opposed by Sri Lanka, it was clearly violative of Article 2(4) of the United Nations charter. It may, however, be noted that the matter of dropping of supplies by Indian aircrafts has now only academic interest because of the Indo—Sri Lanka Accord of 29 July, 1987 and subsequent events.

(16) Questions of the withdrawal of Indian Peace Keeping Forces (I.P.K.F.) from Sri Lanka.—Para 6 of the Indo-Sri Lanka Agreement of July 29, 1987 provided the following :

> The Prime Minister of India and President of Sri Lanka also agree that in the terms of paragraph 2.14 and paragraph 2.16(c) of the agreement, an Indian peace-keeping contingent may be invited by the President of Sri Lanka to guarantee and enforce the cessation of hostilities, if so required."

I.P.K.F. were sent on the request of the President of Sri Lanka and hence when the latter requested for their withdrawal, they ought to have been withdrawn forthwith. When President Premdasa asked India to withdraw I.P.K.F. by the end of July 1989, India instead of withdrawing the I.P.K.F. as desired connected the withdrawal of I.P.K.F. with the devolution of powers in the north-east provinces. India, however proposed to withdraw I.P.K.F. by 31 December, 1989. The I.P.K.F. were not withdrawn even by 31 December, 1989.

It was wrong and unjustified on the part of India to connect the withdrawal of I.P.K.F. with devolution of powers in north-east provinces. As pointed out by Sri V.R. Krishna Iyer, retired Judge of the Supreme Court, "our army went in only on condition that it would be there only .... on invitation by the President and agreeing to leave on request by him......... To turn an invited army into a defiant foreign force, refusing to quit when demanded is blatant breach." [86] Further, "Even an infant in international law will call this negative aggression......... negative aggression is where a foreign force, once in by invitation for a limited purpose, exceeds that purpose or refuses to return on revocation of the invitation." [87] Thus continued presence of I.P.K.F. after the request of Sri Lanka was clearly violative of international law.

During the Prime Ministership of Mr V.P. Singh India adopted a reasonable attitude and agreed to withdraw I.P.K.F. by 31 March, 1990. In pursuance of the said agreement, India withdrew I.P.K.F. even earlier than the said date i.e. by 24 March, 1990.

(17) American Intervention in Panama.—American intervention in Panama has rightly been termed as brutal and wholly unwarranted interference in the affairs of a small country. General Manuel Noriega was the Panama's top military officer and effective ruler since 1983. In February he formally seized power of the ruler. Elections were held in 1989 but when it became clear that the opposition was gaining a decisive victory and that Mr Guillermo Endara had won the Presidential election, Gen. Noriega annulled elections. Besides doing his best to destroy democratic norms in Panama, he deserved universal condemnation for his connection with drug business. He was accused of accepting millions of dollars in bribes from the Colombian Madelin drug cartel to protect shipments of cocaine.

The immediate cause or excuse for U.S. intervention arose when an unarmed U.S. officer was shot and killed in confrontation, another was injured and third was manhandled and his wife was abused. On the midnight of 19 December 1989, U.S. forces invaded Panama and removed Gen. Noriega from power. President Bush of the U.S. had ordered U.S. military forces into Panama city in order to "protect American lives, restore the democratic process, preserve the integrity of the Panama canal treaties" and apprehend General Manuel Antonio Noriega who was under indictment in U.S. on drug trafficking charged. The U.S. claimed to have removed a 'dictator' and restored 'democracy'.

After seeking political asylum in Papal Nuncio in Panama for some time, Gen. Noriega ultimately surrendered to the U.S. troops on 4 January, 1990. Noriega was immediately taken to the U.S. for his trial. None of the grounds advanced by the U.S. justify U.S. invasion of Panama. Since the U.S. not at all the victim of an "armed attack" U.S. intervention on the ground of self-defence was not at all justified and it was clearly violative of Article 51 of the U.N. charter.

Yet another ground advanced by the U.S. to justify its action in Panama was to remove a dictator and to restore democracy. Intervention on this ground is not at all permissible under the charter of the U.N. The U.S. intervention was clearly violative of Article 2(4) of the charter. In Case concerning Military and Para-Military Activities in and against Nicaragua[88], the International Court of Justice held that "no general right of intervention in support of an opposition within another state exists in contemporary international law."[89] Further, "under international law in force today whether customary international law or that of the United Nations system, states do not have a right of collective armed response to acts which do not constitute an 'armed attack'." [90] Thus America's intervention on the ground of restoring democracy in Panama cannot at all be justified.

Yet another ground taken by America as justification of its action in Panama was to apprehend Gen. Noriega and try him in America on the charge of drug trafficking. But even this was violating of Article 2(4) and Article 51 of the charter. The U.N. is based on sovereign equality of all its members. Even the drug menace cannot dilute that principle.

(18) Iraqi invasion and annexation of Kuwait .—On 2nd August, 1990, Iraq invaded Kuwait. Subsequently Iraq annexed Kuwait and declared it to be 19th province of Iraq. An

---

[86] V.R. Krishna Iyer, "Aggression in a Huff of Hagemoney", Indian Express, 27 July 1989.

[87] V.R. Krishna Iyer, "Peace Even at the Cost of Prestige", Indian Express, 28 July 1989.

[88] I.C.J. Rep. (1986) p. 14.

[89] Para 209 of the Judgment.

[90] Ibid., para 211.

* See also for C.S.E. (1996) Q. 6(a).

emergency session of the Security Council was immediately called on 2nd August, 1990. The Security Council passed a resolution condemning Iraqi action and asking Iraq to withdraw its forces unconditionally from Kuwait. On 6th August, 1990, the Security Council passed another resolution declaring commercial, financial and military blockade against Iraq. On 9th August, 1990, the Security Council passed yet another resolution declarating 'Null and void' Iraq's annexation of Kuwait and declaration of Kuwait as 19th province of Iraq and asking all other States not to recognize Iraq's annexation of Kuwait. Subsequently Security Council passed a number of other resolutions in this connection but none of the above resolutions had any effect on Iraq.

Consequently, the Security Council took action under Chapter VII of the Charter of the U.N. On 29th November, 1990, the Security Council passed its twelfth resolution (Resolution 678) which allowed the States cooperating with Kuwait Government to use "all necessary means" to remove Iraqi forces from Kuwait. It may be noted that resolution 678 had also provided that in case Iraq did not implement Resolution 660 and other resolutions by 15th January, 1991, the States cooperating with the Kuwait Government could use "all necessary means" to implement resolution 660 and to maintain international peace and security. But even this resolution did not have the desired effect on Iraq.

Gulf war (1991) started on 17th January, 1991. America and its allied forces crippled Iraqi power and forced Iraq to withdraw its forces from Kuwait. On 26th January, 1991, Iraq announced that it was withdrawing its forces from Kuwait. Later on, the Security Council established a committee which would hear claims of States, individuals and corporations who suffered damage during war and to award compensation to them.

Iraq was clearly and without any shade of doubt guilty of aggression against Kuwait, and for that matter against the whole international community. Iraq's invasion and annexation of Kuwait was a flagrant violation of Articles 2(3) and 2(4) of the U.N. Charter. The Security Council, therefore, rightly took action under Chapter VII of the Charter. This is the most successful collective action taken by the Security Council under Chapter VII of the Charter.

(19) Kurd's Problem and the Legality of the Action taken by America and the U.N.— After being badly defeated by America and its allies during the Gulf War (1991), Iraq was confronted with many serious problems. One of such serious problems was insurgency of Kurd's people who utilized this opportunity for starting struggle for self-determination and independence from Iraq. Though the armies of President Saddam Hussain of Iraq were badly defeated by America and its allied armies, soldiers loyal to him, ruthlessly crushed the Kurd's revolt. Due to the atrocities caused by the armies of President Saddam Hussain of Iraq, lakhs of Kurds fled crossing the borders of Turkey and Iran. About 15 lakhs Kurds became refugees in their own country as well as in the neighbouring countries. On 4th March 1991, America warned President Saddam Hussain to stop the use of helicopters against the Kurds. On 5th March, 1991, the United Nations Security Council passed a resolution asking Iraq to stop repression of its civilians and to allow international humanitarian agencies to visit Iraq without any obstruction. The resolution condemned Iraqi repression of its civilian population and added that it posed a threat to international peace and security as large number of refugees were fleeing across Iraqi borders.

On 11th April, 1991, America once again warned Iraq not to fly its helicopters and aircrafts on its borders with Turkey. On 12th April, 1991, America announced that it would implement a four-point "operation provide comfort". In the first phase of the operation medicines and materials for shelter were to be air-dropped. In the second phase, America was to construct refugee camps in Iraqi areas, and these camps would later on be entrusted to international agencies. In the third phase, America would ensure that continuous supplies reached the refugees through aircrafts, trucks and helicopters. In the fourth and the last phase, America would entrust the refugee camps to international agencies such as the United Nations and International Red Cross. On 28th April, 1991, U.N. Secretary-General announced that he would ensure that the U.N. took the responsibility of refugee camps from America. There were reports that America and its allied States were constructing a big airport in Iraqi area for rendering assistance to the Kurds.

Legal Aspects.—Iraqi repression against Kurds is a flagrant violation of human rights and deserves universal condemnation. As regards the question of the right of self-determination, it is not a binding principle of international law under ordinary circumstances. The principle of self-determination has become a binding principle of international law only in the context of colonialism. The problem of Kurd's people in Iraq is not a colonial situation. Iraq is an established state and is not bound to give to its own people the rights of self-determination.

The next legal question that arises is whether the U.N. or for that matter any state has the right to intervene in the internal matters of Iraq. International Law prohibits intervention. The charter of the U.N. propounds the principle of non-intervention by states under Article 2(4) and by the U.N. under Article 2(7).

Article 2(4) provides that all members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations. Thus even 'use of force' has been prohibited. Individual and collective self-defence is however an exception to this rule. But this is a very limited right and can be exercised under the conditions mentioned in Article 51 of the charter of the U.N. One of the conditions mentioned in Article 51 is "if an armed attack occurs against a member of the United Nations". There is no such thing in respect of Kurds people in Iraq. Hence establishment of refugee camps within the Iraqi area, to provide them armed security, to warn Iraq not to cause repression of Kurd's people and to remove its armies from Southern Iraq, to construct airports in Iraq, to render assistance to Kurds people etc. are flagrant violation of territorial integrity or political independence of Iraq. According to America, it has constructed refugee camps within Iraqi area and rendered assistance on humanitarian grounds. But the charter of the U.N. does not permit any member state of the U.N. to intervene in internal affairs of any other member state on humanitarian grounds. Thus American action is clearly violative of the rules of international law.

Even the U.N. cannot intervene in the internal matters of any member state. Article 2(7) of the U.N. charter provides that nothing contained in the present charter shall authorise the U.N to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the member to submit such matters to settlement under the present charter ; tnis principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII. The words in italics herein show that Article 2(7) provides an exception to the principle of non-intervention by the U.N. in the domestic jurisdiction of any member state. Thus when the U.N. Security Council takes enforcement action under Chapter VII, the principle of non-intervention by the U.N. does not apply.

For taking action under Chapter VII of the Charter, the Security Council has first to determine under Article 39 that the violation of human rights has reached such a stage that it poses a threat to international peace and security. In other words, action under Chapter VII cannot be taken merely on the ground of violation of human rights. Action can be taken on the ground of international peace and security. The resolution passed by the Security Council on 5 April 1991 expressly mentioned that the "repression" of Kurds in Iraq posed a threat to international peace and security. Thus, Security Council's action in taking charge of refugee camps of Kurds in Iraq to render them assistance and to direct Iraq not to cause atrocities upon Kurds people is valid and legal.

(20) Crisis in Somalia [91]:

The situation in Somalia was unique and unprecedented. Somalian crisis was due to Civil war since 1991. Gen. Aidid never accepted Ali Mahdi Mohamed as interim President. Apart from these two groups, there are many other armed factions who are engaged in looting and robbery. Due to continuous violence and civil war the social and economic condition is in shambles. In short, violence, civil war, famine and drought are the main problems of Somalia. Armed factions of Somalia have been obstructing the deliveries of humanitarian aid to Somalia people who are dying in large numbers due to starvation and diseases.

---

[91] For facts in detail see Dr. S.K. Kapoor, International Law, Tenth Edition, pp. 904-909.

As noted above, on 20th January, 1992, Interim government of Somalia requested the Security Council of the United Nations to consider on the worsening humanitarian crisis in Somalia. The attention of the Security Council was also drawn towards the worsening civil war situation in Somalia. On 23rd January, 1992, Somalia asked all States to refrain from supply of arms and military equipment to Somalia. On 24th April, 1992, the Security Council established UNOSOM to supervise cease-fire in Somalia. On 3rd December, 1992, the Council allowed the use of "all necessary means" to secure the delivery of humanitarian aid to starving people of Somalia. By resolution 794 (1992), the Council acted under Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter which provides for action including the use of force with respect to threats to peace and acts of aggression. This was probably in response to American offer for deployment of American troops to ensure a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia. On 26th March, 1993, the Council decided to transfer the task of securing humanitarian aid deliveries from a U.S. led international force to a U.N. Peace-keeping operation i.e. expanded U.N. Operation in Somalia called UNOSOM II. It was made clear that like UNITAF forces, UNOSOM II will operate under the provisions of Chapter VII, a mandate not initially given to UNOSOM.

Article 2(7) of the Charter of the U.N. provides : Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State or shall require the members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter, but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII.

It is clear from the above that when the Security Council takes action under Chapter VII of the Charter, the principle of non-intervention by the U.N. in the matter of the member States which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction, does not apply. As regards Somalia, the interim government of Somalia requested the Council to consider worsening humanitarian problem and civil war. Thus first U.N. took action at the request of Somalia. The Council determined that humanitarian problem and civil war of Somalia posed a threat to international peace and security. When the Council found that action not involving use of force proved to be inadequate, the Council allowed the use of "all necessary means" (as it did earlier in case of Gulf War, 1991) to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief. Thus United Nations, action in Somalia is fully justified under international law.

Ordinarily, even the U.N. cannot intervene on the ground of a violation of human rights or civil war in a member State. But if the Security Council determines that violation of human rights or civil war reaches such magnitude that it poses a threat to international peace and security, Security Council becomes entitled to take action under Chapter VII of the Charter by virtue of exception provided in Article 2(7) of the Charter. This is what the Council actually did in case of Somalia.

Some persons have criticized U.N. action in Somalia. They contend that in Somalia U.N. seems to be groping in the dark and has lost its way. There seems to be some force in this criticism. It was essential to prevent the wave of violence in Somalia and to achieve this the U.N. took upon itself the task of disarming the warlords of Somalia so as to ensure the secure environment for humanitarian deliveries to the starving people of Somalia. However, it must be kept in mind that the objective of the U.N. was to enforce rather than to impose, peace. After the failure of the American troops to disarm warlords of Somalia, especially to capture Gen. Aidid and his followers, this was realized by the U.N. Security Council. Instead of enforcing peace, American action led to outbursts of violence. American action came up for a lot of criticism. That is why, in January 1994, the Security Council gave U.N. Peace-keepers a limited mission after the withdrawal of American troops. It retreated from aggressive and combative peace-keeping operations and returned to a more cautious, neutral role which the U.N. has traditionally played.

In March, 1994 Gen. Aidid and Ali Mahdi signed an agreement at Nairobi. In this agreement they pledged to establish a government on the basis of national reconciliation. They agreed to abide by a cease-fire, to disarm armed groups and to hold a conference on 15th May, 1994 to elect a President, a Vice-President and a Prime Minister. But even this agreement could not be implemented.

The United Nations has accepted that its mission in Somalia has been unsuccessful. On 4th November, 1994, the Security Council unanimously resolved to withdraw its forces from Somalia by 31st March, 1995. Thus the U.N.'s Somalian mission came to an abrupt and unsuccessful end. However, it must be admitted that the failure of U.N. mission to Somalia was due to Somalian leaders and armed groups there. During the two years of its mission, 130 U.N. soldiers were killed and more than 1 billion dollars a year were spent. It cannot but be denied that during its Somalian mission, the U.N. rendered signal service in rendering humanitarian relief to the millions of Somalians.

(21) Russia—Chechnya conflict and Dagestan War

According to Russia, Chechnya an autonomous Republic of North Cancesus and rich in oil and culturally Muslim, had been smuggling its oil productions in world markets and had been becoming a centre for the crime of terrorism. During the Second World War Stalin had accused Chechens of cooperating with Germans. Since then Chechens had been nurturing bitterness and ill-will against the Moscow administration. In 1991 the Chechens under the leadership of former General of Soviet Air Forces Dudayer declared themselves independent. President Boris Yeltsin of Russia tried to prevent the separatist move of Chechens but with no success.

On 11th December, 1994, the Russian forces entered Chechnya and started attacking Chechen rebels. Thereafter, fierce fighting took place. By 21st December, 1994, Russian forces reached Grozny. In the fierce fighting that ensued nearly 1,000 Chechens were killed on 26th December, 1994 Russia announced the establishment of a new government in Chechnya. Though the Chechen rebels were defeated, they were, by no means, disgraced. They fled to mountain and continued guerilla war. Since then Chechens have become an eye-sore for Russians. On 30th July, 1995, an agreement was reached between Russians and Chechens on military issue but the critical problem of the breakaway republic's political futures remained unresolved.

In the second half of the year 1999 the separatist movement assumed serious proportions. In the first week of October, 1999 the separatist Government of Chechnya threatened to declare Martial Law and start a holy war (Jehad). In reply the Russia increased its military activities against Chechnya. To suppress the Chechnya rebels, Russian aircraft bombed Chechnya, especially its Capital Grozny. In a full-fledged war between the rebels and the Russian army large number of military and civilian persons have been killed. The Russian army surrounded the Capital Grozny from all sides. Being compelled the elected President of Chechnya, Asian Mashkhadov appealed for peaceful settlement of the dispute and to hold talks for the same. This appeal was made in the second week of October, 1999. But even this could not end the Chechnya war. The Russian Armed Forces accelerated their actions against the rebel causing heavy casualties. In February, 2000 Russians claimed to have complete control over the situation. They claimed that most parts of Chechnya including Grozny were under their control. But what happened subsequently falsified their claim. In the beginning of the first week of March, 2000 the Chechnya rebels killed twenty Russian soldiers by laying ambush.

Dagestan War

There is yet another fact that shows that Russian problems are not yet over. Similar to Chechnya, the conflict has also started in Caspian province of Dagestan. In Caspian area Dagestan is a small republic of 32 tribes. Most of the people of this province are followers of Islam. The conflict in Dagestan started when in August, 1999 a large number of extremists revolted under the leadership of a Chechnya rebel. Though the Russian armed force have started their action, it seems that like Chechnya war, Dagestan war may also last long.

Legal Aspects.—Chechnya-Russia conflict is clearly an internal matter of Russia. Therefore, the principle of self-determination contained in Article 1 of the U.N. Charter cannot be applied in case of Chechnya. The principle of self determination has become a binding principle of international law in the context of colonialism only. For nearly 130 years Chechnya has been a part of Soviet Union. Taking advantage of the breaking up of Soviet Union Chechnya unilaterally declared independence in 1999, but the Soviet Union never recognized it, will any established state of the world ever recognize such a unilateral declaration of its own people.

After the breaking up of the Soviet Union in 1991, many former Soviet Republics became independent. But they became independent by proper agreement and not through unilateral declarations. Similar developments took place in former Yugoslavia and Czechoslovakia. Infact Chechnya revolted against Russia and declared its independence. Under such circumstances the established State (Russia) is entitled to take proper action.

It may, however, be noted that human rights do not fall within the internal or domestic jurisdiction of any State. But on the ground of violation of human rights no State has the right to intervene in the affairs of another State. If any body can play some role in such a situation, it is the Security Council of the United Nations. It deserves mention that even the Security Council cannot intervene on the sole ground of violation of human rights. The Security Council can intervene only if it first determines that the violation of human rights has reached such a magnitude that it poses a threat to international peace and security. But in case of Chechnya the Security Council cannot take such a decision because Russia being a permanent member of the Security Council will veto any such move.

Reference may also be made to the four 1949 Red Cross Conventions which prohibit the attack on civilians. Russian forces and aircraft have been guilty of violation of these conventions. America and some other countries have expressed concern in this respect. Though such violations deserve condemnation by all, the fact remains that, as in the state field in the international field as well, it is difficult rather impossible to take action against the mighty ones. Though the principle of sovereign equality of states is enshrined in Article 2 of the U.N. Charter, in fact, states especially the mighty ones like Russia are unequal. This inequality also finds mention in the Charter itself because it confines veto on permanent members. Unless and until the international community finds alternative to veto, the world will have to learn to cope and learn to live with it.

Last but not the least, the principle of self determination, which is often invoked to challenge the territorial integrity of sovereign state, does not include a unilateral right to independence, or secession. Nor does the identity of different groups mean a right for members of these groups to dismember the state or destroy the fabric of the multi-cultural society. These conclusions have been drawn by a study prepared by the U.N. Human Rights Commission. Thus Chechnya rebels cannot successfully invoke the principle of self-determination.

(22) Pakistan's Intrusion in Kargil Area of Kashmir.

N.B. : For this please see Appendix II.

(23) Attack on America's World Trade Centre (11th September, 2001)

N.B. : For this also please see Appendix II.

(24) U.S.—North Korea Issue (2006)

N.B. : For this please see Appendix II.

CHAPTER 14

STATE JURISDICTION

Jurisdiction generally describes any authority over a certain area or certain persons. In the law jurisdiction refers to particular area containing a definite legal authority. Jurisdiction also refers to the origin of a Courts authority. Jurisdiction can also be used to define the proper Court in which to bring a particular case. Finally jurisdiction refers to the inherent authority of a Court to hear a case and to declare a judgment.

As pointed out by an author, "State jurisdiction is the power of a State under international law to govern persons and property by its municipal law. It includes both the power to prescribe rules (prescriptive jurisdiction) and the power to enforce them (enforcement jurisdiction). The latter includes both executive and judicial powers of enforcement. Jurisdiction may be concurrent with the jurisdiction of other States or it may be exclusive. It may be civil or criminal. The rules of State jurisdiction identify the persons and the property within the permissible range of a state's law and its procedures for enforcing that law. They are not concerned with the content of a State's law except in so far as it purports to subject a person to it or to prescribe procedures to enforce it." [1] State jurisdiction connotes "essentially the extent of each State's right to regulate conduct on the consequences of events." [2] A State may regulate its jurisdiction by legislation, through its courts or by taking executive or administrative action. State Jurisdiction concerns both international law and internal law of the State. While the former determines the permissible limits of a State's jurisdiction in the various forms it may take, the latter prescribes the extent to which, and manner in which, the State in fact asserts its jurisdiction.[3] Though the relationship between jurisdiction and sovereignty is close, jurisdiction is not co-extensive with State sovereignty.[4] Each State has normally jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territory.

Distinction between exercise of jurisdiction and basis of jurisdiction:*—"In general, every State has exclusive jurisdiction within its own territory, but this jurisdiction is not absolute, because it is subject to certain limitations imposed by international law." [5] Thus in practice it is not always necessary that a State may exercise jurisdiction in its territory; on the other hand, in some circumstances, a State may exercise jurisdiction outside its territory. Moreover, there is a distinction between the exercise and basis of jurisdiction. J.E.S. Fawcett[6] has explained this with the help of the following illustration. An Englishman and a German murder a French man in Paris and thereafter run away to England. So long as they are in France, they can be arrested and tried by French Courts for they have committed the murder in France and the fact that they are foreigners does not make any difference. The very fact of their presence in France gives jurisdiction to the French Courts over them. Neither Germany nor England can interfere in this although they may demand their extradition. When they come to England, the English Courts can try the Englishman but they cannot try the German although the German accused for the time being is within the jurisdiction of the English Courts. This is due to the fact that there is no basis for jurisdiction for English Courts cannot try a foreigner for having committed murder in some foreign State.

---

1. D.J. Harris, Cases and Materials on International Law (London, Sweet & Maxwell, 1973) p. 235.
2. Oppenheim's International Law, Vol. I, Ninth Edition, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Longman Group UK Limited and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, p. 456.
3. Ibid, at pp. 456-457.
4. Ibid, at p. 457.

* See also for P.C.S. (1957, Q. No. 2(a) ; IAS (2006) Q. 6(b).

5. J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations p.222.
6. J.E.S. Fawcett, The Law of Nations (1968) p. 55.

Almost the same rule is applicable in India. Reference may be made here to a Supreme Court case Central Bank of India v. Ram Narain,[7] wherein the Supreme Court considered the question whether Penal Code could be applied to a person who was not a citizen of India at the time of committing the offence. The Supreme Court observed : "A foreigner was not liable to be dealt with in British India for an offence committed outside British India under the provisions of the sections as they stood before the adaptations made in them after the partition in India. Illustration (a) to Section 4, I.P.C. delimits the scope of the section. It indicates the extent and ambit of this section. It runs as follows : '(a) A, a coolie, who is native Indian subject commits a murder in Uganda. He can be tried and convicted of murder in any place in British India in which he may be found. In the illustration, if A was not a native Indian subject at the time of the commission of the murder the provisions of Section 4, I.P.C. could not apply to the case. The circumstances, that after the commission of the offence a person becomes domiciled in another country, or acquires citizenship of that country cannot confer jurisdiction on courts of that territory retrospective for trying offences committed and completed at a time when that person was neither the national of that country nor was he domiciled there." [8]

Other Illustrations

(i) A French armed public ship flying the flag of France was in the British territorial waters when M, the Cabin boy of the ship, committed the offence of murder by shooting dead D, the captain of ship. Both M and D were British nationals serving at that time as members of the officer crew of the cruiser. Immediately after the incident the offices of a British police petrol launch were obtained and the injured was taken to the nearest British port to render medical help to the captain, if the doctors found that the life was not extinct. Extradition proceedings instituted by the French Government failed. M, who had been kept under arrest during extradition proceeding was released but arrested immediately thereafter for the murder committed within British territorial waters. During the trial that took place, M, pleaded that the British courts had no jurisdiction to try him for the murder committed on board a French cruiser flying French flag.* In this case the defence cannot succeed because the theory that the public ship of a State should be treated to be a floating portion of that State has long been discarded. Secondly, the offence was committed within the territory of Britain. Thirdly, seeking good offices of British police and medical aid, etc. amounted to a waiver of the immunity. Thus M could be tried by British courts.

(ii) A British subject was a member of the crew of a Chinese public ship. He murdered the captain on board the ship while in the territorial waters of Hong Kong. He then tried to commit suicide but failed. He was taken to a hospital in Hong Kong and (with the consent of the Chinese Government) was tried and convicted in a Hong Kong Court. On appeal to the Privy Council it was argued that the Hong Kong Court had no jurisdiction, over the accused as the public ship is extra-territorial and must, therefore, be considered a foreign territory. In this case also, the defence cannot succeed because firstly, accused was a British subject, secondly, he was tried with the consent of the Chinese Government. Thus the Chinese Government instead of claiming immunity from the jurisdiction, submitted to its jurisdiction. Lastly, the theory of extra-territoriality has long been discarded and cannot be accepted.

It may be noted here that the facts of the above illustration resemble those of Chung Chi Cheung v. The King.[9] The facts of this case are as follows :—

---

[7] AIR 1975 S.C. 36.

[8] Ibid, at pp. 38-39 ; The Supreme Court further observed : "........Ram Narain's domicile of origin was in the district of Multan and when the District of Multan fell by partition of India in Pakistan, Ram Narain had to be assigned Pakistan domicile till the time he expressed his unequivocal intention of giving up that domicile and acquiring Indian domicile and also took up his residence in India .... the decision of the High Court that Ram Narain could not be tried in any court in India for offences committed in Mailsi in November, 1947 is right and that the Provincial Government had no power under Section 188, Criminal Procedure Code to accord sanction to this prosecution." Ibid, at pp. 40-41.

* Asked in P.C.S. (1970), Q. No. 5.

 Asked in I.A.S. (1965) Q. No. 6(b) ; see also for C.S.E. (1995) Q. 7(c).

[9] (1939) A.C. 160.

Chung Chi Cheung was a British citizen, and was a cabin boy in a Chinese Armed Ship. On January 11, 1937, when the said ship reached the territorial waters of Hong Kong, Chung Chi Cheung shot dead the Captain of the ship and injured the Acting Chief Officer of the ship. Even in the wounded state, the Acting Chief Officer ordered the ship to be taken into the territorial waters of Hong Kong. When the ship reached Hong Kong, he called the police and got the cabin boy arrested. The Chinese authorities started the proceeding for the extradition of the accused but with no success because the accused was a British citizen. Consequently, immediately after the release of the accused he was re-arrested and was tried in the Court of Hong Kong. The Court sentenced him to death. The accused filed an appeal in the Privy Council against the said decision. In the Privy Council the appellant (accused) contended that the ship on which the crime was committed was the public property of the Chinese Government and in accordance with the principle of extra-territoriality the said ship should be treated as the floating part of the State of China. The Court of Hong Kong could have jurisdiction over such a ship only when the Government of China waived its immunity. He further contended that in the present case the Government of China had not waived its immunity or exemption. It was also contended by the appellant that the servants of the ship also have immunity from being tried in the court of another State and that the Acting Chief Officer of the ship was not entitled to waive this immunity. The Privy Council dismissed the appeal and held that the Court of Hong Kong had jurisdiction to try this case. The Privy Council observed that the principle of extra-territoriality was not correct. Lord Atkin observed that it was not proper to say that the public ship of a country is the floating part of that State. In his opinion, the correct view is that according to International Law the Court grants certain immunities or exemption to the ships and crew of another State. The said immunities are conditional and may be waived by the State concerned. In the present case the Chinese Government submitted to the jurisdiction of the court and as such it would be deemed to have waived its immunity. Instead of demanding immunities the Chinese Government sent four witnesses to give evidence against the accused.

Territorial Sovereignty

N.B.—For this please see also Chapter 9 entitled "Nature of State and Different kinds of States and Non-State Entities".

Subjective and objective Territorial Principles*

It has been rightly pointed out : "The term 'jurisdiction' refers to the legal competence of State officials to prescribe and enforce rules with regard to persons, things and events. By distinguishing between those situations in which a State may exercise its jurisdiction and those situations in which it may not, international law serves to clarify the authority of officials and to minimize friction among States. The essence of the distinction is contained in the concept of Sovereignty, the principal collaries of which are an exclusive jurisdiction over the territory of the State and a consulative duty of non-intervention in the area of exclusive jurisdiction of other States.'[10] As remarked by Lord Macmillan, "It is an essential attribute of the sovereignty of this realm, as of sovereign independent States, that it should possess jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits and in all causes, civil and criminal arising within its limits." In his dissenting opinion in the Lotus case[11], Judge J.B. Moore observed : "It is an admitted principle of international law that a nation possesses and exercise within its own territory an absolute and exclusive jurisdiction and that any exception to this right must be traced to the consent of the nation, either express or implied." But there are certain exceptions to this rule. For example, in Britain Courts have jurisdiction over British nationals in respect of treason, murder, bigamy, etc., wherever committed. Reference may also be made here to subjective and objective territorial principles.

Subjective Territorial principle.—This is regarded as the technical extension of the territorial principles. According to this principle, a State may claim jurisdiction over crimes commenced within its territory but completed or consummated outside its territory. The State where the crime commenced or was initiated may enact under its criminal law that it will have jurisdiction over such preparatory acts. Ordinarily, States do not exercise this type of jurisdiction. There are, however, certain situations wherein States where the crime commenced or was initiated, are under duty to punish the accused. This is provided for example, under the Geneva Convention for the Suppression of Counterfeiting of Currency (1929) and the Convention for the Supervision of the Illicit Drug Traffic (1936). State parties to these conventions have accepted this obligation so as to prevent commission of crime in other States.

---

* See for I.A.S. (1974), Q. No. 4.

[10] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 188

[11] P.C.L.J., Series A, No. 10 (1927), pp 68, 88.

Objective Territorial Principle.—According to this principle, a State gets jurisdiction over the crime, if any of the constituent elements of the crime is consummated in its territory. For the State concerned to assume jurisdiction it is also necessary that the act must have produced some harmful effect within or on the territory of State. Hyde has explained this principle in the following words : "The setting in motion outside of a State of a force which produces as a direct consequence an injurious effect therein justifies the territorial sovereign in prosecuting the actor when he enters its domain." In the S.S. Lotus case,[12] Judge Moore observed : "It appears to be now universally admitted that when a crime is committed in the territorial jurisdiction of one State as the direct result of the act of a person at the time corporeally present in another State, international Law, by reason of the constructive presence of the offender at the place where his act took effect, does not forbid the prosecution of the offender by the former State, should he come within its territorial jurisdiction." [13] The objective territorial principle is generally accepted and often applied. "But the objective territorial theory does not meet at the view of States which claim a universal competence for their criminal courts, and even if this claim is limited to a claim to try offences against nationals, it rests on a false view of the nature of the right of protecting nationals which international law recognizes ; States have a right to diplomatic protection, a right to demand reparation for injuries done to their nationals abroad, but not a right to throw the shield of their own criminal law round them at a time when they have left this shelter." [14]

Thus the jurisdiction of a State is not always a co-incident with its territory. As pointed out earlier, each State exercises jurisdiction over its territory. The sovereignty of that State is limited to that territory. But there are certain exceptions to this general rule. There may be certain circumstances wherein a State may exercise jurisdiction outside its geographical limits.

Extra-territorial operation of State Laws and protective Jurisdiction of State over Foreigners.—The law relating to extra-territorial operation of laws has been discussed and clarified in a Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court, namely, K.T.M.S. Abdul Cader and others v. Union of India.[15] The facts of this case are as follows :—

The petitioner was alleged to have been smuggling or dealing with smuggled goods. This led the Madras State to reasonably apprehend that unless they were detained forthwith they would continue to indulge in similar activities which may prove a hazard to safety and security of the country. Hence detention orders were passed first under section 3(i)(c) of the Maintenance of Internal Security (Amendment) Ordinance, 1974 and then, under the Conservation of Foreign Exchange and Prevention of Smuggling Activities Act, 1974 ; but the warrant of arrest under the said two Acts, could not be executed because the petitioners continued to live abroad. Therefore, at the instance of the State Government issued proclamations under S. 82 (1), Cr.P.C. on 2-12-1974 and S. 7(1) (c) of the Act of 1974, read with S. 82 (1) of the Cr.P.C. on 16-1-1975. Before the Madras High Court the principal point urged by the petitioners was that the Act has no extra-territorial application and hence the State Government has no power under the Act to pass orders of detention against persons who at the time when the orders were made, were not within [12] Lotus case, P.C.L.J., Series A, No. 10 (1927), pp. 68, 88.

---

[13] See also Rex v. Godfrey, (1932) 1 K.B. 24 (facts of this case have been discussed in Chapter on "Extradition") and Ford v. United States, 273 U.S. 593.

[14] J.L. Brierly, The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition, edited by Sir Humphrey Wadlock, (1963), pp. 301-302.

[15] AIR 1977 Mad 386 : 1977 Cri. L.J. 1708.

India but were outside its territorial limits. It may be noted here that in this case one of the petitioners was a foreign citizen. The Full Bench of the Madras High Court rejected the contention of the petitioners and dismissed the petition.[16] The Supreme Court[17] observed that it is well established that the power of the Parliament to make a law in relation to the topic entrusted to it is plenary, that a law passed by the Parliament under Article 245 cannot be invalidated merely on the ground it has extra territorial operation and that such a law cannot be questioned on the ground that it may not be found capable of enforcement outside its territories.[18] The Full Bench further observed that the words, 'extra-territorial operation' are used normally in two different senses as connoting firstly, laws in respect of acts and events which take place inside the State but have operation outside, and secondly, laws with reference to the national of a State in respect of their acts outside. In its former sense the laws are strictly speaking intra-territorial though loosely termed as extra-territorial under Article 245(1) which are clearly within the competence of the Parliament. Therefore, merely because the law enacted by the Parliament has extra-territorial consequences it cannot be invalidated as has been set out in Article 245(2) of the Constitution. Their Lordships quoted with approval the following observation of Oppenheim :[19] "Many States claim jurisdiction with regard to certain acts committed by a foreigner in foreign countries. States which claim jurisdiction of this kind threaten punishment for certain acts either against the State itself, such as high treason, foreign banknotes and the like, or against its citizens, such as murder and arson, libel and slander, and the like. These States cannot, of course, exercise this jurisdiction as long as the foreigner concerned remains outside their territory and comes thereby under their territorial jurisdiction, they have an opportunity of inflicting punishment." The Lordships[20] also referred the following observations from Greig's book.[21] The jurisdictional competence of a State under international law is in many respects ill-defined and the task of determining and explaining of the scope of international law in this field is complicated by the fact that the word 'jurisdiction' is itself used to denote at least two similar, though nevertheless distinct nations, firstly the competence of a Court of law to try a particular dispute, and secondly, the right of a state to control or interfere with a particular person or object, and there is considerable uncertainty as to how far a State can legislate with respect to and its courts decide issues arising out of events taking place entirely abroad. It cannot be doubted that there should be some link between either the offence or the offender and the State claiming jurisdiction and now close that link must be to satisfy the requirement of international law may be difficult to state with accuracy. The State's Sovereign powers including the power to make its laws cannot be limited unless it is prohibited by any international law or by agreement, it has agreed to curtail its jurisdiction. It is true that the territory and population being two essential characteristics of a Statehood and therefore it is natural that territorial supremacy and the bond of nationality should form the basis of the State's jurisdictional competence. There may, however, be other circumstances which can confer the jurisdictional competence on a State. Such circumstances are following :—

(1) Territorial jurisdiction based on the theory that incidents occurring in or persons residing within the territory of the State are subjects to its laws ;

(2) Personal jurisdiction based on the fact that a State has the right to extend the application of its laws to its nationals even with respect to events occurring entirely abroad ;

(3) Universal jurisdiction based on the principle that any State may exercise jurisdiction over a crime committed such as piracy whatever the nationality of the perpetrators ;

---

[16] K.T.M.S. Abdul Cader and others v. Union of India, AIR 1977 Mad 386 at pp. 394-396.
[17] Ibid, at p. 394.
[18] See also British Columbia Ele. Rly Co. v. King, A.I.R. 1946 P.C. 180.
[19] International Law, 8th Edn., Vol. I, at p. 331, para 147.
[20] A.I.R. 1977 Mad. 386 at p. 395.
[21] Greig, Treatise on International Law, pp. 164, 167.

(4) Protective jurisdiction—war crimes etc., under which the States are allowed to punish a foreign national by a State, the safety or public order which has been jeopardised by acts committed by persons outside its territory ; and

(5) Jurisdiction based on passive personality principle which enables a State to exercise jurisdiction over a foreigner in respect of an incident taking place abroad resulting in an injury to one of its nationals.

It may be noted that a State cannot exercise its power in any form in the territory of another State except by virtue of a permissive rule derived from international custom or from a convention.[22] In the Lotus case,[23] the Permanent Court of International Justice has observed—"the first and foremost restriction imposed by international law upon a State is that failing the existence of a permissive rule to the contrary it may not exercise its power in any form in the territory of another State. In this sense jurisdiction is certainly territorial ; it cannot be exercised by state outside its territory except by virtue of a permissive rule derived from International custom or from a convention. This discretion left to States by International law explains the great variety of rules which they have been able to adopt without objection or complaints on the part of the other States."

Thus a State may very well exercise civil or criminal jurisdiction over its nationals even with respect to their conduct outside its territory.[24] After reviewing the above authorities the Madras High Court[25] observed .... though a State's jurisdiction is mainly territorial, its jurisdiction can extend in respect of things or acts, done by its nationals even outside its territories. It has also jurisdiction which may properly be called protective jurisdiction to deal with a foreign national whose acts have jeopardised or are about to jeopardise its safety or public order. The protective principle on the basis of which a State exercises its jurisdiction over foreigners for its own preservation is recognized in the international law. If such a protective jurisdiction is not given to a sovereign State, its stability and existence itself can be shaken by acts or things done by foreigners outside its territory and the State will be powerless to do anything against them Therefore, it should be taken to be the basic right of any State to protect itself from such prejudicial acts done by foreigners outside the State by dealing with them in any manner they like. It may be that any action taken by the State against a foreigner some times is ineffective so long as the foreigner is outside its territory. But merely on that ground, the action taken cannot be said to be invalid as the jurisdiction of the State to take action against a foreigner mainly depends upon its competency and not upon its effective execution. The jurisdiction to pass an order is different from the power to execute or effectuate that order. The fact that a foreigner cannot be proceeded against by a State so long as he is outside its power to exercise jurisdiction over foreigners invoking the protective principles."

In G.B. Singh v. Government of India,[26] the Supreme Court has recognised this protective jurisdiction of a State and observed : "The first duty of a State is to survive. To do so it has got to deal with enemies both overt and covert whether they be inside the country or outside. The fact that the appellant if released would go to England and from there continue to indulge in activities prejudicial to the security and integrity of this country is a relevant factor in determining whether he could be detained in this country when he is found in country."

The difference between power to pass a detention order and its effective enforcement has also been touched upon in the above decision in the following passage. "We are aware that there is no law in this country providing for extradition of persons against whom the country would consider it necessary to pass an order of preventive detention. It is not to be assumed that this country will indulge in such a useless and pointless exercise. But that is quite different from saying that there cannot be a law in this country providing for such detention. But if such a person happens to come to this country, we presume he can be detained. We do not accept the argument that a person like the appellant could be detained only if it is apprehended that if not detained he would indulge in prejudicial activities in this country and not if his activities are outside this country even though they may have a prejudicial effect on this country. Take the case of a person acting prejudicial to the security of a State in this country while residing in another State. We have no doubt that he can be detained by the former State. The same analogy applies to this case. International law does not seem to deal with the case of nationals of one country acting in that country to the prejudice of the security and integrity of another country and whether anything could be done about them."

---

[22] Max Sorensen, Manual of Public International Law, page 335, paragraphs 6, 23.

[23] P.C.I.J. Series A, No. 10 at pp. 18-19 referred in Ibid.

[24] See note 22.

[25] A.I.R. 1977 Mad. 386 at p. 396.

[26] A.I.R. 1973 S.C. 2667 : (1973) Cr.L.J. 1801.

After quoting the above observation of the Supreme Court, the Madras High Court finally observed : "Though as pointed out in the above passage, International Law does not directly deal with the case of nationals of one country acting in that country to the prejudice of the security and integrity of another country, it definitely recognizes the protective jurisdiction of one State to deal with foreign nationals acting in their country against its security and integrity."

Some exceptions of the exercise of Jurisdiction*

(1) Diplomatic agents.—Diplomatic agents enjoy certain privileges and immunities. They are immune from the jurisdiction of the civil and criminal courts of the receiving State. In this connection the old view was that the diplomatic agents enjoy these immunities and privileges because they were deemed to be outside the jurisdiction of the receiving State. In the present time this theory has been discarded. According to the modern view, diplomatic agents enjoy certain immunities and privileges because of the special functions they perform. This was affirmed in a case Ex-parte Petroff (1971) by the Supreme Court of Australia. The facts of this case have been mentioned in chapter on "Diplomatic Agents". Oppenheim also subscribes to this view.

(2) Foreign embassies.—Foreign embassies are often considered to be outside the jurisdiction of the State in which they are situated. For sake of convenience, embassies are to be treated a part of their home States. The correct view, however, is that though not part of their home States, embassies enjoy certain immunities because of the special functions performed by the diplomatic agents.

(3) *Foreign sovereigns.—Foreign sovereigns are often treated to be outside the jurisdiction of other States and possess many privileges and immunities. This is based upon the principle that one sovereign cannot exercise jurisdiction over another sovereign. In the case of Christina[27] Lord Wright observed, "there are general principles of international law according to which a sovereign state is held to be immune from the jurisdiction of another Sovereign State ....the rule may be said to be based on the principle of par in Parem Non habit Imperium, no state can claim jurisdiction over another state." This rule is subject to waiver by the consent of sovereign who may desire a legal adjudication of his rights. No such writ can be upheld against the sovereign state unless it consents. The principle of immunity of Foreign Sovereigns was developed in the early years of the nineteenth century. According to this principle vast immunities and exemptions were granted to the foreign sovereigns and foreign States. In the case of the Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, (1812),[28] a French Naval Vessel stayed in Philadelphia for repairs after a storm. Some persons sought possession of the ship on the ground that in reality the ship was Schooner Exchange, an American ship which they owned and was seized by France on the High Seas in 1810 in pursuance of a Napoleonic Decree. The U.S. Government however requested the Court to refuse jurisdiction on the ground of Sovereign immunity. The Court held that the vessel was exempt from U.S. jurisdiction. Marshall, C.J. of the U.S. Supreme Court expounded the principle of sovereign immunity in the following words :

> "The jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself .... This full

---

* See for I.A.S. (1969), Q. No. 5 ; I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 2.

 See for I.A.S. (1970), Q. No. 2 ; I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 2 ; I.A.S. (1965) Q. No. 6(c) ; P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 6 ; See also for I.A.S. (1977), Q. No. 4 ; C.S.E. (1985) Q. No. 6(a).

[27] (1938) A.C. 485.

[28] (1812) 7 Cranch 116.

and absolute territorial jurisdiction being alike the attribute of every sovereign, and being incapable of conferring extra-territorial powers, would not seem to contemplate foreign sovereigns nor their sovereign rights, as its subjects. One sovereign being in no respect amenable to another, and being a bound by obligations of the highest character not to degrade the dignity of his nation, by placing himself or its sovereign rights within the jurisdiction of another, can be supposed to enter a foreign territory only under an express license, or in the confidence that the immunities belonging to his independent sovereign station, though not expressly stipulated, are reserved by implication and will be extended to him".

In Vavasseur v. Krupp[29] the plaintiff contended that the Japanese Government had violated his patent rights and therefore he demanded that the delivery of the goods by it be stopped. But the Court held that it had no jurisdiction over the property of the foreign sovereigns "more especially with what we call the public property of the State of which he is sovereign".

Similarly in Parliament Belge,[30] it was held that the British Courts have no jurisdiction over the person and property of the foreign sovereigns. In this case, the Parliament Belge was a Belgium mail vessel and was also used for commercial purposes. It collided with a British ship and owners of the ship had filed a case in the Admiralty Division demanding compensation. It was held that court has no jurisdiction over the Parliament Belge. Neither the sovereign of Great Britain nor any friendly sovereign can be impleaded in any of courts of Britain. The mere fact that the ship being used subordinately and partially for trading purposes will not take away the sovereign immunity.

In Mighell v. Sultan of Johore,[31]* the Sultan of Johore, during his stay in England, promised to marry the plaintiff. When the said promise was not fulfilled, the plaintiff filed a case for the breach of the promise. The Sultan of Johore contended that he was a sovereign of a foreign sovereign State who had not submitted to the jurisdiction of the court and as such the court could not have jurisdiction over him. The court accepted his contention and decided in his favour. Lord Esher, M.R. of the Court of Appeal held : "If it is shown that he is an independent sovereign, and does not submit to the jurisdiction, the court has no jurisdiction over him. It follows from this that there can be no inquiry by the court into his conduct prior to that date." His Lordship referred the following observation made by the Court in The Parliament Belge : "The principle .... is that, as a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority, and of the international comity which induces every sovereign State to respect the independence and dignity of every other sovereign State, each and every one declines to exercise by means of its courts any of its jurisdiction over the person of any sovereign or ambassador of any other State, or over the public property of any State which is destined to public use, or over the property of any ambassador, though such sovereign, ambassador, or property be within its territory, and therefore, but for the common agreement, subject to its jurisdiction." [32] [29] (1878) 9 Ch. D. 351.

---

[30] (1880) 5 P.D. 197.

[31] (1894) 1 Q.B. 149.

* C.S.E. (1994) Q. 7(b) ; see also for C.S.E. (1995) Q.7 (b).

[32] Other Illustrations :— (i) X, a Muslim ruler of State in Malayasia is sued by an Indian Muslim girl in Delhi for breach of promise to marry when X was holidaying in Delhi. In this case X can take the plea of his sovereign immunity that he is not subject to the jurisdiction of the court. As held in Mighell v. Sultan of Johore, (1894) discussed above, the Court cannot exercise jurisdiction. [This problem was asked in P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 6; (ii) The Pakistan Government entered into contract with a foreign Government for the purchase of military equipment which provided that its interpretation should be governed by English law and stated that the Government agreed 'to submit, for the purposes of the agreement, to the jurisdiction of the English courts'. Yet when the dispute arose, the Pakistan Government objected to the jurisdiction of the English Court, saying that its waiver was not express, not made in the face of the court, and therefore, ineffective. [Asked in I.A.S. (1965), Q. No. 6(c)]. The objection of Pakistan is valid. Immunity is to be claimed at the time when the question arises in the court and as held in Mighell v. Sultan of Johore. "......... there can be no inquiry by the court into his conduct prior to that date." See also for I.A.S. (1977), Q. No. 4(i)] ; for this see also Anglo-Iranian Oil Company case, I.C.J. Rep. (1952), p. 93.

The principle laid down in Mighell v. Sultan of Johore, was finally approved by the House of Lords in Duff Development Co. Ltd. v. Government of Kelantan.[33] The facts of Duff Development Co. Ltd. v. Government of Kelantan are as follows :—

In 1912, the Government of Kelantan granted certain concessions to the appellant in respect of digging mines. etc. The instrument under which these concessions were granted also provided for arbitration in case of a dispute. In 1921, a dispute was entrusted to an arbitrator who gave his award in favour of the Company (appellant). The respondent (i.e. the Government of Kelantan) had filed a case to get the said award invalidated, but the case was dismissed by the Court. This decision was approved by the House of Lords. Thereafter in 1922, the appellant-Company filed a case in the King's Bench of England requesting the Court for enforcing the said award, and the Court thereupon issued a garnishee order, but later on this order was declared null and void because the Government of Kelantan was independent sovereign State. The Court of Appeal approved this decision. Therefore, the appellant-Company filed an appeal against the said order in the House of Lords.

The British Foreign Office informed the Court that despite the above agreement British Government had recognised the Sultan of Kelantan as an independent sovereign State and the British Crown neither exercises nor claims sovereignty and jurisdiction over Kelantan.

The House of Lords decided in favour of the Government of Kelantan and dismissed the appeal of the appellant company. Thus the Court held that the Government of Kelantan was a sovereign State and could not be impleaded. The Court also observed that it is the duty of the Court to accept the statement of Secretary of State which if clearly and positively made, is conclusive upon the point of status of a foreign State. Rahimtoola v. Nizam of Hyderabad,[34] also deserves a mention in this connection.

But if the person concerned who claims immunity is ex or former or deposed sovereign, he will not be entitled to get immunity. Immunity can be granted only when the country where the suit has been filed regards him as Foreign Sovereign. If he is not regarded as foreign sovereign and is former sovereign or deposed King, the courts will not grant immunity. This is clear from the following illustration—

The deposed King of Afghanistan while living in exile in England proposes to marry an English lady. Later on he changed his mind and refused to marry. The lady brings a suit against him for breach of promise to marriage. The defendant contends that the court has no jurisdiction over him as he was the sovereign of an independent state, and that he has not submitted himself to the jurisdiction of an English Court.*

Immunity is given to the existing foreign sovereign. A deposed sovereign is not entitled to claim immunity. The position, however, will be different if England still regards him as foreign sovereign.

(4) *Immunity in respect of public property of Foreign Sovereign State.—Like the person of foreign sovereign, the property of the sovereign or the public property of the State also receives certain immunities and exemptions from the exercise of jurisdiction. In the Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon (1812), Marshall, C.J. observed that it is a principle of public law "that national ships of war, entering the port of a friendly power open for their reception, are to be considered as exempt by the consent of that power from its jurisdiction." In some countries, distinction is made between sovereign and commercial acts. For example, in America a foreign sovereign is not entitled to any exemption or immunity when engaged in commercial functions. This was held in Ohio v. Helvering.[35] It is, however, difficult to determine as to whether a particular act is commercial or not. In

---

33. (1924), A.C. 797.

34. (1958), A.C. 379; See also Dollfus Mieget Compagnie S.A. v. Bank of England, (1950) 1 All E.R. 747.

* C.S.E. (1987) Q. 6(b) (ii).

 See also for I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 2 ; C.S.E. (1985) Q. (a).

35. 293 U.S. 360.

this connection, it is worth remembering that many countries have nationalised industries and trades. Hence, classification of commercial functions is a matter of great importance. According to Prof. W. Friedmann,[36] in this connection, three views are prevalent—

(a) All that property which is owned by State is entitled to immunity. This view is followed in England and Krajina v. Tass Agency,[37] and Rahimtoola v. Nizam of Hyderabad,[38] deserve mention in this connection.

(b) According to the second view, this immunity is not absolute and it has certain limitation. It depends upon the type of the act. But it is difficult to determine as to whether a particular act is a sovereign act or not.

(c) According to the third view, immunity depends upon the nature of the function. In accordance with this rule, those ships which are owned by the State and perform commercial functions, are treated equivalent to private ships during peace times.

It may be noted here that "………the absolute theory of sovereign immunity is no longer to be considered sacrosant.[39] In Thai-Europe Tapioca Service Ltd. v. Govt. of Pakistan,[40] the Court of Appeal held that a foreign sovereign has "no immunity when it enters into a commercial transaction with a trader here, and a dispute arises which is properly within the territorial jurisdiction of our courts." [41] Similarly a foreign sovereign has no immunity in respect of debts incurred in England for services rendered to foreign property situated in England. Almost the same view was taken by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Owners of the Ship Philippine Admiral v. Wallem Shipping (Hong Kong) Ltd. and Others.[42] In The State of Kerala v. K. Cheru Babu,[43] the Division Bench of the Kerala High Court observed : "The doctrine of absolute immunity never formed part of classical law. Neither Grotius nor Bynkershoek nor Vattel accepted the doctrine in its absolute form. Nor does it find acceptance in modern jurisprudence. The doctrine is now confined to narrow regions, namely, (a) the immunity of a foreign State from the jurisdiction of the local courts in regard to acts jure imperi (non-commercial activities of State in its sovereign capacity) as distinguished from acts jure gestionis (commercial activities of State) ; and (b) the immunity of a State from the jurisdiction of its own courts in regard to acts of State and matters arising from military operations. The principle of State immunity—Whether of the territorial State or of the foreign State—is a survival of the period when the Sovereign was considered to be above the law. This is no longer the position." As remarked by Steven M. Schneebaum,[44] "Two United Kingdom decisions (i.e. the above mentioned two decisions) show the law of sovereign immunity to be undergoing rapid and perhaps dramatic change in a nation not long ago described as 'the only country that persists in the systematic adherence to the archaic view of absolute immunity." [45] What is even more important, however, and not least for its political and diplomatic implications, is the court's treatment of the rationale of the law. The role of the foreign sovereign in British jurisprudence is not what it once was and yet the change, even if a desirable and progressive one, seems based upon principles that are eminently in need of further clarification. Thus it may safely be concluded "that there is a definite trend towards

---

36. Law in a Changing Society (First Indian Reprint, 1970), pp. 325-26.
37. (1949) 2 All E.R. 274.
38. (1957) 3 All E.R. 441.
39. Steven M. Schneebaum, "Sovereign Immunity : The End of Absolution" IJIL Vol. 16 (1976), p. 267 at p. 274.
40. (1975) 3 All E.R. 961.
41. Ibid, at p. 966.
42. (1976) 1 All E.R. 71 at p. 95.
43. A.I.R. 1978 Ker. 43 at pp. 48-49.
44. See supra note 39, at p. 267.
45. See generally Sucharitkul, State Immunities and Trading Activities in International Law, 1959, p. 256; M.K. Nawaz : The Problem of Jurisdictional Immunities of Foreign States with particular reference to Indian State Practice, IJIL, (1962), p. 164.

a general acceptance, in the western world of restrictive theory of sovereign immunity in the context of commercial activities."[46]

Reference may be made here to United Nations Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and their Property adopted by the U.N. General Assembly on 2 December, 2004. Article 1 of the convention states the scope of the convention. It says that the present convention applies to the immunity of a State and its property from the jurisdiction of the courts of another State. Article 5 of the convention provides that a State enjoys immunity, in respect of itself and its property, from the jurisdiction of the courts of another State subject to the provisions of the present convention. Article 6 further provides that a State shall give effect to state immunity under Article 5 by refraining from exercising jurisdiction in a proceeding before its courts against another State and to that end shall ensure that its courts determine on their own initiative that the immunity of that other State under Article 5 is respected.

It may be noted here that the convention was offered for signature for States in January, 2005. Only 13 countries have so far become parties to the convention. For the convention to come into force it is necessary for 30 countries to sign and ratify it. As of 7 May, 2013, 28 countries have signed the Convention.

Exceptions of the above rule

(i) Express consent to exercise jurisdiction.—A State cannot invoke immunity from jurisdiction in a proceeding before a court of another State with regard to a matter or case if it has expressly consented to the exercise of jurisdiction by the court with regard to the matter or case :

(a) by international agreement; or

(b) in a written contract; or

(c) by a declaration before the court or by a written communication in a special proceeding.[47]

(ii) Effect of Participation in a Proceeding before a Court.—A State cannot invoke immunity from jurisdiction in a proceeding before a court of another State if it has :

(a) itself instituted the proceeding; or

(b) intervened in the proceeding, or taken any other step relating to the merits. However, if the State satisfies the court that it could not have acquired knowledge of facts on which a claim of immunity can be based until after it took such a step, it can claim immunity on those facts, provided it does so at the earliest possible moment.

Further, a State shall not be considered to have consented to the exercise of jurisdiction by a court of another State if it intervenes in a proceeding or takes any other step for the sole purpose of :

(a) invoking immunity; or

(b) asserting a right or interest in property at issue in the proceeding.[48]

(iii) Commercial Transactions.—If a State engages in a commercial transaction with a foreign natural or juridical person and, by virtue of the applicable rules of private international law, differences relating to the commercial transaction fall within the jurisdiction of a court of another State, the State cannot invoke immunity from that jurisdiction in a proceeding arising out of that commercial transaction.

---

[46] A.O. Adebe, "The Doctrine of Sovereign Immunity under National Commercial Law : An Observation on Recent Trends", IJIL, Vol. 17 (1977), p. 245 at p. 259 ; See also Trendtex Trading Corporation v. Central Bank of Nigeria, (1977) 1 All E.R. pp. 881-911. See also Victory Transport Inc. v. Comisaria General De Abaste Cimentos Y. Transporters, 381 U.S. 934 (1965) : 35 I.L.R. 110 ; Dralle v. Rep. of Czechoslovakia, International Law Reports, 17 (1950), p. 155 (Sup. Ct. of Austria 1950).

[47] Article 7 of U.N. Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities on States and their Property (2004).

[48] Article 8.

The above provision is contained in Article 10 of the convention. But Article 10 adds that Paragraph 1 (i.e. the above paragraph) does not apply :

(a) in the case of a commercial transaction between states; or

(b) if the parties to the commercial transaction have expressly agreed otherwise.[49]

(iv) Contracts of employment.—Para 1 of Article 11 provides that unless otherwise agreed between the States concerned, a State cannot invoke immunity from jurisdiction before a court of another State which is otherwise competent in a proceeding which relates to a contract of employment between the State and an individual for work performed or to be performed, in whole or in part, in the territory of that other State. But as made clear in Para 2 of Article 11, Para 1 does not apply if :

(a) the employee has been recruited to perform particular functions in the exercise of governmental authority;

(b) the employee is :

  (i) a diplomatic agent;

  (ii) a consular officer;

  (iii) a member of the diplomatic staff of a permanent mission to an international organisation or of a special mission, or is recruited to represent a State at an international conference; or

  (iv) any other person enjoying diplomatic immunity;

(c) the subject matter of the proceeding is the recruitment, renewal of employment or reinstatement of an individual.

(d) the subject-matter of the proceeding is the dismissal or termination of employment of an individual and, as determined by the head of State, the head of Government or the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the employer State, such a proceeding would interfere with the security interests of that State;

(e) the employee is a national of the employer State at the time when the proceeding is instituted unless this person has the permanent residence in the State of the forum or

(f) the employer State and the employee have otherwise agreed in writing subject to any considerations of public policy conferring on the courts of the State of the forum exclusive jurisdiction by reason of the subject-matter of the proceeding.[50]

(v) Personal injuries and damage to property.—Unless otherwise agreed between States concerned, a State cannot invoke immunity from jurisdiction before a court of another State which is otherwise competent in a proceeding which relates to pecuniary compensation for death or injury to the person, or damage to or loss of tangible property, caused by an act or omission which is alleged to be attributable to the State, if the act or omission occurred in whole or in part in the territory of that other State and if the author of the act or omission was present in that territory at the time of the act or omission.[51]

(vi) Ownership, possession and use of property.—Unless otherwise agreed between States concerned, a State cannot invoke immunity before a court of another State which is otherwise competent in a proceeding which relates to the determination of :

---

[49] Article 10.

[50] Article 11.

[51] Article 12.

(a) any right or interest of the State in, or its possession or use of, or any obligation of the State arising out of its interest in, or its possession or use of immovable property situated in the State of the forum;

(b) any right or interest of the State in movable or immovable property arising by way of succession, gift or bona vocantia; or

(c) any right or interest of the State in the administration of property, such as trust property, the estate of a bankrupt or the property of a company in the event of winding up.[52]

(vii) Intellectual and Industrial Property.—Unless otherwise agreed between the States concerned, a State cannot invoke immunity from jurisdiction before a court of another State which is otherwise competent in a proceeding which relates to :

(a) the determination of any right of the State in a patent, industrial design, trade name or business name, trademark, copyright or any other form of intellectual or industrial property which enjoys a measure of legal protection, even if provisional, in the State of the forum; or

(b) an alleged infringement by the State, in the territory of the State of the forum, of a right of the nature mentioned in sub-paragraph (a) which belongs to a third person and is protected in the State of the forum.[53]

(viii) Participation in Companies or other collective bodies.—A State cannot invoke immunity from jurisdiction before a court of another State which is otherwise competent in a proceeding which relates to its participation in a company or other collective body, whether incorporated or unincorporated being a proceeding concerning the relationship between the State and the body or the other participants therein, provided that the body :

(a) has participants other than States or international organisations; and

(b) is incorporated or constituted under the law of the State of the forum or has its seat or principal place of business in that State.[54]

(ix) Ships owned or operated by a State.—Para 1 of Article 16 provides that unless otherwise agreed between the States concerned, a State which owns or operates a ship cannot invoke immunity from jurisdiction before a court of another State which is otherwise competent in a proceeding which relates to the operation of that ship, at the time cause of action arose, the ship was used for other than government non-commercial purposes.

But para 1 as noted above does not apply to warships, or naval auxiliaries, nor does it apply to other vessels owned or operated by a State and used, for the time being, only on government non-commercial purposes.

(x) State Immunity from measures of constraint in connection with proceeding before a court.—U.N. Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property (2004) also provides for State immunity from pre-judgment measures of constraint[55] as well as from post-judgment measures of constraint.[56]

The convention also provides that it shall be open for signature by all States until 17 January, 2007 at United Nations Headquarters, New York.

The convention would enter into force thirty days after the deposit of instrument of ratification by 30th Country. As of 7 May 2013, 28 countries had signed and 13 countries had ratified the convention.

---

[52] Article 13.

[53] Article 14.

[54] Article 15.

[55] Article 18.

[56] Article 19.

The position of enforcement jurisdiction under English law, which more or less corresponds to Indian law, may be summarised as follows[57] :—

(i) Under international law, there is a distinction between immunity from adjudicative jurisdiction and enforcement jurisdiction of the forum state.

(ii) Such a distinction is recognized under English law and the State Immunity Act, 1978 provides different rules for immunity from execution.

(iii) International law permits waiver of immunity by a State from execution. So is also the case under English law and the opening of a special account or written authorization by State that funds should be placed in a special account to meet commercial creditor's claims constitutes such a waiver.

(iv) As regards enforcement jurisdiction, English law gives effect to it by a ruling that bank account of a State to meet the running expenses of a diplomatic mission is immune from enforcement measures.

(v) Despite the fact that international law permits a limited exercise of enforcement measures against a foreign State, the provisions of the said 1978 Act and the judgment creditor's onus of proof defeat such limited measures.

(vi) Without directly seeking the Amendment of 1978 Act, several methods may be found to ensure a wider power of attachment for commercial judgment debts. For example, the creditor may seek security of his commercial transactions with the State requiring the guarantee of a State trading entity.

(5) International Organisations.—International Organisations also enjoy certain immunities and privileges from the jurisdiction of the States in which they are situated. For example, the United Nations International Labour Organisation, and other specialized agencies enjoy several privileges and immunities. For the purposes of granting privileges and immunities to the U.N. a convention known as the Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the United Nations was entered into. Reference may also be made here to the Act No. XLVI of 1947 to give effect to the Convention on the Privileges and immunities of the Union passed by the Dominion Legislature of India.[58]

Reference may also be made here to the U.N. Convention on Jurisdictional Immunities of States and Their Property. This convention was opened for signature on 17 January, 2005. Austria and Morocco became the first countries to sign the convention. It will enter into force when 30 states have deposited instruments of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession. So far only 13 countries have ratified it.

(6) Extradition Treaties.—Under the provisions of the extradition treaties, the persons who run away from their country after committing crimes may be extradited. That is to say, the State where they have committed certain crimes may ask the State where the accused is for the time being to return him so that he could be prosecuted and punished according to the law of the land. Thus in respect of such persons also, State may exercise some sort of jurisdiction even outside its territory.

---

[57] See Hazel Fox, "Enforcement Jurisdiction : Foreign State Property and Diplomatic Immunity", I.C.L.Q., Vol. 34 (1985) p. 115 at pp. 140-141.

[58] According to Article I of the Schedule annexed to the Act., the United Nations shall possess juridical personality. It shall have the capacity : (a) to contract ; (b) to acquire and dispose of immovable and movable property ; (c) to institute legal proceedings. (Section 1). Article II provides : The United Nations, its property and assets wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall enjoy immunity from every form of legal process except in so far as in any particular case it has expressly waived its immunity. It is, however, understood that no waiver of immunity shall extend to any measure of execution (Section 2). The premises of the U.N. shall be inviolable (Section 3). Articles III, IV, VI, VII and VIII deal with Facilities of Communications, the Representatives of Members, Officials, Experts of Missions For the U.N., United Nations Laiseez Passer, and Settlement of Disputes, respectively.

(7) Foreign Troops.—As pointed out by Marshall, C.J. in The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon,[59] "a sovereign is understood to cede a portion of his territorial jurisdiction where he allows the troops of a foreign prince to pass through his dominions." The grant of free passage therefore implies a waiver of all jurisdictions over the troops during their passage and permits the foreign army authorities to exercise jurisdiction upon the army personnel to maintain discipline and to inflict those punishments which the government of his army may require.

(8) Immunity of warship and their crew.—Under international law warships enjoy a great measure of immunity. Warships are immune from legal process, execution or jurisdictional measures of foreign authorities. This immunity is applicable to the commander of the crew as well as to the ship itself. This immunity is not lost for acts of State (i.e. official acts) even if they are illicit (but not including crimes under international law). The home state of the warship will be responsible for its acts. Last but not the least, no immunity will be available if the warship, its commander or crew intrudes in a foreign country in disguise and/or under false pretences. In such a case the warship may be termed a 'spy' and may then be liable to confiscation and the legal process of the aggrieved coastal state.[60] The immunity of warship, even for illicit activities, "rests on the principle par in parem non habet imperium, i.e., no State can sit in judgment of another State .... even if foreign warships have acted contrary to international law by engaging in 'spy' missions in peacetime, the members of the crew have still acted as State agents and are, as such, immune to legal process in municipal courts. Retaliatory action for their activities must be directed against the sending ship itself and the sending State. The acts of the 'spy' ship have engaged the responsibility of that State, activating far-reaching rights of self-defence against the ship, as well as further retaliation and entitlement to reparation." [61]

Exercise of jurisdiction in case of collision of ships on high sea.*— In case of collision of two ships in the high seas, jurisdiction is ordinarily exercised by the State whose flag flies on the ship. However, on the basis of extra-territoriality that State which has been affected by the said collision may also exercise jurisdiction. The leading case on the point is S.S. Lotus.[62] This matter has been discussed in detail below in connection with the criminal jurisdiction in international law.

Criminal Jurisdiction in International Law

There are several views prevalent in connection with the criminal jurisdiction in international law. There is great controversy among the States in this connection. Following are the three main views prevalent in this connection :

(1) According to the first view, each State can exercise criminal jurisdiction within its territory. This theory is popularly known as the theory of territoriality of criminal jurisdiction. This theory has been supported by Great Britain, America and some other States. These States subscribe to the view that each State is entitled to exercise criminal jurisdiction only within its territory.

(2) The second view is also known as the theory of territoriality, but it admits certain exceptions to this general theory. France, Germany, etc. are its chief supporters. These States have accepted the theory of territoriality with certain modifications. According to them, a State may exercise criminal jurisdiction even outside its territory on the basis of the national security and on economic grounds.

---

[59] (1812) 7 Cranch 116, See also G.P. Barton, "Foreign Armed Forces : Immunity from Criminal Jurisdiction", BYBIL, Vol. XXVII (1950), p. 186.

[60] Ingrid Delupis, "Foreign Warships and Immunity For Espionage", AJIL, Vol. 78 (1984) p. 53 at p. 71.

[61] Ingrid Delupis, "Foreign Warships and Immunity For Espionage", AJIL, Vol. 78 (1984) p. 53, at p. 75.

* See also for P.C.S. (1990) Q. 10(a).

[62] (1927) P.C.I.J. Series A, No. 10.

 See also for C.S.E. (1991) Q. 5 (d).

(3) The third theory is popularly known as the theory of extra-territoriality. Turkey, Italy, etc. are its chief supporters. According to this theory, crime is a social evil and it is in the interest of whole international community to ensure that the criminals get due punishment. In international field, there are many such matters in which the States exercise criminal jurisdiction even outside their territory.

The leading case on the point is S.S. Lotus[63] decided by the Permanent Court of International Justice in 1927. Facts of the case and principles laid down are discussed below.

*S.S. Lotus.—A Turkish ship named Bozkourt collided with the French ship S.S. Lotus. In consequence of this collision certain Turkish national died. After the collision the French ship S.S. Lotus reached the Turkish port, Constantinopole. The Turkish Government arrested French national and the officers of the ship and started criminal proceedings against them in accordance with Turkish Law. They were held guilty and convicted by the Court. The French Government lodged a strong protest against this. Thereupon the Government of France and Turkey agreed to refer this matter to the Permanent Court of International Justice. The Permanent Court of International Justice propounded the following principles in this connection :—

(1) Though it is true that in all systems of law the principle of the territorial character of criminal law is fundamental, it is equally true that all or nearly all of these systems of law extend their action to offences committed outside the territory of the State which adopts them, and they do so in ways which vary from State to State. The territoriality by criminal law, therefore, is not an absolute principle of international law and by no means coincides with territorial sovereignty.

(2) That there is no rule of international law in regard to collision cases to the effect that criminal proceedings are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the State whose flag is flown.

Judge Moore who gave dissenting opinion agreed with the majority of the court, "............. it appears to be now universally admitted that where a crime is committed in the territorial jurisdiction of one State as the direct result of the act of a person at the time corporeally present in another State, international law, by reason of the principle of constructive presence of the offender at the place where his act took effect, does not forbid the prosecution of the offender by the former State, should he come within its territorial jurisdiction."

The Court, therefore, ruled that by prosecuting and punishing French national and the officers on the board of the ship, the Turkish government did not act contrary to the rules of international law. It may, therefore, be concluded that even those countries which subscribe to the theory of extra-territoriality define offences in such a way that it is deemed to have committed within their territory if its effect falls upon their territory or if any of its elements is present in their territory.

Thus, "The theory of territoriality for application of criminal law is not an absolute principle of international law and this by no means coincides with territorial sovereignty.

It may, however, be noted that the decision in this case has become obsolete as regards collision cases because Article 11 (1) of the Geneva Convention on the High Seas, 1958[64] provides·: "In the event of collision or any other incident of navigation concerning a ship on the high seas, involving the penal or disciplinary responsibility of the master of or any other person in the service of the ship, no penal or disciplinary proceeding, may be instituted against such persons except before the judicial or administrative authorities either of the flag State or of the State of which such person is a national." This provision without any change finds mention in Art. 97(1) of U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982. A similar provision was earlier made in Brussels Convention of 10 May, 1952, relating to criminal jurisdiction in matters of collisions or other accidents of navigation.

---

[63] (1927) P.C.I.J. Series A, No. 10.

* See also for IAS (1975), Q. No. 5(c) ; IAS (1957), Q. No. 6(a) ; PCS (1966) Q. No. 10(d) ; PCS (1983) Q. 10 (g) ; see also for C.S.E. (1993) Q. 7(c) (facts of this problem resemble those of S.S. Lotus).

[64] U.N. Doc. A/Conf. 13/L 53.

Reference may also be made here to the Supreme Court case, Mobarak Ali Ahmad v. The State of Bombay[65] wherein the Supreme Court observed : "The fastening of criminal liability on a foreigner in respect of culpable acts or omissions in India which are juridically attributable to him notwithstanding that he is corporeally present outside India at the time, is not to give any extra-territorial operation to the law ; for it is in respect of an offence whose locality is in India, that the liability is fastened on the person and the punishment is awarded by the law, if his presence in India for the trial can be secured." [66] The Supreme Court quoted with approval the following dictum of Holmes, J. : "Acts done outside a jurisdiction but intended to produce and producing detrimental effects within it, justify a State in punishing the cause of harm as if he had been present at the effect if the State should succeed in getting him within its power." [67] The Court also quoted with approval the following observation of the Permanent Court of International Justice in S.S. Lotus[68] : It is certain that the Courts of many countries which have given their criminal legislation a strictly territorial character, interpret criminal law in the sense, that offences, the authors of which at the moment of commission are in the territory of another State, are nevertheless to be regarded as having been committed in the national territory, if one of the constituent elements of the offence, and more especially its effects, have taken place there." The Supreme Court further observed : "In noting the provisions of international law in this context we are conscious that what we have to deal with in the present case is a question merely of municipal law and not of any international law. But as is seen above, the principles recognised in this behalf are virtually based on the recognition of those principles in the municipal law of various countries and is really part of general jurisprudence relating to criminal responsibility under municipal law.

No doubt some of the above dicta have reference to offences actually committed outside the State by foreigners and treated as offences committed within the State by specific legislation. But the principle emerging therefrom is clear that once it is treated as committed within the State the fact that he is a foreigner corporeally present outside at the time of such commission is no objection to exercise municipal jurisdiction under the municipal law. This emphasises the principle that exercise of criminal jurisdiction depends on the locality of the offence and on the nationality of the alleged offender (except in a few specified cases, such as, ambassador, Princes, etc).[69]

But the above principle will not apply in case of Ministers of Foreign Affairs visiting other countries because they enjoy immunity from criminal jurisdiction. This has been held by the International Court of Justice in 2002 in Arrest warrant of 11 April, 2000 (Democratic Republic of Congo v. Belgium). In this case, an international warrant had been issued in absentia in April, 2000 by an investigating Judge of the Brussel's Tribunal against Mr. Abdonlaye Yerodia Mdmbasi on the charge of having made certain speeches in the Congo in 1998 inciting racial hatred. The Judge charged the Minister who was a Belgiam national and was neither a resident of Belgium nor present in that country with—(i) grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Convention and of Additional Protocols thereto, and (ii) crimes against humanity.

Congo, on the other hand, asked the court to declare that Belgium should annul that warrant. Congo also argued that the charge had been brought in defiance of the immunity enjoyed by the incumbent Minister of Foreign Affairs.

---

65. AIR 1957 SC 857.
66. Ibid, at p. 868.
67. Appearing in Hackworth's Digest of International Law, (1941 Edition), Vol. 11 at p. 188.
68. (1927) P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 10, 23.
69. See supra note 65, at p. 869.

The International Court of Justice held by 13 to 3 votes that the issue of the international circulation of the disputed arrest warrant had failed to respect the immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability which Mr. Yerodia enjoyed under international law. Clarifying the scope of immunity enjoyed by Minister of Foreign Affairs, the court concluded that throughout the duration of his or her office a Minister of Foreign Affairs, when abroad, enjoys full immunity from criminal jurisdiction and inviolability. This is the case whether the Minister is present in foreign territory in an 'official' or 'private' capacity whether the acts in question were performed before he or she assumed office as Minister or during the period of office, and finally, whether, the acts were performed in an official or private capacity. Therefore, the Court ordered that Belgium by means of its own choosing cancel the arrest warrant and to inform the authorities to whom the warrant had been cancelled. Thus the judgment for the first time defined the scope of the immunities of Foreign Affairs and thereby contributed to the development of international law in a field of great topical interest.

N.B.—For criminal jurisdiction under International law see also matter discussed earlier under the heading 'Extra-territorial Operation of State Laws and Protective Jurisdiction of State Over Foreigners' in this Chapter.

Some Illustrations

(i) K, a British subject, fires across the channel and kills a Frenchman on the shore of France.* In this case Britain has jurisdiction over criminal K because K is a British subject and the crime is committed within the territory of Britain. France can also claim jurisdiction because though the crime was initiated in Britain, it was completed or consummated in the French territory. Moreover, the effect of the crime initiated in Britain feil on French territory. So if K goes to France, he can be apprehended and tried for murder.

(ii) K, an Indian subject, obtains money by false pretences by means of letters posted in Bhutan to a recipient in Pakistan.* K can be tried by Bhutan in whose territory the crime was committed by India, whose subject he is and also by Pakistan in whose territory the effect of the crime falls.

(iii) K, an American national, published in Texas a libel against a Mexican citizen, Later, K is in Mexico on a temporary visit and is arrested by the Mexican Government for prosecution. The Government of the United States protests against this. In view of the law relating to criminal jurisdiction in international law, and general jurisprudence relating to criminal responsibility under municipal law discussed above, Mexican Government is within its right to arrest K for prosecution because the effect of the crime initiated in America fell on Mexico and protest of U.S. is not justified.

Criminal jurisdiction of the Coastal State in the Territorial Sea.—The sovereignty of a coastal State also extends to its territorial sea. This is, however, subject to the condition that ships of all States enjoy the right of innocent passage through the territorial sea. So far merchant ships are concerned, Article 19(1) of the Geneva Convention on the territorial sea and the contiguous zone, 1958, provides that the criminal jurisdiction of coastal State should not be exercised on board a foreign ship passing through the territorial sea to arrest any person or to conduct any investigation in connection with any crime committed on board the ship during its passage, save only in the following cases : (a) If the consequences of the crime extend to the coastal State ; or (b) If the crime is of a kind to disturb the peace of the country or the good order of the territorial sea ; or (c) If the assistance of the local authorities has been requested by the captain of the ship or by the consul of the country whose flag the ship flies ; or (d) If it is necessary for the suppression of illicit traffic in narcotic drugs. Article 19(2) provides that the above provisions do not affect the right of the coastal State to take any steps authorised by its laws for the purpose of an arrest or investigation on board a foreign ship passing through the territorial sea after leaving internal waters.[70] Under Article 17 of the U.N. convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, subject to the convention, ships of all States, whether coastal or landlocked, enjoy the right of innocent passage through the territorial sea. According to Article 18, passage shall be continuous and expeditious. However, passage includes stopping and anchoring but only in so far as the same are incidental to ordinary navigation or are rendered necessary by force majeure or distress or for the purpose of rendering assistance to persons, ships or aircraft in dangers or distress. As regards innocent passage, Article 19 provides that passage is innocent so long as it is not prejudicial to the peace, good order or security of the coastal state. Such passage shall take place in conformity with the convention and with other rules of international law.

---

* Asked in I.A.S. (1970), Q. No. 5(a) ; For the answer of this and the two succeeding illustrations refer the law as discussed above.

* Asked in IAS (1970), Q. No. 5(b).

 Asked in I.A.S. (1970), Q. No. 5(c).

U.N. Crime Commission

N.B.—For this please see Chapter on "International Criminal Law and the Establishment of an International Criminal Court."

State Jurisdiction According to the Universal Principles*

As pointed out by Starke, "An offence subject to Universal jurisdiction is one which comes under the jurisdiction of all States wherever it be committed inasmuch as by general admission the offence is contrary to the interests of the international community, it is treated as a delicate jure gentium and all States are entitled to apprehend and punish the offenders. Clearly the purpose of conceding Universal jurisdiction is to ensure that no such offence goes unpunished."[71] Further, "There are probably today only two clear-cut cases of Universal jurisdiction, namely, the crime of piracy, jure gentium and war crimes .... The principle of Universality of war crimes was affirmed by the Geneva Conventions of 1949 relative to prisoners of war, protection of civilians, and sick and wounded personnel .... crimes or delicts jure gentium, other than piracy and war crimes, raise somewhat different considerations." [72] The principle of Universal jurisdiction was propounded first in respect of the crime of piracy. Since pirates were considered enemies of whole mankind, it was provided that any State could apprehend, try and punish pirates irrespective of the fact as to whether piracy was committed within or outside the jurisdiction of the State concerned. The law in this connection was codified in the Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea, 1958. Article 19 of the Geneva Convention on the High Seas[73] provides that on the high seas or in any other place outside the jurisdiction of any State, every State may seize pirate ship or aircraft, or a ship taken by Piracy and under the control of pirates, and arrest the persons and seize the property on board. The courts of the State which carried out the seizure may decide upon the penalties to be imposed, and may also determine the action to be taken with regard to the ships, aircraft or property, subject to the rights of third parties acting in good faith.

Since 'piracy' as defined in Article 15 of the Convention includes illegal acts of violence, detention or any act of deprecation, etc. against aircraft also, a case can be made out that the Universal jurisdiction principle should apply to the crime of hijacking also. The features of jurisdiction incorporated under the Hague Convention on Hijacking, 1970 have brought the offence of hijacking very near to piracy under International Customary Law.[74] As rightly remarked by Michael Akehurst, "......... although hijacking is not piracy, there is doctrinal authority for the view that it is subject to universal jurisdiction nevertheless. Hijacking threatens International communications to the extent as piracy ; it is an attack on international order and injures the international community as a whole, which means that all States have legitimate interest in repressing it. The policy reasons which justify universal jurisdiction over piracy justify it equally in the case of hijacking. It might also be possible to justify Universal jurisdiction over hijacking on wider grounds ...."[75]

---

[70] Provisions of Article 19(1) and (2) of the Geneva Convention, 1958 as referred above have been retained in Article 27(1) and (2) of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

* See also for I.A.S. (1971), Q. No. 7 ; C.S.E. (1991) Q. 5(c).

[71] J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition, (1989), p. 234.

[72] J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition, (1989), pp. 234-235.

[73] See U.N. Doc., A/Con F. 53.

[74] See Sami Shubber. "Aircraft Hijacking Under the Hague Convention 1970—A New Regime", I.C.L.Q., Vol. XXII (October 1973), p. 687 at p. 725; see also B. Cheng and R.H.F. Austin "Air Law' in the Present State of International Law and other Essays, Edited by Prof. Maarten Bos (Kluwer Netherlands 1973), p. 183 at pp. 196-97.

As regards war crimes, it is now generally agreed that States have Universal jurisdiction to apprehend, arrest and try the persons accused of war crimes. Reference may be made here to Eichmann case[76] wherein it was argued on behalf of the accused that when the crimes (i.e., war crimes of which he was accused) alleged were committed, Israel did not exist as a State and hence the Israeli court had no jurisdiction over the crimes committed by him. The Supreme Court of Israel rejected this argument and held: "...... it is the Universal Charter of the crimes in question which vests in every State the power to try those who participated in preparation of such crimes, and to punish them therefor .... " Further, "The abhorrent crimes .... are not crimes under Israel law alone. These crimes, which struck at the whole of mankind and shocked the conscience of nations are grave offence against the law of nations itself (delicta juris gentium). Therefore, so far from international law negating or limiting the jurisdiction of countries with respect to such crimes, international law is in the absence of an International Court, in need of the judicial and legislative organs of every country to give effect to its criminal interdictions and to bring the criminals to trial. The jurisdiction to try crimes under international law is universal." Thus it may be concluded that the principle of Universal jurisdiction applies to international crimes of piracy and war crimes and to some extent also to aircraft hijacking. It may be suggested that it will be in the interest of international community to extend the principle of Universal jurisdiction to some other international crimes such as genocide, apartheid and international terrorism. An international Criminal Court should be established to try persons accused of the said international crimes.

International Servitudes.*—"International servitudes" or "State servitude is the term sometimes used to denote exceptional restrictions made by treaty or otherwise on the territorial supremacy of a State by which a part or the whole of its territory is in a limited way to serve a certain purpose or interest of another State." [77] Further, "It should, however, be said that there has always been some doubt how far the classical concept of servitude is either apposite or acceptable. The notion of servitude is not a happy one politically. Moreover, its use nurtures the temptation to argue from the concept, even though this imports an analogy between territorial sovereignty and land ownership, which is outmoded." [78] Servitudes may be of following four types :[79]

(1) Positive.—The question of positive servitude arises when a state permits another state to do some work over a certain part of its territory.

(2) Negative.—The question of negative servitude arises when a state claims that other states should not work in its territory or a part of its territory in a particular way and if this claim is accepted by the state concerned.

(3) Military.—Military servitudes to fulfil the military requirements. To keep military or armed forces in another state is a type of military servitude. For example the state of Malta has given an island to Britain on lease and has allowed Britain to have its Military base on it. It may be termed as a type of military servitude.

---

[75] Michael Akehurst, "Hijacking", I.J.I.L., Vol. 14 (1974), p. 81 at pp. 83-84.

[76] Eichmann v. Attorney-General of the Government of Israel, (1962) 136 I.L. 277. For facts of the case see, Chapter on "War Crimes".

* See also for I.A.S. (1959) Q. No. 3, : P.C.S. (1966), Q. No. 9 ; I.A.S. (1956) Q. No. 5 ; P.C.S. (1995), Q. No. 8(a).

[77] Oppenheim's International Law, note 2 at pp. 670-671.

[78] Ibid, at p. 671.

[79] L. Oppenheim's International Law, Vol. I, 8th Edn., pp. 540-541.

(4) Economic servitude.—Economic servitudes are common and they arise when one state allows another state certain commercial or transport facilities.

In Teen Bigha case or Union of India v. Sukumar Sen Gupta,[80] Sabyasachi Mukherji, C.J. of the Supreme Court observed :

> "Acceptance of servitude does not represent any negation of sovereignty. The term 'servitude' means nothing more than accepted restrictions and grant of servitude does not amount to cession." [81]

In 1974 an agreement was entered into between India and Bangladesh regarding the land boundary and related matters including transfer of enclaves. The Agreement provided that Indian enclaves in India should be exchanged expeditiously excepting the enclaves mentioned in para 14 without claim to compensation for the additional area, going to Bangladesh. Thereafter, an understanding was reached in October 1982 between the two Governments in connection with the "lease in perpetuity" in terms of item 14 of Article 1974 Agreement. Item 14 provided the following :

> "India will remain the southern half of South Berubari Union No. 12 and the adjacent enclaves, measuring an area 2.54 square miles approximately, and in exchange Bangladesh will retain the Dahagram and Angerpota enclave. India will lease in perpetuity to Bangladesh an area of approximately 178 metres × 65 metres near 'Tin Bigha' to connect Dahagram and Panbari Mouza (S. Patram) of Bangladesh."

Thus the agreement provided that the said land would be given on lease to Bangladesh to enable it to exercise sovereignty over Dahagram and Angerpota but India would continue to retain sovereignty over the said area and the rent for the lease area shall be Re. 1/- (Bangladesh Taka one) only per annum. The agreement added that Bangladesh shall not however be required to pay the said rent and the Government of India waived its right to charge such rent in respect of the leased area. Though the said agreement used the term "lease in perpetuity", the Supreme Court held that it was "servitude suffered by India in its territory, as known in international law". In the words of Sabyasachi Mukherji, C.J., who delivered the judgment of the Full Bench of the Supreme Court :

> "A fortiori, the said transaction did not amount to cession of the said area of Teen Bigha in favour of Bangladesh .... the rights intended to be conferred on Bangladesh under the said agreements would amount to what is known as 'servitude' in international law." [32]

Further, "the term 'servitude' means nothing more than accepted restrictions and grant of servitude does not amount to cession of territory." [83]

---

[80] AIR 1990 S.C. 1692.

[81] Ibid, at pp. 1706-1707.

[82] AIR 1990 S.C. 1692 at p. 1706.

[83] Ibid at p. 1707.

CHAPTER 15

STATE TERRITORY

The concept of State Territory :

State territory has been defined as "portion of globe which is subjected to the sovereignty of a State. A State without a territory is not possible, although the necessary territory may be very small, as with Vatican city............A wandering tribe, although it has a government and is otherwise organised, is not a State until it has settled down in a territory of its own." [1] Further, "the importance of State territory is that it is the space within which the State exercises its supreme and normally exclusive authority. State territory is an object of international law, because that law recognises the supreme authority of, which authority must of course be exercised in accordance with international law............The exclusive domain of a State within its territory is basic to the international system and Article 2(4) of the U. N. Charter accordingly requires all members to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial independence of any State." [2]

The territory of a State comprises not only its land mass but also its national waters (i.e., rivers, lakes, bays, estuaries, other enclosed areas and territorial waters, and the air space above its land and water territory.* According to Article 8 (i) of the U. N. convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, waters on the land ward side of the baseline of the territorial sea form part of internal waters of state.[3] But this is subject to Part IV of the convention which deals with Archipelagic states. Article 47 of Part IV of the convention provides that an archipelagic state[4] may draw straight archipelagic baselines joining the outermost points of the outermost islands and drying reefs of the archipelago provided that within such baselines are included the main islands and an area in which the ratio of the area of the water to the area of the land, including atolls, is between 1 to 1 and 9 to 1". Further the length of such baselines shall not exceed 100 nautical miles, except that up to 3 percent of the total number of baselines enclosing any archipelago may exceed that length up to a maximum length of 125 nautical miles. Moreover, the drawing of such baselines shall not depart to any appreciable extent from the general configuration of the archipelago. According to Article 50, within its archipelagic waters, the archipelagic state may draw closing lines for the delimitation of internal waters, in accordance with Articles 9, 10 and 11.

It may be further noted that if a river flows into the sea the baseline shall be a straight line across the mouth of the river between points on the low waterline of its banks.[5] As regards bays, the convention provides that if the distance between the low-water marks of the natural enterance points of a bay does not exceed 24 nautical miles, a closing line may be drawn between these two low-water marks, and the waters enclosed thereby shall be considered as internal waters. Where the distance between the low-water marks of the natural enterance points of a bay exceeds 24 nautical miles a straight baseline of 24 nautical miles shall be drawn within the bay in such a manner as to enclose the maximum area of water that is possible with a line of that length.[6] As regards ports, the convention provides that for the purposes of delimiting the territorial sea, the outermost permanent harbour works which form an integral part of the harbour system are regarded as forming part of the coast off-share installations and artificial islands shall not be considered as permanent harbour works.[7]

---

[1] Oppenheim's International Law, Vol. 1, 9th Edition, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Longman Group U.K. Ltd. and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992 pp. 563-564.

[2] Ibid, at p. 564.

* See also for P.C.S. (1964), Q. No. 7 ; I.A.S (1978), Q. No. 5(a).

[3] See also Article 5 of the Geneva Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone, 1958.

[4] That is a state constituted wholly by one or more archepelago and may include other Islands.

[5] Article 9 of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

[6] Article 10.

Maritime Territory

Beyond inland waters, the sovereignty of a coastal state extents to maritime belt or territorial waters. Besides, territorial waters, the coastal state also exercises sovereign rights, for certain limited purposes, over continental shelf and exclusive economic Zone. The coastal state also exercises some control over contiguous zone. Each of these maritime Zones are critically discussed in a separate chapter entitled, "The Law of the Sea."

Modes of Acquiring Territory*.—Under international law, a state may acquire territory through any of the following modes—

(1) Occupation.—"Occupation is the act of appropriation by a State by which it intentionally acquires sovereignty over such territory as it is at the time not under the sovereignty of another State." [8] Further, "It is therefore an original mode of acquisition in that the sovereignty is not derived from another State. Occupation can only take place by and for a State; it must be a State act, that is, it must be performed in the service of a State, or it must be acknowledged by a State after its performance." [9] Thus, "occupation consists in establishing sovereignty over a territory not under the authority of any other State whether newly discovered or an unlikely case-abandoned by the State formerly in control." [10] In order to see whether a State has occupation over a particular territory it is seen whether there is effective occupation of that State over the territory concerned.[11] The two essential elements or facts that constitute an effective occupation—(i) Possession ; and (ii) Administration.[12] The State acquiring territory must formally announce that the territory has been taken possession of and that it intends to keep it under its sovereignty. After taking the territory into possession, the possessor must establish some kind of administration thereon which shows that the possession really governs the territory. This must be done within reasonable time after taking the territory into possession.[13] The leading case on the point is Island of Palmas Arbitrations.[14] As regards the sovereignty over the Island of Palmas there was a dispute between America and Netherlands. While America contended that it had acquired the Island under a treaty of 1898 with Spain, Netherlands contended that the Island was never under the occupation of Spain and as such Spain had no authority to transfer it to any other State. Both the States referred the matter to arbitration. Deciding in favour of Netherlands, the arbitration court held that for acquiring sovereignty over a particular territory effective occupation is necessary. That is to say, there should be occupation and contacts with the inhabitants of the territory should be established. Occupation involves two elements—(a) will to exercise sovereignty, and (b) an exhibition of actual authority. The Arbitrator observed that if the Islands was discovered by Spain, there was nothing on record to prove that the Spaniards ever went to the Island, occupied it and established contacts with the inhabitants of the Island and established some sorts of administration. On the other hand, Netherlands had not only established contacts with the people of Islands but also had exercised sovereignty over it since 1700. Thus according to the Court of Arbitration, the Island of Palmas was a part of Netherlands which it had incorporated in its territory through occupation.[15]

---

[7] Article 11.

* See also for IAS (1971), Q. 8 ; IAS (1954), Q. 3 ; PCS (1976), Q. 4 ; PCS (1973), Q. 7 ; PCS (1971), Q. 8 ; PCS (1972), Q. 8 ; PCS (1981), Q. 8(b), PCS (1984), Q. 3(a).

 See also for PCS (1965), Q. 7 (c) ; IAS (1964), Q. 12 ; IAS (1959), Q. 6(c) ; C.S.E. (1993) Q. 6(a) ; C.S.E. (1995) Q. 5(b) ; UPPCS (2004) Q. 7(b).

[8] Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. 1, Eighth Edition, p. 555; See also Oppenheim's International Law, note 1, at p. 686.

[9] Oppenheim's International Law, ibid, at pp. 686-687.

[10] J. G. Starke, Introduction to International Law. Tenth Edition (1989) p. 160.

[11] See J.E.S. Fawcett, The Law of Nations (1968), p. 58.

[12] See Oppenheim's International Law, note 1, pp. 688-689.

[13] Ibid. at p. 689.

[14] Award of the Permanent Court of Arbitration (1929), Hudson cases p. 361; See also A.J.I.L., Vol. 22(1968), pp. 867-912.

In another case, namely, Eastern Greenland Case,[16] the Permanent Court of International Justice propounded the following two principles : (i) It is necessary for the occupation over the territory that there should be intention to establish sovereignty over the territory concerned; and (ii) There should be some actual exercise of such authority. The facts of this case are as follows : On July 10, 1931, Norway declared her sovereignty over the eastern part of Greenland through a Government decree. On the other hand, Denmark also claimed her Sovereignty over the said area during the Second World War and afterwards several allied powers had declared that the whole Greenland was a part of Denmark. They had also made it clear that they would not object to the sovereignty of Denmark over Greenland. The Foreign Minister of Norway had also accepted this fact and had made it clear that Norway would have no objection in this connection. By a majority of 12 against 2, the Permanent Court of International Justice decided that Eastern Greenland was under the sovereignty of Denmark. The Court held : "A claim to sovereignty based not upon some particular act or title such as treaty of cession but merely upon continued display of authority, involves two elements each of which must be shown to exist : the intention and will to act as Sovereign and some actual exercise or display of such authority. "Reference may also be made here to Minquires and Ecrehos (France v. U.K.) case[17] decided by the International Court of Justice. In this case, the court had to determine whether the sovereignty over the islets and rocks of the Minquires and Ecrehos groups respectively belonged to the U. K. or the French Republic. The Minquires and Ecrehos are two groups of islets situated between the British Island of Jersy and the coast of France. After the conquest of England by William, Duke of Normandy, in 1066, the Island formed part of the Union between England and Normandy which lasted until 1204, when Philip Augustus of France conquered Normandy but failed to occupy the Island. It was contended by the U. K. that the Islands then remained united with England and this situation was placed on a legal basis by subsequent treaties between the two countries. On the other hand, it was contended by France that the Minquires and Ecrehos were held by France after 1204, and referred to the same medieval treaties as those relied on by the U. K. In its judgment of 17 November, 1953, the Court observed that none of those treaties stated specifically which Island were held by the King of England or by the King of France. The Court added, what was of decisive importance was not indirect presumption based on matters in middle Ages, but direct evidence of possession and the actual exercise of sovereignty. After going through the evidence, the Court unanimously decided that "the sovereignty over the islets and rocks of the Ecrehos and Minquires groups in so far as these islets and rocks are capable of appropriation, belongs to the United Kingdom." Thus the two essential elements of occupation are : (i) direct evidence of possession; and (ii) actual exercise of sovereignty or eastablishment or some sort of administration exhibiting exercise of sovereignty.

Illustration.—(1) The State of Indonesia claims a fishing island in Indian Ocean as part of its territory because it is close to Indonesian shore. The island has been in Indian occupation for over a century though there is no permanent population on the island.* The claim of Indonesia is not justified because the island has been in Indian occupation. Mere proximity or contiguity is not a valid test to determine as to which State the territory in question belongs. In Island of Palmas Arbitration it was rightly observed : "The principle, of contiguity in regard to island, may not be out of place when it is a question of alloting them to one State rather than another, either by agreement between the parties or by a decision not necessarily based on law, but as a rule establishing ipso jure the presumption of sovereignty in favour of a particular State, this principle would be in conflict with what has been said as to territorial sovereignty and as to the necessary relation to between the right to exclude other States from a region and the duty to display therein the activities of a State. Nor is this Principle of contiguity admissible as a legal method of deciding questions of territorial sovereignty; for it is wholly lacking in precision and would in its application lead to arbitrary results." Moreover, since the island has been in Indian occupation for over a century, India has acquired title over it by prescription also.[18]

---

[15] It was held in the Palmas Island Arbitration that "Continuous and peaceful display of territorial sovereignty (peaceful in relation to other States) is as good as title." The Arbitration Court finally concluded : "The Netherland's title of Sovereigty, acquired by continuous and peaceful display of State authority during a long period of time going probably back beyond the year 1700, therefore hold good...........The Island of Palmas (or Miangas) forms in its entirety a part of Netherlands territory."

[16] P.C.I.J. (1933), A/B No. 53 (3 W.C.R. 151).

[17] I.C.J. Reports 1953, p. 47.

* Asked in P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 7; P.C.S. (1984) Q. 3(b).

(2) State A discovers a new island and displays its flag there. Thereafter State B occupies the island. After a few years State A desires to recover the island from State B.*

The facts of this problem resemble the facts of the case of Island of Palmas Arbitration which has been discussed above. For answer of this problem see the matter discussed above under the heading "occupation".

Arctic and Antarctic*.—Some States have asserted claims of sovereignty by occupation over some parts of Arctic and Antarctic on the basis of contiguity or proximity. As pointed out above for occupation two essential elements must be present—(i) direct evidence of possession ; and (ii) administration or actual exercise of sovereignty. Since such claims do not satisfy the above essential elements, they are not valid. They are also not valid under international law because effective occupation of these areas is not possible because of the extreme climate of these areas. Moreover, occupation of territory is not possible merely by declaration.

Argentina, Australia, Chile, France, New Zealad, Norway and U. K. are States who asserted claims over parts of Antarctic. U.S.A. and U.S.S.R. also asserted a basis for a claim to territorial sovereignty. They did not make any specific claim nor can it be made now in view of the Antarctic Treaty which prohibits new claims.

The Antarctic Treaty.—The Antarctic Treaty of 1 December, 1959 established a special regime over the Antarctic area south of 60^0 lattitude. The original State parties to the treaty are : Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Chile, France, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, South Africa, the Soviet Union, the United Kingdom and the United States. The main provisions of the Treaty are :

(1) During the continuance of the treaty existing sovereignty claims shall remain in a state of suspense. No new claim shall be asserted. This provision shall not affect previously asserted rights and that nothing done the treaty regime shall either further or prejudice the existing claims.[19]

(2) The Antarctic shall be used for peaceful purposes only. The treaty forbids the establishment of military basis and fortifications and the testing of any type of weapons.[20]

(3) Nuclear explosions and the disposal of radio-active waste material are prohibited.[21]

(4) The treaty establishes freedom of Scientific investigation.

(5) There shall be periodic consultative meetings in which recommendations may be made to governments for taking measures in furtherance of the objectives of the treaty.[22]

---

[18] See law relating to prescription discussed below.

* C.S.E. (1994) Q. 7(b).

 See also for P.C.S. (1984) Q. 3(a); P.C.S. (1973) Q. 7.

[19] Article 4.

[20] Article 1.

[21] Article 5.

[22] Article 9.

(6) The Treaty is of indefinite duration but is open to review after 23 June, 1991.[23]

A convention on the Regulation of Antarctic Mineral Resource Activities was concluded at Wellington in 1988. Some States, however, opposed it, mainly on environmental grounds, to any mineral resource activity. This movement was led by Australia and France. Consequently, an agreement was reached in October 1991 at Madrid banning for a period of 50 years any mineral resource activity other than scientific research.

Distinction between Occupation and Subjugation.—The distinction between occupation and subjugation is that in subjugation, the State subjugated was previously under the sovereignty of another country whereas in the case of occupation no country exercised sovereignty over it previously.

(2) *Prescription.—Yet another mode of acquiring territory is prescription. If a State exercises control and establishes occupation over a particular territory for a long time and thus exercises de facto sovereignty over it, then the territory concerned becomes a part of that State. "Title by prescription (i.e., acquisitive prescription) is the result of the peaceable exercise of de facto sovereignty for a very long period over a territory subject to the sovereignty of another, and this may be as the consequence of immemorial exercise of such sovereignty (i.e., for such period of time as in effect to extinguish memories of the exercise of sovereignty by a predecessor) or as the result of lengthy adverse possession only." [24] Some jurists are of the view that international law does not recognize acquiring of territory through prescription. But some jurists are of the view that there are some precedents under international law, for example the case of Island of Palmas Arbitration. However, international law does not prescribe any fixed period for prescription. It may, therefore, be concluded that if any State exercises control over particular territory peacefully for a long time and establishes its sovereignty over it, then the territory concerned becomes a part of it. So far as the question of the period is concerned, the treaty of Washington, 1871 and British Gyanna Arbitration, 1899, fixed it for 20 years. This is however not a generally agreed period of acquiring of territory through prescription.[25] A State may acquire some territory by prescription only when some conditions are fulfiled. These conditions are : (i) A State may acquire some territory by prescription only when it has not accepted the sovereignty of any other States over the said territory; (ii) Possession should be peaceful and uninterrupted; (iii) Possession should be in public; and (iv) Possession should be for a definite period.[26] It may, however, be noted that in the presence of some treaty or convention, territory cannot be acquired by prescription through administrative acts only. Frontier Lands case (Belgium-Netherlands)[27] and case Concerning the Temple of Preah Vihar (Merits) (Cambodia v. Thailand)[28] deserve a special mention in this connection.

---

[23] Article 12.

* See also for I.A.S (1970), Q. No. 10(c).

[24] J. G. Starke, Introduction to International Law. Tenth Edition (1989) p. 168.

[25] According to D.H.N. Johnson, "Acquisitive prescription" is the means by which, under international law, legal recognition is given to the right of a State to exercise sovereignty over land or sea territory in cases where that State has, in fact, exercised its authority in a continuous uniterrupted, and peaceful manner over the area concerned for a sufficient period of time, provided that all other interested and affected States (in the case of land territory the previous possessor, in the case of sea territory neighbouring and other States whose maritime interests are affected) have acquiesced in this exercise of authority. Such acquiescence is implied in cases where the interested and affected States have failed within a reasonable time to refer the matter to the appropriate international organisation or international tribunal or exceptionally in cases where no such action was possible have failed to manifest their opposition in a sufficiently positive manner through the instrumentality of diplomatic interests. The length of time required for a prescriptive title on the one hand and the exent of the action required to prevent the establishment of a prescriptive title on the other hand, are invariably matters of fact to be decided by the international tribunal before which the matter is eventually brought for the adjudication." "Acquisitive Prescription in International law", BYBIL, Vol. XXVII (1950), p. 332 at pp. 353-354.

[26] See ibid, pp. 344-347

[27] I.C.J. Rep. (1959), p. 209.

[28] I.C.J. Rep. (1962), p. 6.

It may also be noted that mere silence of a state in respect of a territory will not deprive it of its claim. In the Frontier Lands case (Belgium-Netherlands)[29] the International Court of Justice held that mere administrative and routine acts done by a state officials (in this case Netherlands) in a particular area cannot deprive the legal title of other State (i.e., Belgium) to the said area under a convention. In this case, the dispute was relating to sovereignty over two plots of land situated in an area where the Belgo-Dutch frontier presented certain unusual features. It was contended by Netherlands that the provision by which the two plots were attributed was vitiated by a mistake, and that Netherlands' sovereignty over the said plots had been established by the exercise of various acts of sovereignty since 1843. After considering the evidence adduced the court held that sovereignty over the disputed plots belonged to Belgium.

Illustration.—A range of hills separates the territories of two states A and B. There is a boundary dispute between A and B, A contending that the watershed has been traditionally the boundary, and B that the boundary is the line up to which each has been actually exercising sovereign authority, which differs from the watershed. Both sides negotiate and fail to agree. B finds a temple of great acheological interest on the A's side of the watershed, but within the boundary it has been claiming, and carries excavations for ten years. A comes to know about the temple and institutes proceedings before the International Court of Justice for a declaration of its title to the temple area.*

The excavation of a temple of archeological interest, in A's side shows that the area is under the sovereignty of A. Excavations for ten years etc. are simply administrative acts which cannot deprive A's claim of soverignty over the area in the absence of signs of effective occupation. The facts of the above problem resemble those of the case concerning the temple of Preah Vihear (Cambodia v. Thailand.)[30] In this case Cambodia contended that Thailand occupied a piece of its territory surrounding the temple of Preah Vihear, a place of pilgrimage and worship for cambodians. Cambodia therefore requested the court to declare that territorial sovereignty over the temple belong to it and Thailand was under obligations to withdraw the armed detachments stationed there since 1954. The Court held that the temple was situated on Cambodian territory and that Thailand was under obligation to withdraw any military or police force stationed there and to restore any objects removed from the ruins since 1954. The court held that merely the acts of local administrative authorities in a certain disputed area shall not negative a consistent attitude of Thailand to regards valid a certain frontier line according to which the sovereignty of Cambodia.

Distinction between Occupation and Prescription—As noted above, occupation of a territory takes place when a State intentionally acquires sovereignty over such territory which is at that time not under the sovereignty of any other State Occupation involves two elements—(a) will to exercise sovereignty, and (b) show or exhibition of actual authority. On the other hand, title by prescription is acquired by peaceable exercise of de facto sovereignty for a long period. As pointed out by Max Huber in Island of Palmas case (The Netherlands v. U.S.)[31] condition of acquisition of sovereignty by prescription i.e. by way of continuous and peaceful display of State authority is that the display of such authority must be open and public. A clandestine exercise of State authority over an inhabited territory during a considerable length of time would not suffice. However, in the absence of an explicit rule of law, there is no obligation to notify to other States. As pointed out in Western Sahara case,[32] a cardinal condition of a valid "occupation" is that the territory should be terra nullius a territory belonging to no one at the time the act alleged to constitute the "occupation". There is no such condition for acquiring of territory by prescription. In case of prescription the territory to be acquired by prescription may be subject to the sovereignty of another State.

---

[29] I.C.J. Rep. (1959), p. 209.

* (C.S.E. (1980) Q. No. 9(a).

[30] I.C.J. Rep. (1962) p. 6.

 See also for C.S.E. (1994) Q. 7(b)

[31] (1928) 2 RIAA 829.

[32] 1975 ICJ Rep. 12 ; See also Legal Status of Eastern Greenland case, PCIJ, Series A/B, No. 53, pp. 44f and 63f.

(3) Accretion.—A territory may also be acquired through Accretion, "Title by accretion occurs when new territory is added, mainly through natural causes.........to territory already under the sovereignty of the acquiring State. No formal act or assertion of title is necessary." [33] Thus Accretion "is the name for the increase of land through new formations" which may be artificial or natural. If they are as a result of the human work, they are artificial. On the other hand, if they are as a result of the operation of nature, they are natural. Further, it is a customary rule of international law that "enlargement of territory, if any, created through new formations, takes ipso facto by the accretion, without the State concerned taking any special step for the purpose of extending its sovereignty." [34]

(4) *Cession .—Through cession also, a territory may be acquired. "The cession of a territory may be voluntary or it may be under compulsion as a result of war conducted successfully by the State to which the territory is ceded.[35] Cession shall be considered valid only when the sovereignty of a territory is transferred to another State. Reference may be made here to In re Berubari Union and Exchange of Enclaves[36] wherein the Supreme Court observed, ".........it is an essential attribute of sovereignty that a sovereign State can acquire foreign territory and can, in case of necessity, cede a part of its territory in favour of a sovereign State, and this can be done in exercise of its treaty-making power. Cession of national territory in law amounts to the transfer of sovereignty over the said territory by the owner State in favour of another State......This power, it may be added, is of course subject to the limitations which the Constitution of the State may either expressly or by necessary implication impose in that behalf.[37] This case related to the exchange of certain territories. The Division of Berubari Union No. 12, and delimitation of the boundaries between India and the then East Bengal in pursuance of an Agreement entered into between India and Pakistan on 10th September, 1958. The President referred certain questions for the opinion of the Supreme Court under Article 143 (1) of the Constitution because some doubts had arisen as to whether the implementation of the Agreement relating to Berubari Union No. 12 and the exchange of Enclaves required any legislative action either by a suitable law of Parliament relatable to Article 3 of the Constitution of India or by amendment of the Constitution relatable to Article 368. The Supreme Court held, "...the Agreement amounts to a cession of a part of the territory of India in favour of Pakistan, and so its implementation would naturally involve the alteration of the content of and the consequent amendment of Article 1 and of the relevant part of the First Schedule to the Constitution, because such implementation would necessarily lead to the diminution of the territory of the Union of India. Such an amendment can be made under Article 368......so it follows that acting under Article 368, Parliament may make law to give effect to and implement, the Agreement in question covering the cession of a part of Berubari Union No. 12 as well as some of the Cooch-Behar Enclaves which by exchange are given to Pakistan. Parliament may, however, if it so chooses, pass a law amending Article 3 of the Constitution so as to cover cases of cession of the territory of India in favour of a foreign State. If such a law is passed the Parliament may be competent

---

[33] Starke, see supra note 24 at p. 167. In the words of another writer, "A State acquires territory by accretion when new land is formed within its existing territorial limits : the Sea recedes, a river dries up, an island appears within the territorial sea. These acquisitions seldom result in either significant additions of territory or in controvarsy." Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 131.

[34] Oppenheim's International Law, note 1, at p. 696.

* IAS (2001) Q. 6(b).

[35] Starke, note 24, at p. 167; See also Dr. Nagendra Singh, India and International Law (S. Chand & Co., Delhi, 1972), pp. 29-30.

[36] A.I.R. 1960 S.C. 845.

[37] Ibid, at pp. 856-57.

to make a law under the amended Article 3 to implement the Agreement in question on the other hand, if the necessary law is passed under Article 368 itself that alone would be sufficient to implement the Agreement."[38]

In the case of Sugandha Roy v. Union of India and others[39] the question arose whether giving of "Tin Bigha" area to Bangladesh on "lease in perpetuity" under the Agreement of 1974 and 1982 between India and Bangladesh amounted to cession or not ? As regards exchange of enclaves, Paragraph 14 of Article 1 of the Agreement of 1974 provided, "India will retain the southern half of South Berubary Union No. 12 and the adjacent enclaves. ....and in exchange Bangladesh will retain the Dahagram and Angarpota enclaves. India will lease in perpetuity to Bangladesh an area of approximately......near "Tin Bigha......" In October, 1982 an understanding between the Governments of India and Bangladesh was reached in connection with the so-called "lease in prepetuity" in terms of item 14 of Art. 1 of the 1974 Agreement. It was further provided that it will be an integral part of the 1974 Agreement. The Agreement of 1982 provided, inter alia "sovereignty over the leased area shall continue to vest in India further "......Bangladesh shall have undisturbed possession and use of the area leased to her in perpetuity."

Being aggrieved by the said 1974 and 1982 Agreements, the present writ petition was filed. The Calcutta High Court held; "......the implementation of these two Agreements would not involve cession of any territory to Bangladesh in respect of Tin Bigha.........not merely that no exclusive possession of this area is sought to be transferred to Bangladesh, but no legal possession at all is being transferred. There is no question of transfer of sovereignty wholly or partially, in respect of the said area. What has merely been done is to enable the Government of Bangladesh and its nationals to exercise certain rights in respect of the said area which otherwise they would not have been entitled to do......implementation of these two Agreements, so far as 'Tin Bigha is concerned' does not amount to cession of the said territory or transfer of sovereignty in respect of the same and does not require any constitutional Amendment. In spite of such Agreements India would still retain its sovereignty, ownership and control of Tin Bigha."[40] Accordingly the petition was dismissed.

There was an appeal before the Division Bench of the High Court. The Division Bench in judgment under appeal affirmed the decision by the learned single Judge. Against this judgment, appeal by special leave was made in the Supreme Court. In Union of India v. Sukumar Sengupta[41] i.e., the said appeal by special leave, the Supreme Court held :

> "Cession as understood in international law would result in an actual and physical transfer of the said area to Bangladesh following which Bangladesh would have the exclusive right to treat the said transferred territory as part of its own territory and exercise full control, dominion and right over the same. This is not the position or the situation which is contemplated under the agreements."[42]
>
> According to the Court, "A fortiori, the said transaction did not amount to cession of the said area of Teen Bigha in favour of Bangladesh."[43]
>
> Further, "...........the complexities of modern developed societies need peaceful co-existence, if the world is to survive. Amicable and peaceful settlement of boundary disputes are in the interests of the international community. The older and absolute ideas of sovereignty and independence has thus necessarily to be modified in the dawn of the 21st century. A perpetual right of passage and other incidental rights given to Bangladesh for the limited purpose for exercising the sovereignty over

---

[38] In re Berubari Union and Exchange of Enclavesat, AIR 1960 SC 845 at p. 861.

[39] A.I.R. 1983 Cal. 468.

[40] Ibid, at p. 492.

[41] AIR 1990 SC 1692; the facts of this case have been referred in earlier chapter.

[42] Ibid, at p. 1706.

[43] Ibid.

her own two enclaves within the territory of India and/or if imposed restrictions on itself by India does not tantamount to transfer of interest in land."[44]

As regards the effect of cession on property belonging to the inhabitants, Chief Justice John Marshall of the U. S. Supreme Court observed : The modern usage of nations, which has become law would be violated; that sense of justice and of right which is acknowledged and felt by the whole civilized world would be outraged, if private property should be generally confiscated and private rights annulled......A cession of territory is never understood to be a cession of the property belonging to its inhabitants......The cession of a territory by its name from one sovereign to another, conveying the compound idea of surrendering at the same time the lands and the people who inhabit them, would be necessarily understood to pass the sovereignty only, and not to interfere with private property.[45] The same view was followed by the Supreme Court in Union of India v. Sudhansu Mozumdar.[46]The correct position has been summed up by an Indian author[47] in the following words : "The Court's exposition of cession of territory is in accord with the principles of international law in so far as the power to cede territory is an essential attribute of Sovereignty, and as cession involves transfer of soveriegnty from one State to another. However, the Court's general ruling that in a cession there is no transfer of ownership or right of possession in the properties of the inhabitants of the ceded territory, cannot be accepted without a reservation. Although treaties of cession distinguish between the imperium of a State in respect of its territory, and the dominium held or owned by individuals, it is fairly well established under international law that a treaty of cession transfers only imperium and not dominium 'unless the latter is expressly or by implication included.[48] If therefore, follows that in the absence of any contrary indication in the treaty, a cession of territory by treaty cannot be held to be a transfer of the property belonging to its inhabitants."

(5) Annexation.—When a State conquers another State the conquering State after conquest establishes its sovereignty over the conquered State. It may, however, be noted that only conquest does not amount to establishment of sovereignty over the territory concerned. It is necessary for the establishment of sovereignty that conquering State should occupy effectively the territory concerned. This mode has been greatly affected by the charter of the U. N. under which member States cannot now acquire territories of each other by annexation. Even use of force or the threat thereof in the international relations against the territorial independence of any State or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the U. N. is prohibited under Article 2 (4) of the U. N. Charter.

(6) Lease.—The territory may also be acquired through lease. A State may give its territory to another State under lease for a certain period. For the said certain period some rights of sovereignty are transferred to another State through lease although complete sovereignty over the said territory is not transferred. An example of this is the lease of an Island of Malta to Britain for some years. Recently there was a conflict between Malta and Britain in this connection. Malta wanted that Britain should enhance lease money. Thus territory may also be acquired through lease.

In the Panama Canal's case, a lease was granted to the United States in perpetuity. The United States was given the occupation and control of the area concerned over and below the surface for the construction and protection of the canal. Moreover, the United States was allowed under the lease to exercise over the canal zone all rights, power and authority which it would possess if it were the sovereign of the territory. This case was referred to by the Supreme Court in Union of India v. Sukumar Sengupta[49] which related to Agreements of 1974 and 1982 by which India purported to give Teen Bigha to Bangladesh on "lease in perpetuity". Though the said agreements used the term "lease" the Supreme Court held that the concessions given to Bangladesh over the said area amounted to "servitude." [50]

---

[44] Union of India v. Sukumar Sengupta, AIR 1990 SC 1692 at pp. 1707-1708.

[45] United States v. Perchmann, (1963) 32 U.S. 51 at pp. 61-87; see also Shapleigh v. Mier, (1937) 292 U.S. 468 at p. 470, per Cardozo, J.; In its advisory opinion of September 10, 1923, on Certain Questions Relating to Settlers of German origin in the territory ceded by Germany to Poland, the Permanent Court of International Justice observed : "Private rights acquired under existing law do not cease on a change of sovereignty" , see also Virendra Singh v. State of Uttar Pradesh, A.I.R. 1954 S.C. 447 at pp. 450-451.

[46] A.I.R. 1971 S.C. 1594 at p. 1599.

[47] V.S. Mani, "The Berubari cases, From the Perspective of International Law", A.J.I.L. Vol. 11 (1971), p. 655 at pp. 659-660.

[48] See Lord McNair, The Law of Treaties (Oxford, 1961), p. 331, citing the Perchman's case (1833), 7 Peters, p. 51, pp. 86-88 (Judgment by Chief Justice Marshall), with approval.

(7) Pledge.—Sometimes there arise certain circumstances under which a State becomes compelled to pledge a part of its territory in return of some amount of money for which it is in dire need. In this case also, a part of sovereignty over the territory concerned is transferred. For example in 1768, the Republic of Geneo had pledged the Island of Corsica to France.

(8) Plebiscite.—Some writers are of the view that through plebiscite also new territory may be acquired. Although there are no definite rules in regard to acquiring of territory through plebiscite yet modern writers have expressed the view that through plebiscite also, a new territory may be acquired. A recent example of acquiring territory through plebiscite is that of West Irian. Both Netherlands and Indonesia claimed the territory of West Irian. Through the efforts of United Nations, it was decided that a plebiscite in the West Irian should be held and the people of West Irian should be given the freedom to decide whether they would like to merge with Netherlands or Indonesia. Consequently, plebiscite was held under the auspices of United Nations and the inhabitants of West Irian decided to merge with Indonesia. Hence the territory of West Irian is now a part of Indonesia.

Example of Kashmir.—In case of Kashmir, Pakistan claimed that there should be plebiscite and the people of Jammu and Kashmir should be given the freedom to decide whether they would like to merge with India or Pakistan. In Kashmir, the Government of India have taken the position that since the merger of Jammu and Kashmir with India several elections have taken place and the people have voted the question of plebiscite no longer arises. India claims, and rightly too, that Jammu and Kashmir is an integral part of India. It may, however, be noted that in the beginning India had agreed to hold plebiscitie in Jammu and Kashmir. But the position has changed since then, and in the changed circumstances it has become quite obvious that people of Jammu and Kashmir have opted to be within the Union of India and that is why the Government of India have completely rejected the claim of Pakistan to hold plebiscite in Jammu and Kashmir. Some jurists have expressed the view that the principle of self-determination should be applied in this case. But "the principle (i.e., the principle of self-determination) must be deemed to have application in the process of decolonisation alone. It could not be applied to established States in their territorial disputes. No such State is likely to espouse this principle and invite self-destruction. For what else would it be but self-destruction if India accedes to the demands of the Nagas, the Mizos and others or if Iraq concedes to the demands of the Kurdish claim, or if the U. S. allows extremist Black panther demands for a separate Negroland.[51] Thus, support for the principle of self-determination has been obligatory on Member States cannot be found in Article 1 of the U. N. Charter.[52]

(9) Acquisition of territorial sovereignty by newly emerged State.—Yet another method of acquiring of territorial sovereignty is that of a newly emerged State. This is particularly true of those States who were previously the colonies of some States and later on were liberated. After liberation, they acquired territorial sovereignty over that territory.

---

[49] AIR 1990 SC 1962.

[50] Ibid, at p. 1706.

[51] Rahmatullah Khan, "The U. N. Handling of the Kashmir Problem", in Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, Edited by R. P. Anand (1972), p. 108 at p. 118; see also S. K. Kapoor, "The Principle of Self-Determination Under International Law and the Indian Practice," Lawyer, Vol. VIII-11 (1976), p. 168 at pp. 174-175.

[52] Ibid, at p. 115.

In this connection the difficulty is that the territory which was previously a part of another State can acquire sovereignty only after becoming independent. "This abstract difficulty can be resolved by treating the people of the territory, as such, provided that have a sufficient degree of political maturity, as having or acquired sovereignty pending attainment of Statehood. Upon the foundation of the new State, there is simply a crystalization of the situation, territorial sovereignty of the people then becoming that of the State itself." [53]

Modes of Loss of Territory*.—Territory may be lost through the following modes :

(a) Cession.—As pointed out earlier, a territory may be acquired through cession. As one State acquires the territory through cession, the other State loses it.

(b) Operation of Nature.—Sometimes a State may lose its territory through the operation of nature. For example by earthquake a coast of the sea or an island may altogether disappear. Similarly, the change in the course of rivers may also result in the loss of territory.

(c) Subjugation.—As a State may acquire territory through annexation, the other State may lose it through subjugation. But like annexation this is no more a valid mode. For example, Kuwait lost its territory through subjugation by Iraq who declared it to be Iraq's 19th province. The Security Council not only disapproved of Iraq's action but passed a resolution asking all member States of the U. N. not to recognise it. Subsequently, Security Council took action against Iraq under Chapter VII allowing States cooperating with Kuwait to use all means to free Kuwait. Thus Iraq was forced to withdraw from Kurwait.

(d) Prescription.—When a State occupies a particular territory for a long period then it is entitled to acquire it through prescription. On the contrary, the State which had occupation over it earlier may lose it.

(e) Revolt.—When a new State takes birth in consequence of revolution or revolt, then it may be said that the former State has lost its territory. For example in 1579, through revolution Spain lost Netherland. Similarly in 1776 through the War of Independence of America, Great Britain lost the territory of America. Recently, Pakistan lost her territory of East Pakistan as people of the said territory revolted and formed a new State known as Bangladesh.

(f) Dereliction.—The territory may also be lost by dereliction which means by renunciation of a territory. That is to say, a State may slacken its occupation over a territory and in the course of time may lose not only the occupation over it but also sovereignty. Such examples occur very seldom in history.

(g) Granting of Independence to a colony by the Imperialist State.—Yet another mode of losing territory is granting of independence to a colony. This newly emerged State acquires territorial sovereignty and the State which grants independence loses that territory. So will be the case if the colony itself acquires independence.

International Rivers.—Rivers which run through several States are described as 'non-national' rivers. Such rivers are owned by more than one State : each State owns that part of the river which runs through its territory.[54] Rivers which are navigable from the open sea and pass through several States, between their sources and mouths, are called 'International rivers'. They are termed international "because freedom of navigation in time of peace on all such rivers in Europe and on many of them outside Europe for merchantmen of all nationals is recognised by conventional international law.[55] As regards the utilization of flow of waters of non-national and international rivers, [53] Starke, supra 24 at p. 169.

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1981), Q. No. 8(b).

 See also for P.C.S. (1977) Q. No. 9(c); C.S.E. (1987) Q. 8(b).

[54] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. 1, Eighth Edition, pp. 464-465; In the Ninth Edition of Oppenheim's International Law (note 1, at p. 575) such rivers are described as pluri-national (or multinational) rivers.

[55] Ibid, at p. 461. It is significant to note that this rule does not apply to all rivers outside Europe for Oppenheim uses the word "many".

Oppenheim has pointed out that "it is not within the arbitrary power of one of the riparian States for it is a rule of International Law that no State is allowed to alter the natural conditions of its own territory to the disadvantage of the natural conditions of the territory of a neighbouring State. For this reason a State is not only forbidden to stop or divert the flow of a river which runs from its own to a neighbouring State, but likewise to make such use of the water of the river as either cause danger to the neighbouring State or prevents it from making proper use of the flow of the river on its part.[56] But this does not seem to be a correct statement of law. As rightly pointed out by Ian Brownlie : "For the most part the legal regime of rivers, creating rights for other riparian and non-riparian States and limiting the exercise of territorial jurisdiction of individual riparians, depends on treaty. Particularisation of the regimes for various river systems would seem to be inevitable since each system has its own character and technical problems." [57]

On the basis of treaty-practice sometimes broad principles of International rivers have come into existence,[58] but their precise formulation are yet not settled.[59] Thus, "In this field the lawyer has to avoid the temptation to choose rough principles of equity governing relations between riparians reflected in some treaty provisions and the work of jurists and learned bodies, as rules of customary law.[60] Starke also subscribes to this view and has rightly pointed out : "So far as the injurious use of river waters, or the diversion of and interference with the free flow of rivers is concerned, International Law has not advanced to the stage of settled rules in either domain." [61] The utmost that can be said in this connection is that the riparian State should not make any such use of the river water under its control as may cause grievous or irreparable damage of an economic character to other riparian States.[62] Reference may also be made here to the Lake Lanoux Arbitration (France-Spain)[63] wherein the Tribunal, held that "there was no duty on a riparian State under customary International Law to consult, or obtain the prior agreement of a co-riparian as a condition precedent of its right to begin new river work, although in carrying out the project it must take into account, in a reasonable manner, the interests of co-riparian." [64] Thus essentially "such problems of the utilization of rivers by one State to the injury of other States are a matter for treaty arrangement of the settlement by arbitration or conciliation in the most equitable manner." [65]

Reference may also be made here to the Indus Waters Agreement signed on 19th September, 1960 by India, Pakistan, and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for regulating the use of the Waters of Indus, Chenab and Jhelum rivers. This further confirms that in the absence of a treaty or agreement there can be no definite obligation of a riparian State in respect of the use of waters of a river. Reference may also be made here to Article 3 of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties which provides : "In the exploitation of natural resources shared by two or more countries, each State must co-operate on the basis of a system of information and prior consultations in order to achieve optimum use of such resources without causing damage to the legitimate interest of others." * It will be desirable to refer here briefly the background and the controversy that arose before this article was adopted. "Article 3, the subject-matter of which was first suggested by Argentina, became a bone of contention primarily between developing countries............Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ethiopia, Nicaragua and Paraguay voted against this article, and 29 countries including China, France, the United Kingdom, Japan, the Federal Republic of Germany, Guyana, Bhutan and Nepal abstained,..................It has not established what the consultations should relate to, or what their scope should be. It would, in their opinion, give to certain States the right to delay or to dilate or even to veto the utilization by a third Sate of its own natural resources. They considered that Article 3 was not in keeping with the principle of the permanent sovereignty of States over their natural resources and the right of every State to the free and sovereign use of those resources which could brook no restrictions.[66] Further, "This article was considered primarily in the context of river resources though other resources, such as, icthyological and maritime wealth were also referred to Brazil. Paraguay and Bolivia, in particular, drew attention to the Declaration of Asuncion on the Use of International Rivers of 3rd June, 1971, to which Argentina, Bolivia, Paraguay and Uruguay have acceded to, and said that they could have accepted a formulation similar to the one contained in that Declaration which stated : 'In Contiguous rivers, sovereignty is shared and any exploitation of shared their waters must be preceded by a bilateral agreement between the riparian States. 'In rivers or successive course as sovereignty is not shared, each State may utilize its waters in accordance with its needs provided no significant change is caused to another State in the Basin.' Despite the apprehension expressed to the contrary, no delegation said that Article 3 should be interpreted as implying that any State had a right of veto.[67] Thus, there was disagreement about the content and scope of Article 3. The provisions contained in Article 3 are not binding for a number of reasons. In the first place, the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties was adopted by the General Assembly on 12 December, 1974 through resolution 3281 (XXIX). A General Assembly resolution in itself, is not binding. Secondly, there is disagreement in respect of the content, meaning and scope of Article 3. Last but not the least, provisions of Article 3 were not adopted unanimously. But as remarked by the Australian representative, while speaking on the significance of the Economic Charter : "The Charter might have a significant effect on the development of international economic law ; while it could not itself create law, it might influence the opinio juris and decisions by States on what their practice should be in the light of international law.[68]

---

[56] Ibid, at pp. 474-475.

[57] Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Second Edition (Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1973), pp. 264-65.

[58] See Arbitration between France and Spain concerning waters of Lake Lanoux [A.J.I.L. (1959), p. 156].

[59] J. I. Brierly, The Law of Nations, Sixth Edition, p. 231.

[60] Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Second Edition, Clarendon Press, Oxford, (1973), p. 265.

[61] J. G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (1989) p. 194, see also Hyde, International Law, Second Edition (1974), Vol. 1, pp. 565 et seq.

[62] Ibid.

[63] See A.J.I.L., No. 53, (1959), pp. 156-171.

[64] Starke, note 61, p. 194.

[65] Ibid, at pp. 194-195.

* See also for I.A.S. (1977), Q. No. 5.

The Farakka issue*

India has built Farakka Barrage on river Ganges to save the Calcutta port and to improve the lot of millions of people living in Eastern India, Bangladesh demanded uninterrupted flow of Ganga waters all the year round and insisted on India obtaining prior permission before utilizing or diverting any Ganga waters in its own territory. Bangladesh alleged that India made "unilateral withdrawal of water". Instead of settling the issue on bilateral basis, the Bangladesh Government sought to internationalise the issue. India's stand to the issue was that the issue should be settled bilaterally between Bangladesh and India. Its reference to the U. N. would delay the solution of the issue. The problem raised by Bangladesh was of a technical nature involving the fate of the economy of the whole of eastern India. Stressing the importance of the Farakka Barrage to eastern India, the Indian representative said, if Calcutta Port was further silted, the economy of the entire eastern region would be in peril. Further, while Bangladesh needs water only for irrigation, India needs increased flow of Ganga water to save Calcutta port from being choked by silt. On the other hand, Bangladesh contended that Ganga is an international river and demanded equitable sharing of its waters. India refuted this contention by pointing out that for about 90 per cent of course, the river flows through Indian territory and therefore, it cannot be termed as an international river. However, India expressed its willingness to consider sympathetically Bangladesh's requirements and to accommodate them as far as possible. India and Bangladesh agreed to discuss the issue on December, 6, 1976 at Dacca. The Indian team was led by Mr. Jagjiwan Ram the then Minister for Agriculture and Irrigation.

---

[66] P. Chandrasekhra Rao, "Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 351 at p. 362.

[67] Ibid, at pp. 362-363.

[68] Adopted from Ibid, at p. 370, note 76.

* See also for I.A.S. (1977) Q. 5 See also matter discussed above under the heading "International Rivers."

On the basis of above discussion it is doubtful whether river Ganges can be termed as an international river, particularly in view of the fact that for about 90 per cent of course, the river flows through Indian territory. Even if river Ganges is regarded a non-national or 'International river', India was under no obligation to obtain prior consent of Bangladesh for any use of diversion of its waters, although as pointed out by India, Bangladesh's allegation of 'unilateral upstream diversion' of waters was false and baseless. Hence India has not violated any principles of International Law. The utmost that can be said is that India should take into consideration the reasonable requirements of Bangladesh. Even for this India cannot be held guilty because time and again India has expressed its willingness to consider sympathetically the reasonable requirements of Bangladesh. It is an issue to be resolved bilaterally. It may be noted that ultimately good sense prevailed on Bangladesh as it agreed to hold talks with India for which December 6, 1976 was fixed.

As regards Article 3 of the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties, it has been pointed out earlier that it is not binding. Nevertheless, India's conduct is not even against it. Although India is not under obligation to obtain prior consent of Bangladesh yet she has time and again expressed her desire to cooperate "in order to achieve optimum use of such recourses without causing damage to the legitimate interest" of Bangladesh. India not only offered to co-operate with Bangladesh but in fact exhibited generosity. This is evident from the agreement entered into between India and Bangladesh on 30 September, 1977. India went a long way to accommodate the interest of Bangladesh. Some members of the Parliament criticised the agreement as sellout of national interest by India.

Conclusion.—The Farakka issue was a matter which could best be decided bilaterally between India and Pakistan. Talks were held in December, 1976, but with no success. A significant headway was made by the delegations of two Sates during the talks held at Dacca in April, 1977. Since then several rounds of talks were held between the two delegations both at New Delhi and Dacca. Finally, India and Bangladesh signed a comprehensive short and long term agreement on September 30, 1977. The agreement provides for withdrawal by India and Bangladesh during the leanest period—from April 21 to April 30—at the rate of 20,800 cusecs and 34,700 cusecs working out at 37.5 per cent and 62.5 per cent respectively of the minimum flow of 55.500 cusecs at Farakka in the lean season. After the leanest 10-day period, India's share will increase at a higher rate to get as closer to 40,000 cusecs as quickly as possible within the lean season. The rate of withdrawal by India during these periods will increase roughly from 2 per cent to 2.5 per cent. On a long term basis the two States have committed themselves to augment the flow of the Ganga. The Joint Rivers Commission will examine proposals made by either to assess their economic feasibility. These recommendations will then be submitted to the two Governments for their consideration within a five-year time frame. A remarkable feature of the agreement is the decision of both the countries to treat the issue and the implementation of the agreement as a bilateral one. The differences that might arise in the interpretation of the agreement are also to be resolved bilaterally.

Inter-Oceanic Canals

By inter-oceanic canals we mean the canals which connect the international waterways and are available for the shipping of all States. Generally the use and control of such canals are governed by international treaties. The more important of the inter-oceanic canals are discussed below :

Suez Canal.—Suez Canal is the most famous among the inter-oceanic canals. In the beginning, it was under the control of a French Company. Later on it came under the control of British Government. In 1954, Britain and Egypt concluded a treaty whereby Britain withdrew its forces from Suez Canal. The next important event took place in 1956 when Suez Canal was nationalised by Egypt. Egypt contended that it was done to derive money to build Aswan Dam. Thus the Government of Egypt took over complete control of the Inter-occanic canal popularly known as Suez Canal. France, Britain, Israel, etc., reacted strongly against this action of Egypt. They jointly made an armed intervention in Egypt in order to prevent Egypt from nationalising the Suez Canal. The problem was resolved through efforts of Russia, Security Council and General Assembly. Subsequently, an agreement was concluded whereby it was agreed that Suez Canal would remain free from international politics and all the States shall have the right of shipping over this canal. However, the State of Egypt shall be entitled to realise taxes for its use. During the Arab-Israeli conflict, the canal became unsafe for navigation and was closed. On June 6, 1975, the Suez Canal resumed full scale operations.[69]

Keil Canal.—Yet another important inter-oceanic Canal is the Keil Canal which connects Baltic Sea and North Sea. In the beginning, this canal was completely under the control of Germany and was built for the requirements of German armed forces. After the First World War, the position changed significantly in connection with this canal as it was thrown open for all the States. S. S. Wimbledon,[70] is a leading case relating to Keil Canal. Article 380 of the Treaty of Versalles, 1919, provided : "The Keil Canal and its approaches shall be maintained free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations at peace with Germany on terms of entire equality." On 21 March, 1921 the German authorities stopped a British ship, S. S. Wimbledon, on the ground that its cargo comprised of military goods which was being carried to Poland who was at war with Russia at that time. It was also contended by German authorities that if the said ship was allowed passage, it would amount to the violation of the German law of neutrality. The prominent allied powers filed the case in the Permanent Court of International Justice against Germany. The Court held that under Article 380, Germany was under obligation to allow passage to S. S. Wimbledon, through Keil Canal and should make reparation. The position changed significantly after the Second World War and now this canal is open to all States.

Panama Canal.—Panama Canal connects Atlantic Sea with the Pacific Sea. It is a very important canal for commercial and transport purposes. Under treaty of 1903 between Panama and the U. S. this Canal came under the control of the United States of America. After helping Panama to achieve independence in 1903, the United States completed the 82-Km. canal in 1914 and protected it with military bases. During the first and second world wars, the warships of all the States had freedom to pass through this canal. But this freedom lasted till America did not enter the war. Recently, there had been a lot of controversy in between Panama and America in regard to the use and control of this canal. Panama wanted to exercise greater control over this canal. In March, 1973, the Security Council held a special session in Panama. In this session, the Security Council considered the question of the status of Panama Canal. In the Security Council a proposal was brought which would have removed the control of America from this canal, but this proposal was vetoed by America. America, however, wanted to conclude a fresh treaty with Panama in connection with the use and control of this canal. On February 7, 1974, a joint statement was issued by Secretary of State, Henry H. Kissinger and Juan Antonio Tack, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Panama, with respect to the Panama Canal. The Joint statement included a set of principles to serve as guidelines for further negotiation on a new treaty on the Panama Canal.

After prolonged negotiations for more than three years, the U.S.A. and Panama finally signed on 7th September, 1977 two treaties—(i) A treaty guaranteeing the permanent neutrality of the canal, and (ii) A basic treaty governing the use and defence of the canal through December 31, 1999—changing the status of the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone. One of the new treaties provides that the U.S.A. will turn over control of the canal and the Canal Zone to Panama by the end of this century. The other allows the

---

69. See also R. Vasudeo Pillai, "The Suez Crisis and its Lasting Judicial Implications—A Plea for an International Waterways Organisation", A.I.R. 1957 Journal Section, pp. 88-94, 97-102.

70. P.C.I.J. (1923), Series A. No. 1 (1 W.C.R. 163).

United States to defend the strategic waterway, if need be, for an indefinite period. The treaties guarantee the permanent neutrality of the canal. The treaties had to be approved by a plebiscite in Panama and a two-thirds majority vote in the U. S. Senate.[71] It has been rightly pointed out, "Clearly, the new accord is more advantageous to the United States. If the phrase 'in perpetuity' in the original 1903 treaty was an irritant that bedeviled U.S.—Panamanian relations in the preceding years, it has been replaced in the new treaty, the United States will have the right to defend the canal from an attack by a third power even after the treaty runs out in the year 2000. By that time the U. S. bases (fourteen at present) would have been consolidated into three defence complexes and they will be governed by a statute similar to that provided for the U. S. bases in Spain, with the difference that the United Sates will not be paying any rent to Panama specifically for these bases..............The other aspects of treaty admittedly, advantageous to the United States relate to the Canal Zone and the North American employees of the Canal Company............It is for these reasons perhaps, the treaty offers generous financial assistance to Panama under different heads.[72] The American Senate ratified the new treaties on 18th April, 1978. Panama has also ratified the treaties. Thus the problem of future use and control of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone has been amicably settled between Panama and the U. S. On October 1, 1979, the U. S. control over Panama Canal Zone ended. The U. S. will, however, retain five military bases and run the canal itself until 2,000 when all Americans are to be withdrawn on 31st December, 1999. The United States handed over the last military bases in fulfilment of the 1977 Canal treaties. President Moscoso of Panama declared that future national security plans would not include the presence of U.S. armed forces in Panama.

Straits.—According to international law, straits extending to the breadth of 6 miles are considered within the territory of the Coastal State, there is a controversy in regard to the straits which extend beyond 6 miles. But most of the jurists agree that the straits, the breadth of which is within 6 miles are within the territory of the Coastal State. There is no general agreement in this connection. However, it is definite that the straits, which are beyond 6 miles are outside the territory of the Coastal State and they are open to all these States without discrimination during war or peace. The Third U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea has codified the rules of international law relating to Straits used for International navigation.[73]

Bays.—Article 7 (2) of the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone defines a 'bay' as a well-marked indentation whose penetration is in such proportion to the width of its mouth as to contain land-locked waters and constitute more than a mere curvature of the coast. An indentation shall not, however, be regarded as a bay unless its area is as large as, or larger than of the semi-circle whose diameter is a line drawn across the mouth of that indentation. For the purpose of measurement, it is provided that the area of an indentation is that lying between the low-water mark of its natural entrance points. Where, because of the presence of islands, an indentation has more than one mouth, the semi-circle shall be drawn on a line as long as the sum total of the lengths of the lines across the different mouths. Islands within an indentation shall be included as if they were part of the water area of the indentation.[74] If the distance between the low-water marks of the natural entrance points of a bay does not exceed 24 miles, a closing line may be drawn between these two low-water marks, and the waters enclosed thereby shall not be considered as internal waters.[75] Where the distance between the low-water marks of the natural entrance points of a bay exceeds 24 miles, a straight base-line of 24 miles shall be drawn within the bay in such a manner as to enclose the maximum area of water that is possible with a line of that length.[76] It may be noted here that Article 7, as noted above, applies only to bays the coasts of which belong to a single State.[77] Moreover, the foregoing provisions shall not apply to so-called "historic" bays, or in any case where straight baseline system provided in Article 4 of the Convention is applied.[78] It therefore, "leaves room for States to establish sovereign claims to the waters of bays under historic title".[79]

---

[71] For background and the circumstances leading to the conclusion of the two treaties see R. Narayanan and Jayashri Deshpande, "The 'Big Ditch' and the 'Big Stick' : Panama Parleys" Foreign Affairs Reports, Vol. XXVI, No. 9 (September, 1977), pp. 179-200.

[72] Ibid, at p. 198.

[73] See Articles 34 to 45 (Part II) of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 (U. N. Document No. A/CONF, 62/122). See also for detailed study Manjula Shyam, "International Straits and Ocean Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 17.

[74] Section 7 (3).

[75] Section 7 (4).

The U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 has retained the above provisions without any change.[80] As of January, 2015, 167 countries (166 countries plus European Union) have become parties to the convention.

Historic waters.—In the Fisheries case, the International Court of Justice defined 'historic waters' in the following words : "By 'historic waters' are usually meant waters which are treated as internal waters but which would not have that character were it not for the existence of an historic title".[81] The concept of historic bays "is but an enlargement of the doctrine of historic bays which developed much earlier". The doctrine of historic bays gradually emerged during the nineteenth century as the freedom of the high seas principle became established as a fundamental rule of international law............"The concept of historic waters, therefore, is a regime of exception to the general rules of law relating to the delimitation of the maritime domain of State.[82] Further,[83] "The 1958 Territorial Sea Convention has gone a long way to obviate the necessity of claiming certain bays on the basis of an historic title by extending the permissible closing line to 24 miles. As pointed out by McDougal and Burke, the role of historic bays largely disappeared, if the Territorial Sea Convention can be considered as representing a general consensus regarding the maximum permissible close lines.[84] Indeed the 1958 Convention having been ratified by some 30 States including most of the major maritime powers, it does represent a general consensus of the international community regarding the basic principle contained therein; consequently, the concept of historic bay does have a more limited application that it formally did".

In summary of his examination of the question of historic waters, Prof. Donat Pharand aptly puts forward following propositions :

> "1. The concept of historic waters constitutes regime of exception to the general rules of law relating to the delimitation of the maritime domain of a State.
>
> 2. The role of historic waters has largely disappeared since the advent of the 1958 Territorial Sea Convention which extends to 24 miles the permissible closing line for bays and permits use of straight baselines for deeply indented coasts to enclose as internal waters large water areas with possible entrances of over 24 miles.
>
> 3. Historic waters have the status of internal waters and innocent passage does not exist as of right.
>
> 4. Two basic requirements are necessary to support a claim to historic waters : (A) the exercise of exclusive authority and control by the Coastal State over a long period of time; (B) acquiescence by foreign States, particularly those affected by the claim in question.

---

[76] Section 7 (5).

[77] Article 7 (1).

[78] Article 7 (6).

[79] J. G. Starke, An Introduction to International Law, Eighth Edition (1977) p. 236.

[80] See Article 10 of the Convention.

[81] (1951), I.C.J. Rep. 130.

[82] Donal Pharand, "Historic Waters in International Law with Special Reference to the Article", University of Toronto Law Journal, Vol. XXI No. 1 (1971) p. 1 at p. 2.

[83] Ibid. at p. 4.

[84] McDougal and Burke, The Public Order of the Oceans (1972), pp. 357-58.

5. A State may buttress its claim to historic waters by showing that its vital interests are at stake : considerations of geography, economics, and national security may be invoked.
6. The burden of proving the existence of an historic title to certain water areas rests with the State making such claim."[85]

The above propositions represent the present position of law relating to waters.

Indian position.—Section 8 (1) of the Territorial Waters, Continental Shelf, Exclusive Economic Zone and other Maritime Zones Act, 1976, provides that the Central Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, specify the limits of such waters adjacent to its land territory as are the historic waters of India. Section 8 (2) further provides that the Sovereignty of India extends, and has always extended, to the historic waters of India and to the seabed and subsoil underlying, and the air space over such water. The Central Government, through Notification dated 15 January, 1977, notified the limits of the historic waters of India in Palk Strait and Palk Bay,[86] and Gulf of Mannar. The Notification further provided that the historic waters of India in Palk Strait and Palk Bay area of sea are internal waters of India. The historic waters of India beyond the appropriate baseline referred to in Section 3 (2) of the Act in the Gulf of Mannar area of sea have the same status as the territorial waters of India.

Air Space : Various theories regarding Air Space.—N.B.—For this please see Chapter entitled "Air Law (including Aircraft-Hijacking)".

---

[85] Donat Pharand, see supra note 80, at p. 14.

[86] See I.J.I.L., Vol. 16 (1976), pp. 561-62.

CHAPTER 16

THE LAW OF THE SEA

I. Introduction*

As pointed out by McDougal and Burke,[1] "The historic function of the law of the sea has long been recognized as that of protecting and balancing the common interests, inclusive and exclusive of all peoples in the use and enjoyment of the oceans, while rejecting all egocentric assertions of special interests in contravention of general community interest." The classical law of the sea divided the hydrospace into the territorial and the high seas, endowing the former to the coastal state, and keeping the latter free and open to States under the doctrine of the "freedom of the seas." "For more than three centuries, all the law on and about the hydrospace, covering approximately 71.4 per cent of the earth's surface, could be summed up in a simple formula : 'freedom of the seas'. The hallmark of this law, right upto the first half of the twentieth century, was freedom-meaning essentially non-regulation and laissez faire. Apart from a narrow belt of territorial waters with coastal States jurisdiction and a few 'rules of the road' that came to be developed, the whole watery five-sevenths of the globe remained an area of 'no law', free for all to be exploited as they wished, according to the chaotic play of their selfish interests."[2] The classical law of the sea no longer adequately reflects the needs of the international community and is rapidly falling into obsolescence. The once-proud doctrine of 'freedom of the seas' has now fallen on hard time. There was imperative necessity to adapt the traditional doctrine to the present times and circumstances so as to accommodate the interests of all States the developing and the developed.

In the course of time, uses of the sea multiplied resulting in conflicts between the wider claims of coastal States seeking to protect their economic interests over large parts of the sea and attempts by major maritime powers to maintain the status quo on the other. These claims and controversies assumed serious magnitude after the Second World War. With a view to reconcile these claims and resolve controversies, the two U. N. Conferences on the Law of the Sea were held in Geneva in 1958 and 1960. In the first conference, i.e., 1958 Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea, four conventions were adopted—(1) Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone,[3] (2) Convention on the High seas;[4] (3) Convention on Fishing and Conservation of Living Resources;[5] (4) Convention on the Continental Shelf.[6] The second U.N. Conference on the Law of the Sea was held at Geneva in 1960 to fix breadth of the territorial sea but it could not achieve success.

After the two U.N. Conferences on the Law of the Sea, certain developments emerged which considerably changed the situation. In the first place, a large number of new States, mostly in Asia and Africa, emerged. Secondly, rapid progress in science and technology made possible commercial exploitation of mineral and other resources at greater depths of the seabed. One of the most valuable resources on the bottom of the oceans are the black, potato shaped, mineral rich polymetallic nodules, more popularly called manganese nodules. Though containing as many as 40 different metals, the principal components of these nodules are manganese, nickel, copper and cobalt. Thirdly, unprecedented growth in population and demands for higher living standards have intensified demands for food, fuel and other resources. Fourthly, the principal components of polymetalic manganese nodules, namely, nickel, copper, cobalt and manganese are vital minerals for basic industries. Fifthly while a few industrialized countries are the major consumers of these four metals, about 20 countries, most developing, are the major exporters of these minerals.

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1987) Q. 6(a) ; C.S.E. (1994) Q. (6(b).

[1] The Public Order of the Occeans, p. 1; see also "Crisis in the Law of the Sea : Community Perspectives v. National Egoism, 67 Yale L.J. 438-39 (1958).

[2] R. P. Anand, "The Legality of Interim Seabed Mining Regime" Foreign Affairs Reports, Vol. XXIX, No. 2 (February, 1980), p. 29.

[3] See U. N. Doc. A/CONF 13/L-52.

[4] See U. N. Doc. A/CONF 13/L-53.

[5] See U.N. Doc, A/CONF 13/L-54.

[6] See U.N. Doc, A/CONF 13/L-55.

The above reasons, inter alia, made it imperative that the classical or traditional law of the sea must be re-formulated so as to adopt it to the present times and circumstances and to serve the interests of all States. The credit for making the initiative goes to Arvid Pardo of Malta who on August 18, 1967 submitted a request for inclusion in the agenda of the XXII Session of the General Assembly the item concerning the reservation exclusively for peaceful purposes of the Seabed and ocean flour beyond the limits of the present national jurisdiction (i.e., "the Area" and the use of their resources in the interests of mankind.)[7] Although Pardo's initiative was confined to the "Area", in the course of time it became instrumental for the review and reformulation of the entire law of the Sea. In response to the Maltese initiative, the U.N. General Assembly established an Ad Hoc U.N. Seabed committee to study the scope and various aspects of the item submitted by Ambassador Pardo of Malta. Subsequently, this Ad Hoc committee was accorded a permanent status. During the deliberations in the committee it became clear that member States would be satisfied with nothing less than the review and re-formulation of the entire law of the Sea. The next landmark was the adoption, by the General Assembly on December 17, 1970, of the Declaration of Principles Governing the Seabed and Ocean-floor, and the Subsoil thereof, beyond the limits of National Jurisdiction.[8]

Following extensive preparatory work and the development of important principles by the U.N. Seabed Committee, the first session of the Third U.N. Conference on the law of the sea (hereinafter referred as the UNCLOS) was convened in Newyork from December 3 to 15, 1973 and was devoted to organisation and procedural matters. Thereafter ten more sessions were held. Upto the 9th session America actively participated in the conference and most of the provisions of the draft conventions were agreed to by consensus. In the tenth session America informed the conference that it will review the entire draft convention. After staying away the whole of 1981, America proposed many amendments to the already agreed to provisions. These proposals were rejected by the group of 77 countries.

On 30 April, 1982, the conference adopted the draft of the Convention on the Law of the Sea by an overwhelming majority of 130 States. The U.S. and three other States (Israel, Turkey and Venezuela) voted against it and 17 countries including Britain, Belgium, the Netherlands, Italy, West Germany and Soviet Union abstained. It was also decided that the Convention would be signed in September, 1982.

For signing the convention states assembled at U.N. Headquarters for three days beginning from 22 September, 1982. Soviet Union announced that it would sign the convention. There were also indications that some western countries might also sign the conventions. It was, therefore, decided to hold the signing ceremony of the convention from 6 December to 10 December, 1982. Thus states assembled at Mantego Bay (Jamaica) on 10 December, 1982 and 119 States finally signed the Convention on the Law of the Sea. 22 States including America, Britain, West Germany, Italy, Belgium and Japan did not sign the Convention. Thus ended the longest Conference in the history of International Law.

The U.N. Convention on the law of the sea[9] comprises of 320 Articles (divided into XVII parts) and IX annexes. It is a very comprehensive document and covers almost every aspect of the law of the sea. As many as 159 delegations had recorded their participation in the Third U.N. Conference on the Law of the Sea by signing its final Act.

---

[7] See U.N. Doc. A/6695.

[8] See G.A. Res. 2479 (XXV), 17 December, 1970 ; Principles of this Declaration have been mentioned under the heading, "The International Seabed Area".

[9] See U.N. Document No. A/CONF 62/122.

According to Article 308 of the Convention, the Convention shall enter into force 12 months after the date of deposit of the sixtieth instrument of ratification or accession. Once the Convention, enters into force, permanent machinery, notably an International Sea Bed Authority and an International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, will be established to prepare the way for these new bodies, a Preparatory Commission began meeting at Kingston (Jamaica) on 15 March, 1983. The Convention remained open for signature for two years at Jamaican Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Kingston and at U.N. Headquarters. It was closed for signature at both places on 9 December, 1984, but remained open indefinitely for accession.

By 1st November, 1988, the Convention of law of the Sea was signed by 159 States. It obtained 60 ratifications or accessions required for its entry into force with the ratification by Guyana on 16th November, 1993. The convention therefore came into force on 16th November, 1994, i.e. one year after the deposit of the 60th instrument of ratification. By 31st January, 1995, the convention had been ratified, acceded or succeeded by 72 states. But some important developed countries such as the U.S., U.K., Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan and Netherlands concluded on 3 August, 1984 Provisional undertaking regarding deep Sea-bed matters. This has rightly been termed as Mini-treaty, as contrasted with maxi-treaty i.e. the Convention of the Law of the Sea, 1982 and is aimed at erecting an alternative legal regime to facilitate exploitation of deep sea-bed resources on the basis of unilateral legislation. On 1st November, 1988, the General Assembly, through resolution 43/18, called on states that had not done so to consider ratifying or acceding to the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea at the earliest, and to "safeguard the unified character of the Convention and related resolutions". As of 28th January, 2020, 168 countries have ratified the Convention on the Law of the Sea.

A mini-treaty, would clearly be violative of Article 137(3) of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 which provides : "No State or natural or juridical person shall claim, acquire or exercise rights with respect to the minerals recovered from the Area except in accordance with this Part, otherwise no such claim, acquisition or exercise of such rights shall be recognized".

Reference may also be made to the Declaration adopted by the Preparatory Commission on 30 August, 1985.[10] The Preparatory Commission for the International Sea-Bed Authority and for the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea expressed deep concern that some states have undertaken certain actions which undermine the Convention[11] and declared the following :

(a) The only regime for exploration and exploitation of the Area and its resources is that established by the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea and related resolutions adopted by the Third U.N. Conference on the Law of the Sea.

(b) Any claim, agreement or action regarding the Area and its resources undertaken outside the Preparatory Commission which is incompatible with the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea and its related resolutions shall not be recognized.

The Preparatory Commission rejected such claim, agreement or action as a basis for creating legal rights and regards it as wholly illegal.

Thus there was a clear conflict between the Maxi-treaty (i.e., the Convention) and the Mini-treaty. But as noted above as many as 159 States had signed the Convention. As aptly remarked by Dr. M.K. Nawaz, "This raises a fundamental question whether any state in the 20th Century could long afford to go against world-consensus ? That is what it really amounts to as far as deep sea mining, without a licence from the International Sea-Bed Authority, is concerned. Sooner or later all states interested in deep sea mining must eventually fall in line with the Convention".[12]

---

[10] See I.J.I.L., Vol. 25 (1985) p. 358.

[11] See also K.R. Simmonds, "The Status of U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea", I.C.L.Q., Vol. 34 (1985) p. 364.

[12] M.K. Nawaz, "Has the Law of the Sea Convention Run Aground"? I.J.I.L., Vol. 24 (1984) p. 538 at p. 541.

The obstacle for signing the convention by developed states was removed due to the efforts of the Secretary-General of the United Nations on 28th July, 1994 on Agreement Relating to the Implementations of Part XI of the United Nations on the Law of the Sea of 10 December, 1982. This Agreement was adopted by the General Assembly of the U.N. vide its resolution No. 48/263 dated 17th August 1994. While adopting and reproducing the Agreement as Annex to the Resolution, the General Assembly affirmed that the Agreement shall be interpreted and applied together with Part XI as a single instrument. It may also be noted that Article 2 of the Agreement also provides that the provisions of the Agreement and Part XI shall be interpreted and applied together as a single instrument and in the event of any inconsistency between this Agreement and Part XI, the provisions of this agreement shall prevail. As regards entry into force of the Agreement Article 6 of the Agreement provided that the agreement shall enter into force 30 days after the date on which 40 states has established their consent to bound in accordance with articles 4 and 5, provided that such states include at least seven of the states referred to in para 1 (a) of resolution II of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea and that at least five of those states are developed states. If these condition for entry into force are fulfilled before 16 November 1994, this Agreement shall enter into force on 16 November, 1994.

It need not be over emphasized here that the agreement for the implementation of Part XI of the Convention on the Law of the Sea takes into account the concern of the developed states. The obstacle for this signing of the Convention by the developed states having been thus removed, it is hoped that the Convention will be signed and ratified by developed states and also by other states who have not so for signed and ratified it and soon this Convention will become universal in the real sense of the term.

It was hoped that realizing this and in the interests of its wider business community, the U.S. might join the Convention in a near future.[13]

Thus the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 is a great landmark. It "...... is a fact. It exists. Whether or not it becomes a fully operational treaty-signed, ratified, in force, widely supported, generally followed—it is and will be cause of significant effects."[14] The Convention is in fact a comprehensive "constitution" of the oceans embodying hundreds of legal rights and duties for all uses of the sea and accepted a whole by a vast majority of States.[15] Even before the Convention came into force, a large part of it has already became part of customary international law.[16] In case concerning the Continental Shelf (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya/Malta) decided on 3 June 1985, the International Court of Justice aptly observed :

> Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the 1982 Convention is of major importance, having been adopted by an overwhelming majority of States, hence it is clearly the duty of the Court even independently of the references made to the Convention by the parties, to consider in what degree any of its relevant provisions are binding upon the parties as a rule of customary international law.[17]

The Court further added :

> The Court has thus had occasion to note the development which has occurred in the customary law of the Continental Shelf ; and which is reflected in Articles 76 and 83 of the United Convention on the Law of Sea, concerning the relationship between the concept of the Continental Shelf as the natural prolongation of the land territory of the coastal state and the factor of distance from the coast.[18]

---

[13] See R.P. Anand, "U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea and the United States", I.J.I.L., Vol. 24 (1984) pp. 198-199.

[14] Philip Allott, "Power Sharing in the Law of the Sea", AJIL., Vol. 77 (1983) p. 1.

[15] R.P. Anand, note 13, at p. 183.

[16] Ibid, at p. 191.

[17] Para 27 of the Majority Judgment,

[18] Ibid., para 77.

There were, however, some provisions which proved to be an obstacle to universal participation in the convention. A number of industrialized countries objected to mandatory and regulatory approach to deep seabed mining. On 28th July, 1994, the General Assembly of the U.N. adopted the Agreement relating to the implementation of Part XI. It removed the final obstacles to broader participation in the treaty. It addressed particular seabed mining provisions replacing them with general principles geared more towards the emerging global consensus around market-oriented economic principles. The Agreement and Part XI are to be applied together. In case of a conflict between the two, the provisions of the Agreement would prevail.[19]

The General Assembly commemorated the tenth anniversary of the Convention's opening for signature in Montego Bay, Jamaica on 10th December, 1982. and 10th December, 2002 was the 20th anniversary of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982. India ratified the convention on 29th June, 1996. Thus while European Union (on 1 April, 1996), United Kingdom (on 25 July, 1997), Russian Federation (on 12 March, 1997), France (11 April, 1996), Germany (on 14 Oct., 1994) and Australia (including India) have ratified the convention, United States of America has yet not ratified the convention.

Thus the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 is of major importance and its very existence modifies political, economic and legal relationships in countless ways. It has turned the dream of a comprehensive law for the oceans into reality and is one of the greatest achievement of this century.[20]

To date 167 countries and the European Community have become parties to the convention on the Law of the Sea.

19 countries that have signed the convention but not ratified are :

Afghanistan, Bhutan, Brundi, Cambodia, Central African Republic, Colombia, El Salvador, Ethopia, Iran, Democratic Republic of Korea, Libya, Liechtenstein, Malawi, Nigar, Rwanda, Switzerland, Thailand, United Arab Emirates and United States of America.

The Law of Sea Convention has almost become universal. It is now regarded as codification of the customary Law on the Sea.

II. Maritime Belt or Territorial Waters*

Maritime belt or territorial waters is that belt of the sea which is adjacent to the coastal State and over which the coastal State exercises the sovereignty.[21] Coastal State exercises sovereignty not only over the territorial waters, but also over air space over the territorial sea as well as to its bed and sub-soil.[22] According to Article 2(3) of the U.N. Convention on the Law of Sea, 1982, the sovereignty over the territorial waters is exercised subject to the convention and other rules of international law.

Problem of Breadth of Territorial Waters[23]

Maritime belt is that part of the sea over which the coastal States exercise sovereignty. Since the coastal State exercises sovereignty over this part of the sea, there should be a definite limit of the breadth of the maritime belt. There was a great controversy in this connection under international law for considerable period of time. In the view of the famous jurist Bynkershoek, the breadth of maritime belt extends to that distance where a cannon can fire. Up-to eighteenth century, the range of cannon shot was three miles. Hence the cannon shot rule, i.e., 3 miles of maritime belt, became a prevalent principle. According to Grotius, the sovereignty of the coastal State over the maritime belt

---

19. U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXXII, No. 1 (March, 1995) p. 8.
20. Ibid.
* See also for I.A.S. (1968), Q. No. 6 ; I.A.S. (1960), Q. No. 5 ; I.A.S. (1954), Q.N. 6 ; P.C.S. (1975), Q. No. 2(a) ; P.C.S. (1971), Q. No. 4(b) ; I.A.S. (1978), Q. No. 5(a) ; P.C.S. (1985), Q. No. 10(f) ; C.S.E. (1987), Q. 8(a) ; P.C.S. (1988), Q. 10(d) ; P.C.S. (1991) Q. 8(a) ; UPPCS (2003) Q. 7 ; IAS (2007) Q. 8 (a) ; IAS (2008) Q. 8 (c).
21. Article 1 of the Geneva Convention on Territorial Waters and Contiguous Zone, (1958) ; See also Article 2 of U.N. Convention on the Law of Sea, 1982.
22. Article 2, ibid.
23. See also Dr. S. K. Kapoor, "The Problem of the Width of the Territorial Sea. "Lawyer", (August, 1972), p. 121 ; H. Leauterpacht, "Sovereignty over Submarine Areas", BYBIL, Vol. XXVII (1950), pp. 376-433.

should extend only to that area up-to which it can exercise effective control. Another famous jurist, Vattel also subscribed to this view. In the nineteenth century, 3 miles cannon shot rule became very much prevalent. As a result of the scientific inventions and discoveries, the range of cannon shot considerably increased and hence it became necessary to change this rule.

In order to fix the breadth of the maritime belt, first important attempt was made by the League of Nations. The Hague Conference of 1930 made an unsuccessful attempt to obtain consensus of the nations on a specific breadth of the maritime belt. Since International Law could not fix definite breadth of the maritime belt, different countries claimed different breadths of maritime belt. In order to resolve these conflicts, a conference was called in Geneva, Conference on the Law of the Sea, 1958. Different countries put forward the claims of different breadth of maritime belt. This controversy could not be resolved in the Geneva Conference of 1958. In order to resolve this conflict another Conference, known as II U.N. Conference on the Law of the Sea, was called in 1960. In this conference, America presented a compromise formula which provided that the breadth of territorial waters should be 6 miles and beyond these 6 miles the coastal States should be given rights for fishing etc., for another 6 miles. This proposal could not be accepted as it was defeated by a majority of single vote. The claims of different countries, however, showed that this breadth should be in between 3 miles to 12 miles. A large number of States have now subscribed to the view that the breadth of the territorial waters should be 12 miles and it has already become part of international customary law.

The statement that States are completely free in regard to the fixing of the breadth of territorial waters is far from true. In Anglo-Narwegian Fisheries case,[24] the court observed that the States are not completely free in respect of delimitation of territorial waters with regard to other States. The International Court of Justice observed, "The delimitation of the sea areas has always an international aspect, it cannot be dependent merely upon the will of the coastal State as expressed in its municipal law. Although it is true that the act of delimitation is necessarily an unilateral act because only the Coastal State is competent to undertake it, the validity of the delimitation with regard to other States depends upon International law".

The controversy relating to breadth of territorial sea has finally ended with the adoption of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.[25] Article 3 of the Convention provides that every state has the right to establish the breadth of its territorial sea upto a limit not exceeding 12 nautical miles measured from base lines determined in accordance with this convention. Under Article 4, the outer limit of the territorial sea is the line every point of which is at a distance from the nearest point of the baseline, equal to the breadth of the territorial sea.

Rights and Duties of Coastal State* :—

The Coastal State has complete sovereignty over its maritime belt. This sovereignty extends not only on waters of the sea, but also extends over air space and seabed and subsoil of the sea. But according to Article 2 (3) of the convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, the sovereignty over maritime belt is subject to other rules of the convention.

According to Article 15 of the convention, where two coastal states are adjacent to each other, the maritime shall be delimited on the median line to be measured from the base-line from which the width of maritime belt is measured.

Since the coastal state has sovereignty over its maritime belt, the coastal state also exercises penal jurisdiction.

Beside this, according to International Law including the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, any state whether coastal or not, can exercise the right of innocent passage of its ships over maritime belt. According to Article 18 of the convention, innocent passage means, to travel without availing facilities of internal waters or port or to reach internal waters or port and to avail the facilities thereof. The passage must be continuous and immediate.

---

[24] I.C.J. Rep. (1951), p. 116 ; See also for IAS (2001) Q. 8(b).

[25] See U.N. Document No. A/CONF 62/122.

* See also for UPPCS (2003) Q. 7.

For the use of maritime belt by foreign ships, the coastal state can make laws. For example, Territorial Water, Continental Shelf, Exclusive Economic Zone and other maritime Zones Act, 1976 contains provisions in this respect.

Delimitation of Territorial Sea between States with opposite or adjacent coasts

According to Article 15 of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea provides :

"Where the coasts of two states are opposite or adjacent to each other, neither of two states is entitled, failing agreement between them to the contrary, to extend its territorial sea beyond median line every point of which is equidistant from the nearest point on the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial seas of each of the two states is to be measured. The above provision does not apply, however, where it is necessary by reason of historic title or other special circumstances to delimit the territorial seas of the two states in a way which is at variance therewith."

The question of delimitation of territorial sea arises before the International Court of Justice in case Concerning Maritime Delimitation and Territorial Questions Between Qatar and Bahrain (Qatar v. Bahrain). This case was decided by the International Court of Justice on 16th March, 2001. In this case, the world court referred to above Article 15 and pointed out that it is virtually identical to Article 12, paragraph 1, of the 1958 Convention on the Territorial Sea and the contiguous zone and is to be regarded as having a customary character. It is often referred as "equidistance/special circumstances" rule. The most logical and widely practised approach is first to draw provisionally an equidistance line and then to consider whether that line must be adjusted in the light of the existence of special circumstances. Once it is delimited the territorial sea to the parties, the court will determine the rules and principles of customary law to be applied to the delimitation of the rules and principles of customary law to be applied to the delimitation of the parties' continental shelves and their exclusive zones or fishery zones. The court will further decide whether the method to be chosen for this delimitation differs from or is similar to the approach just outlined.[26]

Further, the equidistance line is the line every point of which is equidistant from the nearest points on the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial seas of each of the two states is measured. It can only be drawn when the baselines are known. In this case neither of parties has as yet specified the baselines which are to be used for determination of the breadth of the territorial sea, nor have they produced official maps or charts which reflect such baselines only during the present proceedings have they provided the court with approximate basepoints which in their view could be used by the court for the determination of the maritime boundary.[27] The court will therefore first determine the relevant courts of the parties, from which will be determined the location of the baselines and the pertinent basepoints which enable the equidistance line to be measured.[28]

In this case, Qatar argued that for purpose of this delimitation, it is the mainland-to-mainland method which should be applied in order to construct the equidistance line. It claimed that the motion of "mainland" applies both to Qatar Peninsula, which should be understood as including the main Hawar Island, and to Bahrain, of which the Islands to be taken into consideration are al-Awal (also called Bahrain Island), together with Musharraff and Sitrah. According to Qatar's view, application of mainland-to-mainland method of calculation could also mean that the equidistance line has to be constructed by reference to the high-water line. A clear distinction must be drawn between the determination of the outer limit of the territorial sea of a state or other territorial entity, and the delimitation of a maritime boundary between two states with opposite courts. In Qatar's view, the low-water line is not obligatory as a rule of general application and the use of the high-water line is justified on both technical and legal grounds, precisely in order to achieve an equitable delimitation. Qatar contended in particular that the low-water line is by definition precarious, subjective or even arbitrary in so far as it may vary with time, whereas the high-water line can be drawn in a sure and objective way, being relatively invariable.

---

[26] Para 176 of the judgment dated 16th March, 2001.

[27] Ibid, para 177.

[28] Ibid, para 178.

On the other hand, Bahrain contended that it is a de facto archipelago or multiple-island state, characterised by a variety of maritime features of diverse character and size. All these features are closely inter-linked and together they constitute the State of Bahrain; reducing that state to a limited number of so-called "principal" islands would be a distortion of reality and refashioning of geography. Since it is the land which determines maritime rights, the relevant base-points are situated on all those maritime features over which Bahrain has sovereignty. Bahrain further contended that, according to conventional and customary international law, it is the low-water line which is determinative for the breadth of the territorial sea and for the delimitation of overlapping territorial waters. Finally, Bahrain stated that, as a de facto archipelagic state, it is entitled to declare itself an archipelagic state under Part IV of the 1982 law of the Sea Convention and to draw the permissive baselines of Article 47 of that convention i.e. straight archipelagic baselines joining the outermost points of the outermost islands and drying reefs of the archipelago".

Qatar however, contested Bahrain claim that it is entitled to declare itself an archipelagic state under Part IV of the 1982 Convention, it contends inter alia that Part IV has not become customary law, and that consequently it is not opposable to it.

In its application Qatar had requested the world court :

(i) To adjudge and declare in accordance with international law.

A.(1) That the State of Qatar has sovereignty over the Hawar islands,

(2) That Sibal and Qit' at Jaradh shwals are low-tide elevations are under Qatar sovereignty.

B.(1) That the State of Bahrain has no sovereignty over the island of Janan;

(2) That the State of Bahrain has no sovereignty over Zubarah;

(3) That any claim by Bahrain concerning archipelagic baselines and areas for fishing for pearls and swimming fish would be irrelevant for the purpose of maritime delimitation in the present case;

(II) To draw a single maritime boundary between the maritime areas of sea-bed, subsoil and superjacent waters appertaining respectively to the State of Qatar and the State of Bahrain, that boundary.

On the other hand, Bahrain requested the court to adjudge and declare that :

1. Bahrain is sovereign over Zubarah.
2. Bahrain is sovereign over the Hawar islands, including Janan and Hadd Janan.
3. In view of Bahrain's sovereignty over all the insular and other features, including Fasht ad Dibab and Qit at Jaradah, comprising the Baharains archipelago, the maritime boundary between Bahrain and Qatar, is as in Part two of Bahrain's Memorial Part two of Bahrain's counter Memorial and in reply.

The world court observed that in previous cases the court has made clear that maritime rights derive from coastal state's sovereignty over the land, a principle which can be summarized as "the land dominates the sea".[29]

It is thus the terrestrial situation that must be taken as starting point for the determination of the maritime rights of a coastal state. In accordance with Article 121, paragraph 2, of the 1982 Convention on the law of the sea, which reflects customary international law, islands regardless of their size, in this respect enjoy the same status, and therefore generate the same maritime rights as other land territory.[30]

---

[29] Para 185; see North Sea Continental Shelf, I.C.J. Reports (1969) p. 51, para 96; Aegean Sea Continental Shelf, I.C.J. Reports (1978) p. 36, para 86.

In order to determine what constitutes Bahrain's relevant coasts and what are the relevant baselines on the Bahraini side, the court must first establish which islands come under Bahraini sovereignty.[31]

The legal definition of an island is "a naturally formed area of land surrounded by water, which is above water at high tide" (1958 Convention on the Territorial Sea and contiguous zone, Article 10, para 1, 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea, Article 121, para 1.)

According to the relevant provisions of the conventions on the Law of the Sea, which reflect customary international law, a low-tide elevation is a naturally formed area of land which is surrounded by and above water a low-tide but submerged at high-tide (1958 Convention on the territorial sea and the contiguous zone, paragraph 1 of Article 11, 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea, paragraph 1 of Article 13.

Under these provisions, the low-water line of a low-tide elevation may be used as the baseline for measuring the breadth of the territorial sea if it is situated wholly or partly at a distance not exceeding the breadth of the territorial sea from the mainland or an island. If a low-tide elevation is wholly situated at a distance exceeding the breadth of the territorial sea, it has no territorial sea of its own. The above mentioned conventions further provide that straight baselines shall not be drawn to and from low-tide elevations, unless lighthouses or similar installations which are permanently above sea level have been built on them. (1958 Convention, para 3 of Article 4, 1982 Convention).

According to Bahrain this is the case with low-tide elevations which are relevant in the present case for the delimitation process.[32]

When a low-tide elevation is situated in the overlapping area of the territorial sea of two states, whether with opposite or with adjacent coasts, both states in principle are entitled to use its low-water line for the measuring of the breadth of their territorial sea. The same low-tide elevation then forms part of the coastal configuration of the two states that is so even if the low-tide elevation is nearer to the coast of one state then to the other, or nearer to an island belonging to one party than it is to the mainland coast of the other for delimitation purposes the combating rights derived by both coastal states from the relevant provisions of the law of the sea would by necessity seem to neutralize each other.[33]

The few existing, rules do not justify a general assumption that low-tide elevations are territory in the same sense as islands. It has never been disputed that islands constitute terra firma, and are subject to the rules and principles of territorial acquisition; the difference in effects which the law of the sea attributes to islands and low-tide elevations is considerable. It is thus not established that in the absence of other rules and legal principles, low-tide elevations can, from the view point of the acquisition of sovereignty be fully assimilated with islands or other land territory.[34]

Further, the rule is that a low-tide elevation which is situated beyond the limits of the territorial sea does not have a territorial sea of its own. A low-tide elevation, therefore, as such does not generate the same rights as island or other territory. Moreover, it is generally recognized and implicate in the words of the relevant provisions of the conventions on the law of the sea that, whereas a low-tide elevation which is situated within the limits of the territorial sea may be used for determination of its breath, this does not hold for a low-tide elevation which is situated less than 12 nautical miles from that low-tide elevation but is beyond the limits of the territorial sea.[35]

---

[30] Para 185; see North Sea Continental Shelf, I.C.J. Reports (1969) p. 51, para 96; Aegean Sea Continental Shelf, I.C.J. Reports (1978) p. 36, para 86.

[31] Para 186.

[32] Para 201.

[33] Para 202.

[34] Para 206

[35] Para 207.

Paragraph 3 of Article 4 of the 1958 general convention on the Territorial Sea and the contiguous zone and paragraph 4 of Article 7 of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea provide that straight baselines shall not be drawn to and from low-tide elevations unless light houses or similar installations which are permanently above sea level have been built on them. These provisions are another indication that low-tide elevations cannot be equated with islands, which under all circumstances qualify base-points for straight baselines.[36]

The court, consequently is of the view that in the present case there is no ground for recognizing the right of Bahrain to use as a baseline the low-water line of those low-tide elevation which are situated in the zone of overlapping claims, for recognizing Qatar as having such a right. The court accordingly, concludes that for the purposes of drawing the equidistance line, such low-tide elevation must be disregarded.[37]

According to Bahrain, as a multiple island state characterized by a cluster of islands of the court of its main islands, it is entitled to draw a line connecting the outermost islands and low-tide elevations. According to Bahrain, in such cases the external fringe should serve as the baseline for the territorial sea.[38] But the court observed that the method of straight baselines, which is an exception to the normal rules for the determination of baselines, may only be applied if a number of conditions are met. The method must be applied restrictively. Such conditions are primarily that either the coastline is deeply indented and cut into, or that there is a fringe of islands along coast in its immediate vicinity.[39] The fact that a state considers itself a multiple island state or a de facto archipelagic state does not allow it to deviate from the normal rules for the determination of baselines unless the relevant conditions are met. The coasts of Bahrains main islands do not form a deeply indented coast, nor does Bahrain claim this. It contends, however, that the maritime features off the coast of the main islands may be assimilated to a fringe of islands which constitute a whole with the mainland.[40]

The court, therefore, concluded that Bahrain is not entitled to apply the method of straight baselines. Thus each maritime feature has its own effect for the determination of the baselines, on the understanding that, on the grounds set out before, the low-tide elevations situated in the overlapping zone of territorial seas will be disregarded. It is on this basis that the equidistance line must be drawn.[41]

On the basis of the above observations, inter alia, the World Court drew the equidistance line between Qatar and Bahrain and held the following :

(1) that the State of Qatar has sovereignty over Zubarah (unanimously);

(2) that the State of Bahrain has sovereignty over the Hawar Islands.

(3) the State of Qatar enjoys the territorial sea of Baharain separating the Hawar Islands from the other Bahraini islands the right of innocent passage accorded by customary international law (unanimously)

(4) the State of Qatar has sovereignty over Janan Island including, Hadd Janan (13 votes to four)

(5) that the State of Bahrain has sovereignty over the island of Qit' at Jaradah (12 votes to five)

(6) that the low-tide elevation of Fasht ad Dibal falls under the sovereignty of State of Qatar (unanimously)

(7) that the single maritime boundary that divides the various maritime zones of the State of Qatar and the State of Bahrain shall be drawn as indicated in para 250 of the judgement.

---

[36] Para 208.

[37] Para 209.

[38] Para 211.

[39] Para 212.

[40] Para 213.

[41] Para 215.

Indian position* —Upto 1956, India recognised 3 miles of territorial waters but in that year, it was extended to 6 miles by Presidential Proclamation and later on it was extended to 12 miles in 1967. The main reason for this extension was that it was discovered that India's territorial waters contained huge quantities of thorium.[42] In 1976 Article 297 of the Constitution was amended by Fortieth Amendment of the Constitution of India.[43] According to the amended Article 297, all lands, minerals and other things of value underlying the ocean within the territorial waters, or the continental shelf, or the exclusive economic zone of India shall vest in the Union and be held for the purposes of the Union.[44] It is also provided that the limits of territorial waters, the continental shelf, the exclusive economic zone, and other maritime zones of India shall be such as may be specified, from time to time, by or under any law made by Parliament.[45] In the same year the Parliament passed the Territorial Waters, Continental Shelf, Exclusive, Economic Zone and other Maritime Zones Act, 1976[46]. According to the Act, the limit of the territorial waters is the line every point of which is at a distance of twelve nautical miles from the nearest point of the appropriate base line.[47] Thus India's position corresponds to the rule adopted in the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982. India has signed the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

Innocent Passage.—Although 1958 Geneva Conference on the Law of the Sea failed to fix a definite breadth of territorial waters yet it laid down certain important principles in this connection. The 1958 Convention on the Territorial Waters and Contiguous Zones made it clear that the coastal State exercises sovereignty over the territorial water. But this is subject to certain exceptions. For example, the ships of other States are entitled to get passage through this part of the sea. In other words, we may say that although the coastal State exercises sovereignty over this part of the sea, yet it is the duty of the coastal State to provide innocent passage to the ships of other States. Moreover, it has also to provide facilities for laying cables, etc. In short, we may say that the coastal State exercise sovereignty over this part of the area and exercises general control over this area, but for international transport and communication some facilities are provided to other States. In Corfu Channel case,[48] the International Court of Justice ruled that during peace time the warships of the other States may pass through the territorial waters of a State. In this case, the Court ruled that Albania was guilty of causing loss to the British ships by firing at them or otherwise by laying mines in that part of the sea and it was, therefore, a clear violation of international law and the Court gave its verdict that Albania should pay appropriate compensation to Britain for this violation. Thus it is a well-recognised principle of customary International Law that foreign merchant vessels have a right of 'innocent passage' through the territorial waters.[49] The law in this connection was codified in the Geneva Convention on the Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone, 1958. Section III of which (comprising of Articles 14 to 23) deals with the right of innocent passage. Article 14 provides that ships of all States, whether coastal or not, shall enjoy the right of innocent passage through the Territorial Sea. Article 17 of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 also provides that subject to this Convention, ships of all states, whether coastal or landlocked enjoy the right of innocent passage through the territorial sea. Passage means navigation through the Territorial Sea for the purpose either of traversing that Sea without entering internal waters, or of proceeding to internal waters, or making for the high seas forms internal waters. Passage includes stopping and anchoring but only in so far as the same are incidental to or are rendered necessary by force majeure or by distress.[50] Passage is innocent so long as it is not prejudicial to the peace, good order or security of the coastal State such passage shall take place in conformity with these articles and with other rules of International Law.[51] Further, passage of foreign fishing vessels shall not be considered innocent if they do not observe such laws and regulations as the coastal State may make and publish in order to prevent these vessels from fishing in the territorial sea. Submarines are required to navigate on the surface and to show their flag. It is also provided that the coastal State must not hamper innocent passage through the territorial sea. The coastal State is, however, required to give appropriate publicity to any dangers to navigation, of which it has knowledge, within its territorial sea.[52] Article 16 of the Geneva Convention empowers the coastal State to take necessary steps in its territorial sea to prevent passage which is not innocent. Further, foreign ships exercising the right of innocent passage shall comply with the laws and regulations enacted by the Coastal State in conformity with the Convention and other rules of International Law and, in particular, with such laws and regulations relating to transport and navigation.[53]

---

* See for IAS (1976), Q. No. 9(V).

[42] See K.P. Mishra, "Territorial Sea in India", 6 I.J.I.L., p. 470; see also statement of India's representative (Dr. Pannikkar) in Sub-committee of the Peaceful Uses of the Sea-bed and Ocean Floor Beyond the Limits of National Jurisdiction, 17 Aug., 1971 (U.N. Doc. A/C 1331 S.C. II Sr. 16, pp. 13-17) appearing in I.J.I.L., Vol. II (July, 1971), pp. 343-48.

[43] See Gazette of India, 27-5-1976, Part II-S I, Ext., p. 639; see also A.I.R. 1976 Journal section, pp. 225-26.

[44] Article 297 (1).

[45] Article 297 (3).

[46] It received the assent of the President on 25-8-1976 : For the text of the Act : See Gazette of India 26-8-76. Part II-S. I., Ext., p. 1067; see also A.I.R. 1976, Journal Section, pp. 268-72.

[47] Section 3(2).

 See also for C.S.E. (1994) Q. 7 (c).

[48] I.C.J. Rep. (1949), p. 4.

[49] J.G. Starke, An Introduction to International Law, Eighth Edition (1977), p. 232.

It may be noted here that the 1958 Geneva Convention on Territorial Sea and the Contiguous Zone is conspicuous by its silence in respect of foreign nuclear powered ships and ships carrying nuclear or other inherently dangerous or noxious substance. The United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, has taken into account this matter and hence in Article 23 it is provided that foreign nuclear powered ships and ships carrying nuclear or other inherently dangerous or noxious nuclear substance shall, when exercising the right of innocent passage through the territorial sea carry documents and observe special precautionary measures established for such ships by international agreements. Obviously, it is far from satisfactory to ensure, peace, good order and security of the coastal State but it is only this provision which most of the States seemed to agree upon. As regards the duties of the coastal State, Article 24 of the 1982 convention provides that the coastal State shall not hamper the innocent passage of foreign ships through the territorial sea except in accordance with this convention. In particular in the application of this convention or of any laws or regulations adopted in conformity with this convention, the coastal State shall not : (a) impose requirement on foreign ships which have the practical effect of denying or impairing the right of innocent passage ; or (b) discriminate in form or in fact against the ships of any state or against ships carrying cargoes to, from or on behalf of any State. Further, the coastal State shall give appropriate publicity to any danger to navigation, of which it has knowledge, within its territorial sea.

---

[50] Some little change has been brought about in this provision by the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982; Article 18(2) of the convention provides : "Passage shall be continuous and expeditious. However, passage includes stopping and anchoring, but only in so far as the same are incidental to ordinary navigation or are rendered necessary by force majeure or distress or for the purpose of rendering assistance to persons, ships or aircraft in danger or distress."

[51] Article 19(2) of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea has clarified and elaborated it by providing the following : Passage of a foreign ship shall be considered to be prejudicial of the peace, good order or security of the State, if in the territorial sea it engages in any of the following activities : (a) Any threat or use of force against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of the coastal State, or in any other manner in violation of the principles of international law embodied in the Charter of the United Nations; (b) Any exercise or practice with weapons of any kind; (c) Any act aimed at collecting information to the prejudice of the defence or security of the coastal State ; (d) Any act of propaganda aimed at affecting the defence or security of the coastal State ; (e) The launching or taking on board any aircraft ; (f) The launching, landing or taking on board any military device ; (g) The embarking or disembarking of any commodity, currency or person contrary to the customs, fiscal, immigration or sanitary regulations of the coastal State ; (h) Any act of wilful and serious pollution, contrary to the present convention; (i) Any fishing activities ; (j) The carrying out of research of survey activities ; (k) Any act aimed at interfering with any systems of communication or any other facilities or installations of the coastal State ; (1) "Any other activity not having a direct bearing on passage".

[52] Article 15(1) of the Geneva Convention on the Territorial Sea and Contiguous Zone, 1958 ; In Corfu Channel Case (Merits), I.C.J. Reports (1949) 4 et seq : it was held that during times of peace, warships are entitled to innocent passage through such parts of the territorial waters as from international highway. To quote the words of the World Court : "It is, in the opinion of the Court, generally recognised and in accordance with International custom that States in time of peace have a right to send their warship through straits used for International Navigation between two parts of the high seas without the previous authorization of a coastal State, provided that the passage is innocent. Unless otherwise prescribed in an international convention, there is no right for a coastal State to prohibit such passage through Straits in time of peace".

[53] Article 17, ibid.

Indian Position.—In the Territorial Waters, Continental Shelf, Exclusive Economic Zone and other Maritime Zones Act, 1976, Article 4 provides for the use of territorial waters by foreign ships. It provides that without prejudice to the provisions of any other law for the time being in force all foreign ships (other than warships including submarines and other under water vehicles) shall enjoy the right of innocent passage through the territorial waters.[54] Foreign warships including submarines and other underwater vehicles may enter or pass through the territorial waters after giving prior notice to the Central Government provided that submarines and other underwater vehicles shall navigate on the surface and show flag while passing through such waters. It is further provided that the Central Government may, if satisfied that it is necessary so to do in the interests of peace, good order or security of India or any part thereof, suspend, by notification in the Official Gazette, whether absolutely or subject to such exceptions and qualifications as may be specified in the notification, the entry of all or any class of foreign ships into such area of the territorial waters as may be specified in the notification. Lastly, India is one of the signatories of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

III. Contiguous Zone*

Contiguous zone is that part of the sea which is beyond and adjacent to the Territorial Sea of the coastal State. According to Article 33 of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 : "In a zone contiguous to its territorial sea, the coastal State may exercise the control necessary to—(a) prevent infringement of its customs, fiscal, immigration or sanitary regulations within its territory or territorial sea ; (b) punish infringement of the above regulations committed within its territory or territorial Sea". Thus the contiguous zone imposes certain restrictions on the freedom of the high seas. Further, contiguous zone may not extend beyond 24 nautical miles baseline from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured.

Indian Position.—India's position is in conformity with the above provisions. India is one of the signatories of the U.N. Convention of the Law of the Sea, 1982.

Distinction between Maritime Belt and Contiguous Zone.—Maritime Belt extends upto 12 nautical miles from the baseline. The coastal state has complete sovereignty over its maritime belt and extends not only to its waters but also to airspace above it and seabed and subsoil thereof. The coastal state also exercises penal jurisdiction over it. This sovereignty is only subject to the exception of giving innocent passage to foreign ships. The contiguous zone extends upto 24 nautical miles to be measured from the baseline from which maritime belt is measured. Since maritime belt extends to 12 miles, contiguous zone extends 12 miles further from the maritime belt.

IV. Straits Used for International Navigation.—As noted above, in Corfu Channel case (1949) the International Court of Justice has held that states in time of peace have a right to send their ships through straits used for International navigation between two parts of the sea without the previous authorization of a coastal State, provided that the passage is innocent. The same rule has been adopted in the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982. As regards straits which are used for international navigation between one part of the high seas or an exclusive economic zone and another part of the high seas or an exclusive economic Zone, Article 38 of the Convention provides that all ships and aircraft shall enjoy the right of transit passage, which shall not be impeded, except that, if the strait is formed by an island of a state bordering the strait and its mainland, transit passage shall not apply if there exists seaward of the island a route through the high seas or through an exclusive economic zone of similar convenience with respect to navigational and hydrographical characteristics. Further, transit means the exercise of the freedom of navigation and over flight solely for the purpose of continuous and expeditious transit of the strait between one part of the high seas or an exclusive economic zone and another part of the high seas or an exclusive economic zone. However, the requirement of continuous and expeditious transit does not preclude passage through the strait for the purpose of entering, leaving or returning from a State bordering the strait, subject to the conditions of entry to that state.

---

[54] Explanation to section 4(1) adds that for the purposes of this section, passage is innocent so long as it is not prejudicial to the peace, good order or security of India.

* See also for I.A.S. (1960), Q. No. 5 ; P.C.S. (1964), Q. 9(b) ; C.S.E. (1987), Q. 8(a) ; P.C.S. (1988), Q. 10(d).

As regards duties of ships and aircraft during transit passage, Article 39 provides the following :

(1) Ships and aircraft, while exercising the right of transit passage, shall : (a) proceed without delay through or over the strait ; (b) refrain from any threat or use of force against the sovereignty, territorial integrity or political independence of states bordering the strait or in any other manner in violation of the principles of international law embodied in the charter of the United Nations ; (c) refrain from any activities other than those incidental to their normal modes of continuous and expeditious transit unless rendered necessary by force majeure or by distress ; (d) comply with relevant part of Part III of the Convention.

(2) Ships in the transit passage shall : (a) comply with generally accepted international regulations, procedures and practices for safety at sea, including the international regulations for preventing collisions at sea ; (b) comply with generally accepted international regulations, procedures and practices for the prevention, reduction and control of population from ships.

(3) Aircraft in transit passage shall : (a) observe the Rules of the Air-established by the International Civil Aviation Organization as they apply to Civil aircraft ; state aircraft will normally comply with such safety measures and will at all times operate with due regard for the safety of navigation ; (b) at all times monitor the radio frequency assigned by the competent internationally designated air traffic control authority or the appropriate international distress radio frequency.

The Convention makes provision for laws and regulation of states bordering straits relating to transit passage. Further, foreign ships exercising the right of transit passage have to comply with such laws and regulations.[55] As regards duties of States bordering straits, Article 44 of the convention provides that states bordering straits shall not hamper transit passage and shall give appropriate publicity to any danger to navigation or over flight within or over the strait of which they have knowledge. There shall be no suspension of transit passage. Further, the provisions relating to innocent passage discussed earlier shall apply in straits used for international navigation : (a) excluded from the application of the regime of transit passage under Article 38; (b) between a part of the high seas or an exclusive economic zone and the territorial sea of a foreign state. There shall be no suspension of innocent passage through such straits.[56] Last but not the least, the regime of passage through straits used for international navigation thus established shall not in other respects affect the legal status of the waters forming such straits or the exercise by the states bordering the straits of their sovereignty or jurisdiction over such waters and their air space, bed and sub-soil. But the sovereignty or jurisdiction of states bordering the straits is exercised subject to Part III of the Convention and to other rules of international law.[57]

---

[55] Article 42.

[56] Article 45.

[57] Article 34.

V. Archipelagic Waters of an Archipelagic State

An "archipelagic State" means a state constituted wholly by one or more archipelogs and may include other islands.[58] "Archipelago" means a group of islands, including parts of islands, inter-connecting waters and other natural features which are so closely inter-related that such islands, waters and other natural features form an intrinsic geographical, economic and political entity or which historically have been regarded as such.[59] An archipelagic state may draw straight archipelagic baselines joining the outermost points of the outermost islands and drying reefs of the archipelago provided that within such baselines are included the main island and an area in which the ratio of the area of the water to the area of the land, including atolls, is between 1 to 1 and 9 to 1.[60] The length of such baselines shall not exceed 100 nautical miles, except that up to 3 per cent. of the total number of baselines enclosing any archipelago may exceed that length, up to a maximum length of 125 nautical miles.[61]

Article 48 of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, provides that the breadth of the territorial sea, the contiguous zone, the Exclusive Economic zone and the continental shelf shall be measured from archipelagic baselines drawn in accordance with Article 47. As regards baselines, Article 47 provides the drawing of such baselines shall not depart to any appreciable extent from the general configuration of the archipelago. Such baselines shall not be drawn to and from low-tide elevations, unless lighthouses or similar installations which are permanently above sea level have been built on them or where a low-tide elevation is situated wholly or partly at a distance not exceeding the breadth of the territorial sea from the nearest island. Further, the system of such baselines shall not be applied by an archipelagic state in such a manner as to cut off from the high seas or the exclusive economic zone the territorial sea of another state.

As regards the legal status of archipelagic waters, Article 49 of 1982 convention provides, the sovereignty of an archipelagic state extends to the water enclosed by the archipelagic baselines drawn in accordance with Article 47, described as archipelagic waters, regardless of their depth or distance from the coast. This sovereignty extends to the air space over the archipelagic waters, as well as to their bed and sub-soil, and the resources contained therein. Article 50 provides that within its archipelagic waters, the archipelagic state may draw closing lines for the delimitation of internal waters, in accordance with Articles 9, 10 and 11.

Article 52 provides that ships of all states enjoy the right of innocent passage through archipelagic waters. However, the archipelagic state may, without discrimination in form or in fact among foreign ships, suspend temporarily in specified areas of its archipelagic waters the innocent passage of foreign ships of such suspension is essential for the protection of its security. Article 53 further provides that an archipelagic state may designate sea lanes and air routes thereabove, suitable for the continuous and expeditious passage of foreign ships and aircraft through or over its archipelagic waters and the adjacent territorial sea. All ships and aircrafts enjoy the right of archipelagic sea lanes passage in such sea lanes and air routes.

Nature of Archipelagic Waters and Distinction with Territorial Waters and Inland Waters

While in some respects archipelagic waters resemble internal waters and territorial waters, in certain other respects they are different from such waters. The archipelagic waters resemble the territorial waters in so far as the sovereignty of the archipelagic state over the resources of the water column and the sea-bed and sub-soil is subject to the right of innocent passage in favour of foreign vessels and it is in this respect that it is distinct from the internal waters. But these waters are distinct from the territorial waters because of the extensive control and limitation of this passage by the archipelagic state.[62] Further, the right of innocent passage in case of archipelagic state is distinct from the right of innocent passage in case of territorial waters. "The right of passage through archipelagic waters is more limited than the right of innocent passage through the territorial sea at least in the three respects : (i) there is no express provision for the right of ships to stop and anchor where such stops and anchoring are incidental to ordinary passage or are required by reasons of force majeure ; (ii) the right of the coastal state to designate sea lanes and prescribe traffic separation scheme means that foreign vessels have less freedom than in passage through the territorial sea ; and (iii) the right of the coastal state in respect of warship that does not comply with its laws and regulations concerning passage extends beyond suspension and a request to leave the archipelago sea, to prohibiting the passage of such warships through its archipelagic sea for any length of time ....[63]. As regards the right of passage of foreign vessels through international straits, while in territorial sea foreign vessels possess a special right of passage through international straits under customary and under the Geneva Convention of 1958, such rights cover warships including sub-marines which need not surface and cannot be suspended by the coastal State.

---

[58] Article 46(a) of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

[59] Article 46(b), ibid.

[60] Article 47(1).

[61] Article 47(2).

The concept of archipelagic waters is also distinct from the internal waters. "No right of innocent passage is generally conceded in the case of internal waters. In case of archipelagic waters, such a right is recognized in principles, on the other hand, it would seem that the regime of archipelagic waters proposed by the archipelagic states is more akin to that of the territorial sea, although in some respects there are differences in the right of innocent passage conceded the special right of passage through international straits is not recognized." [64]

Thus while the archipelagic waters resemble in certain respects with internal waters and territorial waters, they are clearly distinct from both in certain respects. The territorial sea of an archipelagic state can be delimited only when we first determine the extent of archipelagic waters. Thus the area reserved as the common heritage of mankind, i.e. the International Sea-bed Area, as well as the area of the high seas, will be diminished for as against the straight baseline of a single island, straight baseline of an archipelago will result in enclosing a larger part of the sea to be called archipelagic waters. But the inclusive claims of the International community had to concede this much for the exclusive claims of the archipelagic states. This was also necessary because the success of the third U.N. Conference on the Law of the Sea depended upon the acceptance of the package deal and one of the important parts of the package was the acceptance of the claims of the archipelagic states.

VI. Continental Shelf*

Though the geographical and geological concept of the Continental Shelf is quite an old one, the legal concept of the Continental Shelf which was fore-shadowed to some extent, by the U.K. Venezuela Treaty of 1942 providing for the division of gulf of Paria came into limelight since Truman Proclamation of 1945. In the Truman Declaration of 1945, it was declared that the United States considered the resources of the Shelf contiguous to the U.S. as "appertaining to the U.S. and subject to its jurisdiction and control." It was, however, made clear that this was in no way to affect the character of the high sea above the shelf. The said Declaration did not define the continental shelf. A subsequent U.S. State Department press release (dated 18th Sept., 1945), therefore defined it as "submarine land which is contiguous to the continent and which is covered by no more than 100 fathoms of water." Another significant thing to be noted in connection with the said proclamation is that it rejected the concept of the Continental Shelf as res ominiam communis and also avoided to make the basis of its right on the concept of the Continental Shelf as res nullis and justified it on the ground that since the Continental Shelf is the submarine extension of the coastal State, the latter has reasonable right to have jurisdiction on it.

---

[62] C.F. Amarsinghe, "The Problem of Archipelagos in International Law of the Sea," I.C.L.Q., Vol. 23, Part 3 (July, 1974), p. 539 at p. 552.

[63] Ibid, at pp. 554-555.

[64] Ibid.

* See also for I.A.S. (1960), Q. No. 5 ; I.A.S. (1956), Q. No. 4 ; P.C.S. (1974), Q. No. 10(b) ; P.C.S. (1964), Q. No. 9(b) ; I.A.S. (1978) Q. 5(b) ; P.C.S. (1982), Q. No. 7(a) ; P.C.S. (1985), Q. No. 10(f) ; IAS (2002) Q. 5(c) ; IAS (2003) Q. 6(b) ; IAS (2007) Q. 7(a) ; IAS (2008) Q. 8(c).

Being encouraged by the American Proclamation certain other States made similar proclamations, for example Mexico in 1945, Argentina in 1945, Chile in 1947 and Peru, etc. made similar proclamations. These proclamations necessitated that a definite shape and form should be given to the International law relating to the Continental Shelf, because it was feared that in the absence of definite International Law on the point different countries of the world might occupy large portions of sea-bed and incorporate them into their territory.[65] In order to develop and codify definite rules of International Law relating to the Continental Shelf and other aspects of the law of the sea a conference was called at Geneva in 1958. After the discussion over different aspects of the problem a Convention known as Convention of Continental Shelf, 1958 was adopted. This convention has defined the term 'continental shelf' in the following words :

> "The Continental Shelf is—(a) the sea-bed and sub-soil of the submarine areas adjacent to the coast, but outside the area of the territorial sea to a depth of 200 metres or beyond that limit to where the depth of superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources of the said areas ; (b) to the sea-bed and sub-soil of similar submarine areas adjacent to the coast of island".

It may be noted that instead of giving a definite form and certainty to the international law relating to the Continental Shelf, the definition adopted in the said convention made the matters more complicated. The definition of Continental Shelf in Art. I of the Geneva Convention is ambiguous and inadequate.

Criticism of the definition of Continental Shelf adopted to Geneva Convention of 1958.—The obvious reason for this definition was that by 1958 the scientific development was not capable of exploring and exploiting the resources beyond the depth of 200 metres. Science has developed by leaps and bounds from 1958 to the present day. Now science and technology have advanced so much so that minerals and oils can be exploited and extracted from the depth of thousands of feet of the oceans. It was feared, and rightly too, that if a clear definition and delimitation of the Continental Shelf were not made at the earliest possible time, the whole sea-bed might be partitioned by the advanced countries among themselves. Moreover, for the establishment of a regime of sea-bed beyond the limits of national jurisdiction, it was necessary first to define and delimit it from other maritime zones. But this in its turn was contingent upon a workable definition of the continental shelf.

The definition of Continental Shelf contained in Art. 1 of the Geneva Convention, 1958, contains the three elements : (1) Adjacency, (2) Depth, and (3) Exploitability.[66] According to Juraj Andrassy,[67] five criteria can be taken as bases for delimitation of Continental Shelf. They are : (1) the other limits of the shelf as defined for geological purposes ; (2) a pre-determined distance from the coast ; (3) a pre-determined depth or isobath; (4) an exploitability test ; (5) an adjacency test. The practice of the States shows that they do not consider all these elements essential. On the contrary, they take it as alternative criteria for example, advanced countries lay more emphasis on the exploitability. It is quite obvious that the advanced countries can very well exploit the resources of the sea-bed up to the depth of thousands of feet. Thus, "The fatal flaw of [65] See Daniel S. Cheever, "The Role of International Organisation in Ocean Development", Int.-Organ., Vol. XXIII, No. 3 (Summer 1968), p. 645; see also W. Friedmann, The future of the Oceans Chs. 7 and 8 (1971) ; R.L. Friedheim and J.B. Kadane with J.K. Gamble, Jr., "Quantitative Content Analysis of the U.N. Sea-bed Debate : Methodology and a Continental Shelf case study", Ins. Orgn. Vol. XXIV, (Summer 1970), p. 479 at p. 491.

---

[66] See for example, "Whose is the Bed of the Sea?" Address by Ambassador Pardo, Permanent Representative of Malta to U.N., Proc. ASIL, April, 25-27 (1968), p. 219.

[67] Juraj Andrassy, International Law and the Resources of the Sea (Columbia University Press, 1970), p. 76.

Article 1 of the Continental Shelf Convention is surely one of the most disastrous clause ever inserted in a treaty of vital importance to mankind." [68] "Unfortunately, although the above interpretation is improper, the precise limits of the Continental Shelf and the appropriate circumstances for applying the exploitability test are unknown, and the adjacency test has never been clearly explained. Until these uncertainties are settled, and an interpretation offering definite boundaries proposed, there is a risk that man's need for precision will encourage him to accept the literal reading of the exploitability test as authoritative. The best way to avoid this possibility would be to redraft Article 1." [69] It may also be noted here that although the concept of legal shelf is different from the geological concept of the shelf, yet the former cannot be altogether divorced from the latter.[70] Obviously, the definition of Continental Shelf as adopted in Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, 1958, has not been derived from the geological concept of the time.[71]

Impact of North Continental Shelf cases (1969) on the concept and definition of Continental Shelf.—In the North Sea Continental Shelf cases,[72] the International Court of Justice observed, "The rights of the coastal State in respect of the area of the Continental Shelf that constitutes of natural prolongation of its land territory into and under the sea exist ipso facto and ab initio by virtue of its sovereignty over the land, and as an extension of it in exercise of sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring the sea-bed and exploiting its natural resources. In short, there is here an inherent right."[73] The World Court further observed, 'More fundamental than the notion of proximity appears to be the principle—constantly relied upon by all the parties—of the Natural prolongation or continuation of the land territory or domain, or land sovereignty of the coastal State into and under the high seas, viz. the bed of its Territorial Sea which is under the full sovereignty of the State .... What confers the ipso jure title with international law attributes to the coastal State in respect of its Continental Shelf is the fact that submarine areas concerned may be deemed, to be actually part of the territory over which the coastal State already has dominion, in the sense that although covered with water, they are a prolongation or continuation of that territory, an extension of it under the sea." [74]

It has been aptly remarked by other writer,[75] "The legal regime of the Continental Shelf has undergone profound changes since 1969 when the International Court of Justice handed down its historic verdict in the North Sea Continental Shelf cases. The change is in no small measure attributable to the Court's judgment which by its elucidation of the shelf of adjacent States gave a new turn to the law on the subject." Further, "It is of course true that the Court's pronouncement does not mark the outer limits of the Continental Shelf in terms of the continental rise. However, recent trends in International Conferences suggest that the Continental Shelf includes the outer edge of the continental margin, that is, the continental rise. In this connection the Court's Judgment is relied upon by States, advocating the proposition that the Continental Shelf extends up to the edge of the continental margin. The future convention on the Continental Shelf will probably embody this trend."[76]

---

[68] W. Friedmann, "Selden Redivivus—Towards a Partition of the Sea", A.J.I.L., Vol. 655 (1971), p. 757 at p. 759.

[69] Andrassy, see supra note 40 at pp. 89-90. See also M.K. Nawaz "Alternative Criteria for Delimiting the Continental Shelf, I.J.I.L., Vol. 13 (1973), p. 25 at p. 39.

[70] Richard Young, "The Limits of Continental Shelf and Beyond", Proc. A.S.I.L. April, 25-27 (1968), p. 230 ; see also Roger Denorme, "The Seaward Limit of the Continental Shelf", in the Law of the Sea-National Policy Recommendations—Proceedings of the 4th Annual Conference of the Law of the Sea Institute, June 23—June 26, 1969 (The University of Rhode Island Kingston Rhode Island, March, 1970), p. 263 at p. 267.

[71] See H.M. Jain, "Continental Shelf—Some Geological Aspects", I.J.I.L. Vol. 12 (1972), 564, 580.

[72] I.C.J. Reports (1969), p. 3. Facts of the case have been discussed later on in this Chapter, See also "Wolfgang Friedmann". The North Sea Continental cases : A critique", A.J.I.L., Vol. 64 (1970), p. 229; R.Y. Zennings, "The Limits of Continental Shelf Jurisdiction : Some possible Implications of the North Sea Judgment", I.C.L.Q., Vol. 18 (1869), p. 819; F.D. Brown, "The North Sea Continental Shelf Cases." Current Legal Problems, Vol. 23 (1970), p. 187 ; S.C. Chaturvedi, "The North Sea Continental Shelf Cases Analysed", I.J.I.L., Vol. 13 (1973), p. 481.

[73] Ibid, at p. 22.

[74] I.C.J. Reports (1969), p. 3 at p. 31.

[75] M.K. Nawaz, "The North Sea Continental Shelf Cases Revisited", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 507 at p. 518.

In the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, consensus has emerged in favour of the 'natural prolongation' theory.[77] In Art. 76 of U.N. Convention on the law of the Sea, 1982, Continental Shelf has been defined as comprising, "the sea-bed and sub-soil of the submarine areas that extend beyond its territorial sea throughout the natural prolongation of its land territory to the outer edge of the continental margin, or to a distance of 200 nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the Territorial Sea is measured where the outer edge of the continental margin does not extend up to that distance." This definition incorporates in first part (this provision is divided in two parts by the word 'or') the concept of the Continental Shelf as highlighted by the world court. The second part provides for a uniform Continental Shelf upto a distance of 200 miles to those coastal States who have a short Continental Shelf and their continental shelf does not extend upto the said distance. The 1982 convention has thus satisfactorily resolved the controversy relating to the definition of the continental shelf.

Outer limits of continental shelf.—Paragraph 4(a) of Article 76 of U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 provides :

> "For the purposes of this convention, the coastal State shall establish the outer edge of the continental margin wherever the margin extends beyond 200 nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured, by either :
>
> (i) A line delineated in accordance with paragraph 7[78] by references to the outermost fixed points at each of which the thickness of sedimentary rocks is at least 1 per cent of the shortest distance from such point to the foot of the continental slope ; or
>
> (ii) A line delineated in accordance with paragraph 7 to fixed points not more than 60 nautical miles from the foot of the continental slope."

After having provided the above method of establishing the outer edge of the continental margin, the convention on the Law of Sea lays down the formula for fixing the precise limits of the Continental Shelf of a coastal state in paragraph 5 of Article 76 in the following words :

"The fixed points comprising the line of the outer limits of the Continental Shelf on the sea-bed, drawn in accordance with paragraph 4(a) (i) and (ii), either shall not exceed 350 nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured or shall not exceed 100 nautical miles from the 2,500 metres isobath, which is a line connecting the depth of 2,500 metres."

Illustration.—A State 'C''s Exploration Ship discovers oil below the depth of 1500 metre in the Seabed at a distance of 190 miles from the Indian coast. India claims that she has exclusive rights to exploit and use this oil. Is India's claim justified ?*

India's claim is justified because as for definition of continental shelf in Article 76 of the Law of the Convention, 1982, the continental shelf of a coastal State extends to the edge continental margin or 200 nautical miles where the outer edge of the continental margin does not extend upto that distance. Moreover, outer limit of the continental shelf may be upto 350 nautical miles from the baselines or may not exceed 100 nautical miles from the 2,500 metres isobath. Since 'C' State has discovered oil below the depth of 1500 metres in the Seabed at a distance of 190 miles from the Indian Coast, it is clearly within the continental shelf of India. As regards the rights of the coastal State over the continental shelf, Article 77 of the Law of the Sea Convention, 1982 provides that the coastal State exercises over the continental shelf sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring it and exploiting its natural resources. These rights are exclusive in the sense that if the coastal State does not explore the continental shelf or exploit its natural resources, no one may undertake these activities without the consent of the coastal State. Moreover, the rights of the State over continental shelf do not depend on occupation, effective or notional, or on any express proclamation.

---

[76] M.K. Nawaz, "The North Sea Continental Shelf Cases Revisited", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 507 at p. 519.

[77] See Surya P. Sharma, "Ocean Law on the Eve of the New York Sessions" , I.J.I.L., Vol. 16 (1976), p. 105 at p. 110.

[78] Paragraph 7 of Article 76 provides : "The coastal State shall delineate the seaward boundary of its Continental Shelf where that shelf extends beyond 200 nautical miles from the baseline from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured by straight lines not exceeding 60 nautical miles in length, connecting fixed points, such points to be defined by co-ordinates of latitude and longtitude".

* P.C.S. (1990) Q. 7 (b).

Besides this, the Seabed in question comes within the jurisdiction of India under the concept of Exclusive Economic Zone. According to Article 57 of the 1982 Convention, the exclusive economic zone of a coastal State may extend upto 200 nautical miles. Article 56 of the Convention makes it clear that in the exclusive economic zone, the coastal State has sovereign rights for the purpose of exploration and exploitation etc. of its resources.

Thus India's claim is justified.

Commission on the Limits of the Continental Shelf.—The 1982 Convention on the Law of the sea also establishes a Commission on the Limits of the Continental Shelf. Paragraph 8 of the Article 76 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea provides that information on the limits of the Continental Shelf beyond the 200 nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured shall be submitted by the coastal state to the Commission on the Continental Shelf set up under Annex III on the basis of equitable geographical representation. The Commission shall make recommendations to the coastal state on matters related to the establishment of the outer limits of their Continental Shelf. The limits of the shelf established by a coastal state on the basis of these recommendations shall be final and binding.

The provisions relating to the Commission are contained in Annex II of the convention. Article 1 of Annex II provides that in accordance with the provisions of Article 76, a commission on the limits of the Continental Shelf beyond 200 nautical miles shall be established. Article 4 of Annex II provides that where a coastal state intends to establish, in accordance with Article 76, the seaward boundary of its 'Continental Shelf beyond 200 nautical miles, the coastal state concerned shall submit particulars of such boundary to the Commission along with supporting scientific and technical data as soon as possible but in any case within 10 years of the entry into force of this convention for that State. Further the Commission shall consider data and other material submitted by coastal states and shall then make recommendations in writing to the coastal state which made the submission and to the Secretary-General.[79] In the case of disagreement by the coastal state with the recommendations of the Commission, the coastal state shall, within reasonable time make a revised or new submission to the Commission.[80]

Payments and contributions with respect to the exploitation of the continental shelf beyond 200 nautical miles.—As noted above, convention on the law of the sea provides that the coastal state shall delineate the seaward boundary of its continental shelf where that Shelf extends beyond 200 nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured. This provision has been made with two main objectives. One of the objectives is to define the precise outer limits of the continental shelf and this has already been noted above. The second objective is to make the Continental Shelf of a coastal state beyond 200 nautical miles subject to some sort of international control. That is to say, while the coastal states shall have exclusive sovereign rights to exploit the resources of the continental shelf upto 200 nautical miles, they will have to make payments and contributions in respect of the exploitation of the Continental Shelf beyond 200 nautical miles. Article 82 of the convention on the law of the sea, therefore provides that the coastal state shall make payments or contributions in kind in respect of the exploitation of the non-living resources of the Continental Shelf beyond 200 nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of territorial sea is measured. The payments and contributions shall be made annually with respect to all production at a site after the first five years of production at that site. For the Sixth year, the rate of payment or contribution shall be 1 per cent of the value or volume of production at the site. The rate shall increase by 1 per cent for each subsequent year until the twelfth year and shall remain at 7 percent thereafter. Production does not include resources used in connection with exploitation. The payments or contributions shall be made through the International Sea-bed Authority, which shall distribute them to States Parties to the convention on the basis of equitable sharing criteria, taking into account the interests and needs of developing states, particularly the least developed and land-locked amongst them. However, a developing state which is a net importer of a mineral resources produced from its Continental Shelf is exempt from making such payments of contributions in respect of that mineral resource.

---

[79] Article 6.

[80] Article 8, ibid.

Delimitation of the Continental Shelf between two or more States.—Article 6(1) of the Geneva Continental Shelf Convention provides that where the Continental Shelf is adjacent to the territories of two or more States whose coasts are opposite to each other, the boundary of the Continental Shelf appertaining to such State shall be determined by agreement between them. In the absence of agreement, and unless another boundary line is justified by special circumstances, the boundary is the median line, every point of which is equidistant from the nearest points of the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured. Article 6(2) further provides that where the same Continental Shelf is adjacent to the territories of two adjacent States, the boundary of the Continental Shelf shall be determined by agreement between them. In the absence of agreement, and unless another boundary line is justified by special circumstances, the boundary shall be determined by application of the principle of equidistance from the nearest points of the baselines from which the breadth of the Territorial Sea of each State is measured. Reference may be made here to the North Sea Continental Shelf cases,*[81] wherein the International Court of Justice considered the principle of equidistance. The Court's judgment "will long be remembered for its classic exposition of doctrine of Continental Shelf delimitation of shelves of adjacent States.[82]

North Sea Continental Shelf Cases (1969).—The facts of the case are as follows :

By the Special Agreements respectively, concluded between the Kingdom of Denmark and the Federal Republic of Germany and between the Federal Republic and the Kingdom of the Netherlands, the parties submitted to the Court certain differences concerning "the delimitation as between the parties of the areas of the Continental Shelf in the North Sea which appertain to each of them with the exception of those areas, situated in the immediate vicinity of the coast which have already been the subject of delimitation by two agreements dated 1st December, 1964, and 9th June, 1965, concluded in the one case between the Federal Republic and the Kingdom of the Netherlands and in the other between the Federal Republic and the Kingdom of Denmark. It was in respect of the delimitation of the Continental Shelf areas lying beyond and to seaward of those affected by the partial boundaries thus established, that the Court was requested by each of the two Special Agreements to decide what are the applicable "principles and rules of International Law."

The waters of the North Sea are shallow, and the whole sea-bed consists of Continental Shelf at a depth of less than 200 metres, except for the formation known as the Norweigian through a belt of water 200-650 metres deep, fringing the Southern and South Western Coasts of Norway to a width averaging about 80-100 kilometres. Much of the greater part of the Continental Shelf has already been the subject of delimitation by a series of agreements concluded between the United Kingdom (which lies along the whole western side of it) and certain of the States on the eastern side, namely, Norway, Denmark and the Netherlands.

---

* See also for I.A.S (1976), Q. No. 4 ; observations of the Court regarding the definition of Continental Shelf, Nature and Extent of Coastal State its right etc. have already been referred earlier.

[81] I.C.J. Reports (1969), p. 3.

[82] M.K. Nawaz, see Supra note 75 at p. 506.

The parties took up fundamentally different positions. On behalf of the Kingdoms of Denmark and the Netherlands it was contended that the whole matter is governed by a mandatory rule of law which, reflecting the language of Article 6 of the Convention on the Continental Shelf, 1958, was designated by them as the "equidistance special circumstances" rule. According to this contention, all Continental Shelf boundaries must be drawn by means of an equidistance line, unless or except to the extent to which "special circumstances" are recognised to exist. An equidistance line is a line every point of which is the same distance away from whatever point is nearest to it on the coast of the countries concerned—or rather strictly, on the baseline of the territorial sea along that coast. As regards what constitutes "special circumstances" according to Denmark and the Netherlands, the configuration of the German North Sea coast, its decisive character, and the fact that it makes nearly in a right-angled bend in mid-course, would not of itself constitute, for either of the two boundary lines concerned, a special circumstance calling for or warranting a departure from the equidistance method of delimitation. These various contentions, together with the view that a rule of equidistance—special circumstances are binding on the Federal Republic, were founded by Denmark and the Netherlands partly on the 1958 Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf and partly on general considerations of law relating to the Continental Shelf lying outside this convention. The Federal Republic for its part, while recognizing the utility of equidistance as a method of delimitation and that this method can in many cases be employed appropriately and with advantage, denies its obligatory character for States not parties to the Geneva Convention, and contended that the correct rule to be applied, at any rate in such circumstances as those of the North Sea, is one according to which each of the States concerned should have a "just and equitable share" of the available Continental Shelf, in proportion to the length of its coastline or sea frontage. The International Court of Justice did not accept the doctrine of the just and equitable share for it is at variance with what the Court entertains no doubt is the most fundamental of all rules of law relating to the Continental Shelf, enshrined in Article 2 of the 1958 Geneva Convention, though quite independent of it, namely, that the rights of the Coastal State in respect of the area of Continental Shelf that constitutes a natural prolongation of its land territory into and under the Sea exist ipso facto and ab initio by virtue of its sovereignty over the land, and as an extension of it in exercise of sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring the sea bed and exploiting its natural resources. In short, there is here, an inherent right." Thus "even in such a situation as that of the North Sea, the notion of apportioning and as yet undelimitated area, considered as a whole (which underlies the doctrine of the just and equitable share), is quite foreign to and inconsistent with the basic concept of Continental Shelf entitlement, according to which the process of delimitation is essentially one of drawing a boundary line between areas which already appertain to one or other of the States affected. The delimitation itself must indeed be equitable share, or indeed of a share, as such, at all for the fundamental concept involved does not admit of there being anything undivided to share out."

As regards the principle of equidistance, the court held "the notion of equidistance as being logically necessary, in the sense of being an inescapable a priori accompaniment of basic Continental Shelf doctrine, is incorrect." By majority of eleven votes to six, the World Court finally held that in each case—

(A) the use of the equidistance method of delimitation not being obligatory between the parties ; (B) there being no single method of delimitation, the use of which is in all circumstances obligatory ; (C) the principles and rules of International Law applicable to the delimitation as between the parties of the areas of the Continental Shelf in the North Sea which appertain to each of them beyond the partial boundary determined by the agreement of 1st December, 1964 and 9th June, 1965, respectively are, as follows : (1) Delimitation is to be effected by agreement in accordance with equitable principles, and taking account of all the relevant circumstances, in such a way to leave as such possible to each party all those parts of the Continental Shelf that constitute a natural prolongation of its land territory into and under the sea, without encroachment on the natural prolongation of the land territory of the other ; (2) if in the application of the preceding sub-paragraph, the delimitation leaves to the parties areas that overlap, these are to be divided between them in agreed proportions or failing agreement, equally, unless they decide on a regime of joint jurisdiction, user, or exploitation for the zones of overlap or any part of them ; (D) in the course of negotiations, the factors to be taken into account are to include, (1) the general configuration of the coasts of the parties, as well as the presence of any special or unusual features ; (2) so far as known or readily ascertainable the physical and geological structure and natural resources, of the Continental Shelf areas involved ; (3) the element of a reasonable degree of proportionality, which a delimitation carried out in accordance with quitable principles ought to bring about between the extent of the Continental Shelf areas appertaining with coastal State and the length of its coast measured in the general direction of the coastline, account being taken for this purpose of the effects, actual or prospective, of any other Continental Shelf delimitations between adjacent States in that same region.

Being influenced by the above verdict of the International Court of Justice, Article 83 of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, provides that delimitation of the Continental Shelf between States with opposite or adjacent coasts shall be effected by agreement on the basis of international law, as referred to in Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, in order to achieve an equitable solution.[83] If no agreement can be reached within a reasonable period of time, the States concerned shall resort to the procedures provided in Part XV (i.e. settlement of disputes).[84]

Pending settlement, as provided in paragraph 1, the States concerned, in a spirit of understanding and co-operation, shall make every effort to enter into provisional arrangements of a practical nature, and, during this transactional period, not to jeopardise or hamper the reading of the final agreement. Such arrangements shall be without prejudice to the final delimitation.[85] Where there is an agreement in force between the States concerned questions relating to the delimitation of the continental shelf shall be determined in accordance with the provision of that agreement.[86] Thus the 1982 Convention does not at all mention the principle of equidistance. It emphasizes agreement between the parties. However parties "in order to achieve an equitable solution" may take into account the principle of equidistance to conclude the agreement.

Case concerning Continental Shelf (Tunisia—Libyan Arab Republic),[87] is the next case decided by the International Court of Justice regarding delimitation of continental shelf between two states. In this case the court stressed the importance of "the satisfaction of equitable principles" in the delimitation process.[88] The court was requested in 1978 to determine principles and rules of international law which were applicable to the delimitation between Tunisia and Libyan Arab Jamahiriya of the respective area of continental shelf appertaining to each. The court considered arguments as well as evidence based on geology, physiography and bathymetry on the basis of which each party sought to claim particular areas of seabed as the natural prolongation of its territory and concluded in its judgment of 24 February, 1982 that the two countries abutted on a common continental shelf and that physical criteria were therefore of no assistance for the purpose of delimitation. Consequently, it had to be guided by "equitable principles" and by certain factors such as the necessity of ensuring a reasonable degree of proportionality between the areas allotted and the lengths of the coastline concerned, but the application of the equidistance method could not, in the particular circumstances of the case lead to an equitable result. With respect to the course to be taken by the delimitation line the court distinguished two sectors near the shore, it considered having taken note of some evidence of historical agreement as to the maritime boundary that the delimitation should run in a north-easterly direction at an angle of 26° further seawards, it considered that the line of delimitation should near eastwards at a bearing of 52" to take into account the change of direction of the Tunisian coast and the existence of the Kerkennah Islands.

---

[83] Article 83, paragraph 1.

[84] Ibid, paragraph 2.

[85] Paragraph 3.

[86] Paragraph 4.

[87] I.C.J. Reports 1982, p. 21.

[88] Ibid., p. 47, para 44.

By a majority of ten votes to four, the court held that the principles and rules of international law applicable for the delimitation of the areas of continental shelf appertaining to Tunisia and Libya should be following :

(1) The delimitation is to be effected in accordance with equitable principles and taking into account of all relevant circumstances ;

(2) The area relevant for the delimitation constitutes a single continental shelf as the natural prolongation of the land territory of both parties, so that in the present case no criterion for delimitation of shelf areas can be derived from the principle of natural prolongation as such ;

(3) In the particular geographical circumstances of the present case, the physical structures of the continental shelf areas is not such as to determine an ecquitable line of delimitation.

Case Concerning Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine Area (Canada—U.S.)[89]—Yet another case in which the International Court of Justice was asked to delimit the areas of continental shelf between two states is the case concerning Delimitation of the Maritime Boundry in the Gulf of Marine Area (Canada v. U.S.) decided by the court on 12 October, 1984. In this case, Canada and the U.S. requested the International Court of Justice to constitute a chamber of the Court consisting of five judges to delimit the areas of continental shelf between the two countries by a single maritime boundary. The area within which the delimitation sought was to be carried out lies within the ill-defined limits of the "Gulf of Maine area". It may be noted here that there is a profound difference between this case and the two other cases referred above namely North Sea Continental Shelf Case (1969) and the Case concerning Continental Shelf (Tunisia/Libya). In other two cases, the Court was not required to draw a line of delimitation itself but merely to indicate the principles and rules of international law applicable to that determination. In Tunisia/Libya case, the court was also asked to clarify the practical method for the application of these principles and rules in the specific situation. Secondly, for the first time, the delimitation which the chamber is asked to effect does not relate exclusively to the continental shelf, but to both the continental shelf and the exclusive fishing zone, the delimitation by a single boundary.

While the parties recognized the "fundamental norm" governing maritime delimitation, each of the parties separately sought to ascertain whether international law might also contain other rules, possibly accompanied by corollaries, of mandatory application in the same field. In this connection, Canada relied on the concept of geographic adjacency, since it was convinced that this concept constituted the "basis of title" of the coastal State to the partial extension of its jurisdiction to the continental shelf and the waters of which it formed the bed. But the chamber rejected this argument and observed :

> It should not be forgotten however, that "legal title" to certain maritime or sub-marine areas is always and exclusively the effect of a legal operation. The same is true of the boundary of the title. That boundary results from a rule of law, and not from any intrinsic merit in the purely physical fact. It is therefore correct to say that international law confers on the coastal state a legal title to adjacent continental shelf or to a maritime zone adjacent to its coasts, it would not be correct to say that international law recognizes the title conferred on the state by the adjacency of that shelf or that zone, as if the mere natural fact of adjacency produced legal consequences.

---

[89] Judgment of the I.C.J. of 12 October, 1984.

From the principle of 'adjacency' or 'proximity' Canada sought to deduce the existence in customary international law of rules for delimitation of continental shelves or adjacent maritimes zones overlap. Rejecting such contention the chamber observed :

The chamber merely notes it amount just one more, still unconvincing, endeavour to instill the idea that "equidistance" rather than "distance" is a concept endorsed by customary international law, since the objective is to assist that whatever lies less far from he coasts of one state than from those of another should automatically appertain to the former state. It is another attempt to turn equidistance into a genuine rule of law, one to which general international law has supposedly given expression while yet tempering it to take account of special circumstances, and thus into something other than it is in reality ; a practical method be applied for the purpose of delimitation.

Nevertheless this concept as manifested in decided cases, has not thereby become a rule of general International law, a norm logically flowing from a legally binding principle of customary international law, neither has it been adopted into customary law simply as a method to be given priority or preference.

"The Chamber further observed :

What general international law prescribes in every maritime delimitation between neighbouring states could there be defined as follows :

(1) No maritime delimitation between states with opposite or adjacent coasts may be effected unilaterally by one of those states. Such delimitation must be sought and effected by means of an agreement, following negotiations conducted in good faith and with genuine intention of achieving a positive result. Where, however, such agreement cannot be achieved, delimitation should be effected by recourse to a third party possessing the necessary competence.

(2) In either case, delimitation is to be effected by the application of equitable criteria and by the use of practical methods capable of ensuring, with regard to the geographical configuration of the area and other relevant circumstances, an equitable result.

Applying the governing principles and rules of law and equitable criteria and appropriate methods, the Chamber indicated the course of single maritime boundary that divides the continental shelf and the exclusive fisheries zones of Canada and the United States of America.

Case concerning the continental shelf—Libyan Arab Jamahiriya/Malta.[90]—This is the latest case on the point. In this case the Court was requested to decide the question as to what principles and rules of international law are applicable in the delimitation of the areas of the continental shelf which appertains to Malta and the area of continental shelf which appertains to Libya and how in practice such principles and rules can be applied by the two Parties in this particular case in order that they may without difficulty delimit such areas by an agreement.

On behalf of Libya it was contended inter alia that the natural prolongation of the respective land territories into and under the sea is the basis of title to the areas of continental shelf which appertain to each of them. The delimitation should be accomplished in such a way as to leave as much as possible to each party all areas of continental shelf that constitute the natural prolongation of its land territory without encroachment on the natural prolongation of the other. Further, the delimitation in this case should reflect the element of a reasonable degree of proportionality which a delimitation carried out in accordance with equitable principles ought to bring about between the extent of the continental shelf areas appertaining to the respective state and the lengths of the relevant parts of their coasts, account being taken of any other delimitation between states in the same region. Last but not the least, application of the equidistance method is not obligatory, and its application in the particular circumstances of this case would not lead to an equitable result.

---

[90] I.C.J. Judgment of 3 June, 1985.

On the other hand it was contended on behalf of Malta that the principles and rules of international law applicable in the area are that the delimitation shall be effected on the basis of international law in order to achieve an equitable solution and in practice the above principles and rules are applied by means of a median line every point of which is equidistant from the nearest points on the baselines of Malta and the low water mark of the coasts of Libya.

Both the parties have signed the 1982 U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea but it has yet not entered into force. The Parties agreed that the dispute is to be governed by customary international law. As regards the 1982 convention the International Court of Justice observed that even independently of the references made it is the duty of the Court to consider in what degree any of its provisions are binding upon the parties as a rule of customary international law. The court referred to Art. 76, paragraph 10 and Article 83, paragraph 1 and observed :

That the questions of entitlement and of definition of continental shelf, on the one hand, and of delimitation of continental shelf on the other are not only distinct but are also complementary is self-evident. The legal basis of that which is to be delimited, and of entitlement to it, cannot be other than pertinent to that delimitation."

The Court then quoted the following observation from its judgment in the case concerning continental shelf (Tunisia/Libyan Arab Jamahiriya). : [91]

"In the new text, any indication of a specific criterion which could give guidance to the interested states in their effort to achieve an equitable solution has to be achieved. The principles and rules, applicable to the delimitation of Continental shelf areas are those which are appropriate to bring about an equitable result........."

After quoting the above observation, the court aptly remarked, "The Convention sets a goal to be achieved but is silent as to the method to be followed to achieve it. It restricts itself to setting a standard and it is left to states themselves or to the courts, to endow this standard with specific content." [92]

For Malta, the reference to Art. 76 of the 1982 Convention represents a consecration of the "distance principle", for Libya the reference to natural prolongation corresponds to customary international law. The Court did not agree with Libyan contention that distance from the coast is not a relevant element for the decision of the present case.

As regards Libya's case that natural prolongation, in the physical sense of land territory into and under the sea is still a primary basis of title to continental shelf, the World Court observed :

".........Since the development of the law enables a state to claim that the continental shelf appertaining to it extends up to as far as 200 miles from its coast whatever the geological characteristic of the corresponding sea-bed and sub-soil there is no reason to ascribe any role to geological or geophysical factors within that distance either in verifying the legal title of states concerned or in preceding to a delimitation as between their claims. This is especially clear where verification of the validity of title is concerned. Since at least in so far as those areas are situated at a distance of under 200 miles from the coast in question, title depends solely on the distance from the coasts of the claimant states of any areas of seabed claimed by way of continental shelf, and geological or geomorphological characteristic of those areas are completely immaterial. It follows that since the distance between the coasts of the parties is less than 400 miles so

---

[91] I.C.J. Reports 1982, p. 49, para 50.

[92] I.C.J. Reports (1985) para 28.

that no geophysical feature can lie more than 200 miles from each coast the feature referred to as the rift zone cannot constitute a fundamental discontinuity terminating the southwards extension of the Maltese shelf and northward extension of the Libyan as if it were some natural boundary." [93]

As regards Malta's contention regarding the principle of equidistance" the court observed :[94]

"The Court is unable to accept that, even as a preliminary and provisional step toward the drawing of a delimitation line, the equidistance method is one which must be used, or that the court is required, as a first step to examine the effects of a delimitation by application of the equidistance method.[95] Such a rule would come near to an espousal of the idea of 'absolute proximity', which was rejected by the court in 1969[96], and which has since moreover failed of acceptance at the third United Nations conference on the Law of the Sea.........The application of equitable principles in the particular relevant circumstances may still require the adoption of another method, or combination of methods, of delimitation even from the outset."

But on the basis of the circumstances in the present case, the court agreed that"......the tracing of a median line between those coasts by way of a provisional step in a process to be continued by other operations, is the most judicious manner of proceeding with a view to the eventual achievement of an equitable result.[97] The court however, added that it "should not be understood as implying that an equidistance line will be an appropriate beginning in all cases, or even in all cases of delimitation between opposite states." [98]

By a majority of 14 votes to 3 the Court concluded[99] that the principles and rules of international law applicable for the delimitation are :

(1) the delimitation is to be effected in accordance with equitable principles and taking account of all relevant circumstances, so as to arrive at an equitable result

(2) the area of continental shelf to be found to appertain to either party not exceeding more than 200 miles from the coast of the party concerned, no criterion for delimitation of shelf areas can be derived from the principles of natural prolongation in the physical sense. Further, an equitable result may be arrived at by drawing, as a first stage in the process a median line every point of which is equidistant from the low water mark of the relevant coast of Malta (excluding the islet of Filfla) and the low-water mark of the relevant coast of Libya.

A perusal of the above cases shows that in the first place the principle of equidistance cannot be applied in all cases of delimitation between opposite states. In the absence of an agreement on the basis of circumstances of the case it may be applied by way of provisional step in the process to be continued by other operations. Secondly, since each coastal state can claim continental shelf upto a distance of 200 miles, the principle of natural prolongation has lost its importance and has been replaced to a great extent by distance criterion. Thirdly Article 83 which lays emphasis on equitable solution, sets a goal to be achieved but is silent as to the method to be followed to achieve it. Thus the rules and principles of law to be applied for delimitation of continental shelves between two opposite states are vague and far from satisfactory. The provisions of the 1982 convention relating to delimitation deserve to be suitably amended to remove uncertainty and vagueness. The function of law is not only to set goal to be achieved but also to lay down clearly the methods and procedures to achieve it.

---

[93] I.C.J. Reports (1985) para 39.

[94] Para 43.

[95] I.C.J. Reports 1982, p. 79, para 110.

[96] I.C.J. Reports 1969, p. 30, para 41.

[97] Note 93, para 62.

[98] Ibid, para 77.

[99] Ibid, para 79.

Indian position on Continental Shelf.—India is one of the signatories of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea but she has yet not ratified it.

VII. Exclusive Economic Zone or Patrimonial Sea :*

The concept of economic zone or patrimonial sea was for the first time advocated by Kenya in the Asian African Legal Consultative Committee at its Colombo Session held in January, 1971. Subsequently, Kenya submitted a working paper in the Lagos of Sessions of the Committee held in January, 1972. Finally Kenya submitted the draft of exclusive economic zone concept in the 1972 Geneva Session of the United Nations Sea-bed Committee.[100]

Since the United Nation's efforts relating to the revision in law of the sea the concept of economic zone is probably the most dramatic development that has taken place.[101] After the concept was first advocated by Kenya, as noted above, it has attracted many adherents. The Third U. N. Conference on the Law of the Sea deserves credit for having settled the provisions relating to the concept of Exclusive Economic Zone. Article 55 of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, provides that the exclusive economic zone is an area beyond and adjacent to the territorial sea, subject to the specific legal regime established in this Part (i.e., Part V), under which the rights and jurisdictions of the coastal State and freedoms of other States are governed by the relevant provisions of this convention. Article 56 which deals with rights, jurisdiction and duties of a coastal State, in the exclusive economic zone provides the following :

1. In the exclusive economic Zone, the coastal State has :
   (a) Sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring and exploiting, conserving and managing the natural resources, whether living or non-living, of the seabed and sub-soil and the superjacent waters, and with regard to other activities for the economic exploitation and exploration of the Zone, such as the production of energy from the water currents and winds ;
   (b) jurisdiction as provided for in the relevant provisions of this convention with regard to :
      (i) the establishment and use of artificial islands, installation and structures ;
      (ii) marine scientific research;
      (iii) the protection and preservation of the marine environment ;
   (c) other rights and duties provided for in this convention.

2. In exercising its rights and performing its duties under this convention in the exclusive economic zone, the coastal States shall have due regard to the rights and duties of other States and shall act in a manner compatible with the provisions of this convention.

3. The rights set out in this article with respect to the sea-bed and sub-soil shall be exercised in accordance with Part VI.[102]

---

* See also I.A.S. (1978) Q. No. 5(c) and (9d) ; See also for P.C.S. (1990) Q. 7(b)—for this question see also problem discussed under the heading "Continental Shelf" ; UPPCS (2004) Q. 6; IAS (2001) Q. 8(c) ; IAS (2005) Q. 7(a) ; IAS (2007) Q. 7(a).

[100] See Ebera Osieke, "The Contribution of States from the Third World to the Development of the Law of the Continental Shelf and the Concept of the Economic Zone", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975) p. 313 at pp. 328-29; see also Jorge Castaneda, "The Concept of Patrimonial Sea in International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 12 (1972), p. 535.

[101] See M. K. Nawaz, "The Emergence of Exclusive Economic Zone : Implication for a New Law of the Sea", I.J.I.L., Vol. 16 (1976), p. 471 at p. 487.

[102] Part VI deals with Continental Shelf which has already been discussed earlier in this chapter.

As regards the breadth of the exclusive economic Zone, Article 57 provides that it shall not exceed beyond 200 nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured.

As regards the rights and duties of other states in the exclusive economic Zone, Article 58 provides the following :

1. In the exclusive economic Zone, all States, whether coastal or land-locked, enjoy, subject to the relevant provisions of this convention, the freedoms referred to Article 87 of navigation and overflight and of the laying of submarine cables and pipelines and other internationally lawful use of the sea related to these freedoms such as those associated with the operation of ships, aircraft and submarine cables and pipelines, and compatible with other provisions of this convention.

2. Articles 88 to 115[103] and other pertinent rules of international law apply to the exclusive economic zone in so far as they are not incompatible with this Part.

3. In exercising their rights and performing their duties under this convention in the exclusive economic zone, States shall have due regard to the rights and duties of the coastal State and shall comply with the laws and regulations adopted by the coastal State in accordance with the provisions of this convention and other rules of international law in so far as they are not incompatible with this part.

Article 73, which deals with the 'Enforcement of laws and regulations of the coastal state' provides the following :

1. The coastal state may in the exercise of its sovereign rights to explore, exploit, conserve and manage the living resources in the exclusive economic zone, take such measures, including boarding, inspection, arrest and judicial proceedings, as may be necessary to ensure compliance with the laws and regulations adopted by it in conformity with the convention.
2. Arrested vessels and their crews shall be promptly released upon the posting of reasonable bond or other security.
3. Coastal state penalties for violations of fisheries laws and regulations in the exclusive economic zone may not include imprisonment, in the absence of agreements to the contrary by the states concerned, or any other form of corporal punishment.
4. In cases of arrest or detention of foreign vessels the coastal state shall promptly notify the flag state, through appropriate channels, of the action taken and of any penalties subsequently imposed.

This Article 73 is part of a group of provisions of the Convention (Articles 61 to 73) which develop in detail the rule in Article 56 as far as sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring and exploiting, conserving and managing the living resources of the exclusive economic zone are concerned. This was pointed out by the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea in the M/V "Saiga" case (saint Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea)[104] wherein Article 73, especially its paragraph 4, was applied. The facts and decision of this case have been discussed below in this chapter under the heading "Settlement of Disputes".

The above provisions emerged after prolonged negotiations among the different groups of States and seek to maintain a just and equitable balance between the rights and duties of coastal States and those of other States in the exclusive economic zone. Besides the above provisions, land-locked States and states with special geographical characteristics have been given certain rights in the exclusive economic zone in Articles 69 and 70 respectively. As regards delimitation of the exclusive economic zone between States with opposite or adjacent coasts, Article 74 provides that it shall be effected by agreement in conformity with international law as referred to in Art. 38 of the Statute of International Court of Justice in order to achieve an equitable solution. If no agreement can be reached within a reasonable period of time, the States concerned shall resort to the procedures provided for in Part XV.

---

[103] These articles are relating to the High Seas.

[104] The case was decided on 4th December, 1997.

The provisions of Article 74 are exactly similar to the provisions of Article 83 relating to the delimitation of Continental Shelf which have been discussed in detail earlier.

Distinction between Exclusive Economic Zone and Contiguous Zone.—The Sea waters ahead of maritime belt is called Contiguous Zone. The Contiguous Zone extends upto 24 nautical miles to be measured from the base line from which maritime belt is measured. The coastal state possesses the right to make rules to (a) prevent infringement of its customs, fiscal, immigration or sanitary regulations committed within its territory or territorial sea; (b) punish infringement of the above regulations committed within its territory or territorial sea. The contiguous zone may not extend beyond 24 nautical miles baseline from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measure and thus impose certain restrictions on the freedom of the high seas.

On the other hand, coastal state exercises sovereignty over Maritime whereas the coastal state does not possess sovereignty over Contiguous Zone. In Exclusive Economic Zone the coastal state does not exercise complete sovereignty but it has sovereign rights for the purpose of exploring and exploiting, conserving the natural resources, whether living or non-living, of the seabed and subsoil and the superjacent waters, and with regard to other activities for the economic exploration and exploitation of the zone, such as the production of energy from the water currents and winds. The coastal state also has jurisdiction as provided for in the relevant provisions of the convention with regard to—

(i) the establishment and use of artificial islands, installation and structures.
(ii) marine scientific research.
(iii) the protection and preservation of marine environment.

Further as regards the breadth of the Exclusive Economic Zone, Article 57 of the convention on the Law of the Sea provides that it shall not exceed beyond 200 nautical mile from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured.

Continental Shelf and Execlusive Economic Zone distinguished

The concept of economic zone is related both to exclusive Fisheries Zone and Continental Shelf. It resembles them in certain respects and differs from them in certain respects. It has been rightly pointed, "The concept of exclusive Economic Zone differs both from the Continental Shelf and the exclusive Fisheries Zone. It differs from the former in that it extends to the living and non-living resources in the area of the sea, the outer limits of which are measured by distances rather than by depth or exploitability. It differs from the latter in so far as it adopts an uniform approach to all resources—living and non-living thereby ignoring the functional differences between the two kinds of resources."[105]

It may be noted here that the concept of Exclusive Economic Zone as highlighted by the 1982 convention on the Law of the sea has already become "part of modern law."[106] In Case Concerning the Continental Shelf (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya/Malta)[107], the International Court of Justice, aptly observed :

"In the view of the Court even though the present case relates only to the delimitation of the continental shelf and not to that of the exclusive economic zone, the principles and rules underlying the latter concept cannot be left out of consideration. As the 1982 convention demonstrates the two institutions, continental shelf and exclusive economic zone are linked together in modern law. Since the rights enjoyed by a state over its continental shelf would also be possessed by it over the sea-bed and sub-soil of any exclusive economic zone which it might proclaim, one of the relevant circumstances to be taken into account for the delimitation of the continental shelf of the state is the legally permissible extent of the exclusive economic zone appertaining to that state. This does

---

[105] M. K. Nawaz, "The Limits of the Coastal Jurisdiction : Continental Shelf, Fisheries and Economic Zone", I.J.I.L., Vo. 14 (1974), p. 261 at p. 272.

[106] Case Concerning the Continental Shelf (Tunisia/Libya), I.C.J. reports 1982, p. 74, para 100.

[107] I.C.J. Reports 1985 (Judgment dated 3, June 1985), Majority Judgment, para 33.

not mean that the concept of continental shelf has been absorbed by that of the exclusive economic zone; it does however signify that greater importance must be attributed to elements such as distance from the coast which are common to both concepts.[108]

Although the institution of the Continental Shelf and the Exclusive Economic Zone are different and distinct, the rights which the exclusive economic zone entails over the sea-bed are defined by reference to the regime laid down for the continental shelf. Although there can be continental shelf where there is no exclusive economic zone there cannot be an exclusive economic zone without a corresponding continental shelf. It follows that for juridical and practical reasons, the distance criterion must now apply to continental shelf as well as to the exclusive economic zone and that quite apart from the provisions as to distance in paragraph 1 of Article 76.

Indian Position : Section 7 of the Territorial Waters, Continental Shelf, Exclusive Economic Zone and other Maritime Zones Act, 1976 provides that the exclusive Economic Zone of India is an area beyond and adjacent to the territorial waters, and the limit of such Zone is two hundred nautical miles from the baseline from where territorial waters are measured.[109] The Central Government, may whenever it considers necessary so to do having regard to International Law and State practice, alter by notification in the official Gazette, the limit of the exclusive Economic Zone.[110] Resolutions approving the issue of such notification must be passed by both Houses of Parliament.[111] In the exclusive Economic Zone, the Union has—(a) sovereign rights for the purpose of exploration, exploitation, conservation and management of the natural resources, both living and non-living as well as for producting engery from tides, winds and currents; (b) exclusive rights and jurisdiction for the construction maintenance or operation of artificial islands, off-shore terminals, installations and other structures and devices necessary for the exploration and exploitation of the resources of the zone or for any other purpose; (c) exclusive jurisdiction to authorise, regulate and control scientific research; (d) exclusive jurisdiction to preserve and protect the marine environment and to prevent and control marine pollution; and (e) such other rights as are recognised by International Law.[112] Further, no person (including a foreign Government) shall, except under and in accordance with the terms of any agreement with the Central Government or a licence or a letter of authority granted by the Central Government explore, exploit any rescurces of the exclusive economic Zone or carry out any search or excavation or conduct any research within the exclusive Economic Zone or drill therein or construct, maintain or operate any artificial island, off-shore terminal, installation or other structure or device therein for any purpose whatsoever provided that nothing in this sub-section shall apply in relation to fishing by a citizen of India.[113]

But section 1 (2) of the Act provides that Sections 5 and 7 shall come into force on such date or on such different dates as the Central Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, appoint. On 15th January, 1977, Central Government issued the Notification bringing into force the provisions concerning the exclusive Economic Zone of India with effect from 15 January, 1977.[114]

VIII. The High Seas[*]

Definition.[]—The concept of freedom of open sea or high seas is very old. In the modern times it has assumed and added significance. In 1958 a convention was adopted on the high seas which is known as the Geneva Convention on the High Seas, 1958. Article 1 of the said Convention provided : "The term 'high seas' means the parts of the sea that are not included in the territorial sea or in the internal waters of a State." [115] In view of the recent developments, particularly the emergence of the concept of exclusive economic zone, this definition has become obsolete and inadequate and there is an urgent need to revise it. Article 86 of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, provides that the provisions of this Part (i.e., Part VII) apply to all parts of the sea that are not included in the exclusive economic zone, in the territorial sea or in the internal waters of a State, or in the archipelagic waters of an archipelagic State. This Article does not entail any abridgement of the freedoms enjoyed by all States in the exclusive economic zone in accordance with Article 58. This provision instead of defining high seas describes it and its area.

---

[108] Continental Shelf (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya/Malta), I.C.J. Report 1985 (Judgment dated 3 June, 1985) Majority Judgment, para 34.

[109] Section 7 (1).

[110] Section 7 (2).

[111] Section 7 (3).

[112] Section 7 (4).

[113] Section 7 (5).

[114] See I.J.I.L., Vol. 16 (1976), pp. 557-562.

[*] See also for I.A.S. (1968), Q. No. 8 ; I.A.S. (1964), Q. No. 4 ; I.A.S. (1969), Q. No. 5 ; P.C.S. (1975), Q. No. 5 P.C.S. (1971), Q. No. 6 ; P.C.S. (1970), Q. No. 8 ; P.C.S. (1971), Q. No. 8 ; I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 3(c), P.C.S. (1970), Q. No. 2 ; P.C.S. (1980), Q. No. 8(a) ; P.C.S. (1982), Q. No. 10(e) ; P.C.S. (1983), Q. No. 3 ; P.C.S. (1984), Q. No. 10(e) ; C.S.E. (1985), Q. No. 7(a).

[] See also for C.S.E. (1996) Q. 5(d).

Thus the emergence of the concepts of exclusive economic zone and archipelagic waters, have curtailed the limits of the high seas. Since the coastal state possesses some rights on contiguous zone also, this concept has also affected the traditional concept of high seas to some extent.

Development of the law relating to high seas : Conflict between maritime Sovereignty and the freedom of high seas.—In the ancient period, it was generally believed that high seas are a common heritage of mankind and are not within the property of any State. All the States were free to use it. During sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, States started occupying different parts of the high seas. In the modern period, the reply of Queen Elizabeth of England to the Spanish Ambassador in 1580 is an important event in regard to the freedom of the high seas. In her reply she had made it clear that seas and air are the property of all mankind and no State can claim occupation over them. In 1609, Grotius also expressed the same view in regard to the freedom of open sea. At present freedom of the high seas is a universally recognised principle and all the States subscribe to this view. The Convention on the high seas was adopted in 1958. As is clear from the preamble of the Convention, the provisions relating to high seas were declaratory of customary law. In the course of time, uses of oceans multiplied and the coastal States claimed wider parts of the sea. Many of the provisions of the Convention were criticized and even challenged. The U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, seeks to reconcile these claims and counter-claims of major maritime powers. Article 87 of the Convention provided that high seas are open for all the States, whether coastal or land-locked. Freedom of high seas is exercised under the conditions laid down by this convention and by other rules of International Law.

The 1982 Convention further provides that the high seas shall be reserved for peaceful purposes.[116] No state may validly purport to subject any part of the high seas to its sovereignty.[117] Every state, whether coastal or land-locked, has the right to sail ships flying its flag on the high seas.[118] Every State effectively exercise its jurisdiction and control in administrative, technical and social matters over ships flying its flag.[119] The 1982 Convention also imposes certain duties upon every State to take measures for ships flying its flag as are necessary to ensure safety at sea.[120] Warships on the high seas have complete immunity from the jurisdiction of any State other than the flag State.[121] Ships owned or operated by a State and used only on governmental non-commercial service shall, on the high seas, have complete immunity from the jurisdiction of any State other than the flag State.[122] The 1982 Convention prohibits transport of slaves[123] and imposes duty upon all States to cooperate the repression of piracy.[124] So is also the case of illicit traffic in narcotic drugs or psychotropic substances.[125] All States are entitled to lay submarine cables and pipelines on the bed of the high seas beyond the continental shelf. The convention also makes provision for the conservation and management of the living resources of the high sea.[126]

---

[115] See U.N. Doc. A/CONF, 13/L. 53.

[116] Article 88.

[117] Article 89.

[118] Article 90.

[119] Article 94 (1).

[120] Article 94 (3).

[121] Article 95.

[122] Article 96.

[123] Article 99.

Freedoms of the High Seas*.—Article 2 of the 1958, Geneva Convention on the high seas provides that the Freedom of the high seas comprises inter alia, both for coastal and non-coastal States : (1) Freedom of Navigation, (2) Freedom of fishing, (3) Freedom to lay submarine cables and pipelines, and (4) Freedom to fly over the high seas. These freedoms, and others which are recognised by the general principles of international law, shall be exercised by all States with reasonable regard to the interests of other States. That is to say, the freedoms enumerated are not exhaustive. They are in addition to those recognised by the general principle of international law. There is, however, no express provision of the freedom of scientific research and the freedom to construct Islands and other installations permitted under international law. The 1982 U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea has included these two freedoms. The freedoms of high seas expressly enumerated in Article 87 (1) of the Convention are following : (a) freedom of navigation; (b) freedom of overflight; (c) freedom to lay submarine cables and pipelines; (d) freedom to construct artificial islands and other installations permitted under international law; (e) freedom of fishing; and (f) freedom of scientific research. It is also provided that these freedoms shall be exercised by all States, with due consideration for the interests of other States in their exercise of the freedom of the high seas, and also with due regard for the rights under the convention with respect to activities under the area.[127] It is further provided that the high seas shall be reserved for peaceful purposes.[128] Moreover, no State may validly purport to subject any part of the high seas to its sovereignty.[129]

A brief reference may also be made here to the Geneva Convention on Fishing and Conservation of the Living Resources on the High Seas, 1958. Article 1 of the Convention provides that all States have the right for their nationals to engage in fishing on the high seas, subject (a) to their treaty obligations, (b) to the interests and rights of Coastal States as provided for in this convention, (c) to the provisions contained in the other articles of the convention. Further, all States have the duty to adopt, or to co-operate with other States in adopting such measures for their respective nationals as may be necessary for the conservation of the living resources of the High seas. Article 6 of the Convention provides that a Coastal State has a special interest in the maintenance of the productivity of the living resources in any area of the high seas adjacent to its territorial sea.[130] Articles 116 to 120 of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the sea now deal with the conservation and management of the living resources of the high seas.

It may also be noted that the freedom of the high seas "is not an absolute principle and has never been applied in absolute terms; because it contains an inherent danger of abuse of rights it has long since been qualified in various ways (the classic example being the provision for the Universal jurisdiction with regard to crimes of piracy). State practice, including the practice of major maritime powers, amply, demonstrate that coastal State may and do exercise jurisdiction and control over foreign vessels beyond territorial waters in order to prevent injury to their territory, to ensure their self-preservation, and to enforce their laws.........[131]. Further, "beyond the limits of national jurisdiction there will remain the greatest part of the seas and oceans of the world for which the traditional legal order must be reformed and revitalised to place less emphasis on Laissez faire and more on conservation and co-operation.[132] Finally, "what is required in the new legal order for the seas is a better balance of interests, a better balance as between exploitation and conservation, as between free seas and clean seas, as between peaceful uses strategic considerations, and as between coastal interests and flag interests." [133]

---

[124] Article 100.

[125] Article 108.

[126] Articles 116 to 120

* See also for UPPCS (2001) Q. 5 ; UPPCS (2005) Q. 5 ; IAS (2008) Q. 8(c).

[127] Article 87.

[128] Article 88.

[129] Article 89.

[130] As pointed out by H. Lauterpacht in his article "Sovereignty over Submarine Areas", BYBIL., Vol. XXVII (1950), 376 at p. 407; "Its (i.e.) freedom of the Seas true purpose is to ensure freedom of navigation, unhampered by exclusive claims of individual States, and freedom of utilization of the resources of the sea to a degree to which they can be equitably utilized by all. The resources of the submarine areas adjacent to the coast of the State cannot be feasibly and reasonably utilized by all. They can be so utilized mainly by the adjacent mainly (coastal State). Similarly, the true purpose of the object of securing the individual interest of any particular State provided that interest is not imcompatible with the two essential purposes of the freedom of the seas............"

Criticism of the traditional doctrine of the freedom of the seas*.— The doctrine of the freedom of the high seas is a typical example of Eurocentric law. It was devised and developed at a particular period of history to serve the needs and interests of the rich and powerful Industrial States of Western Europe and United States of America. It has been aptly remarked by Senator Metcalfe of the U.S.A. that "under the freedom of the seas doctrine there is not much equity, between developed and under-developed coastal nations" and "a less developed nation is a second class citizen." In the U. N. Seabed Committee, the representative of Kenya pointed out that in 1970 the developed countries with less than one-third of the world's population, had taken 60 per cent of the world catch of the fish while only 40 per cent had gone to the developing countries.[134] In the name of the freedom of the high seas the developed maritime countries have been using high seas for activities such as naval military operations, dumping radio active water, testing nuclear weapons and sending submarines equipped with nuclear missiles near the coasts of other states. The freedom of the seas was always interpreted by the technologically advanced and powerful military States as giving them a right to move across the wide open seas to threaten smaller States or to subjugate and colonize other people. Even today, the smaller States are concerned about several activities that take place on the high seas in the name of the doctrine of the freedom of the seas.[135] Further, "the assumptions on which the freedom of the seas doctrine was based have proved to be incorrect; the interests which it protected and the force which supported it have all radically changed." [136] The developing States of Asia, Africa and Latin America were very critical of the traditional doctrine of the freedom of the seas. It had, therefore, become necessary to adapt the traditional doctrine to the present times and circumstances so as to accommodate the interests of the developing and developed countries.[137]

The once-proud doctrine of 'freedom of the seas' has now fallen in hard time. The lawyers reared in the classical traditions of the law of the sea may deplore the sacrifice of large parts of the seas, but this appears to be the only alternative to chaos in an area which has become of major importance for the future and, indeed, for the survival of mankind.[138] The U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 has endeavoured to achieve the synthesis between the exclusive claims of developing countries and inclusive claims of major maritime powers.

---

[131] L.J.H. Legault. "The Freedom of the Seas : A Licence to Pollute ?", University of Toronto Law Journal, Vol. XXI (1971), p. 211 at p. 218.

[132] Ibid, at p. 220.

[133] Ibid, at p. 221.

* UPPCS (2001) Q. 9(b).

[134] U. N. Doc. A/A.C. 138/S.C. II S. R. 29 March, 1976, p. 6.

[135] R. P. Anand, "Tyranny" of the Freedom of the Seas Doctrine", International Studies, Vol. 12 (1973), p. 416 at p. 442.

[136] Ibid, at p. 429.

[137] As pointed out by William V. O'Brien and Armando C. Chapelli, the "freedom of the seas" policies informing the old constitutive process are obsolete and must be revised to protect other values, notably conservation and prevention of pollution" : McGill Law Journal, Vol. 19 (1973), p. 322 at p. 325.

[138] Lucius Caflisch, "The Future of the Law of the Sea", I.C.J. Review, No. 11. (December 1973), p. 35 at pp. 44-45.

Jurisdiction on the High Seas.—It is the duty of every State to fix the conditions for the grant of its nationality to ships, for the registration of ships in its territory, and for the right to fly its flag. Ships have the nationality of the State whose flag they are entitled to fly. There must exist a genuine link between the State and the ship.[139] Ships shall sail under the flag of one State only and, save in exceptional cases expressly provided for in international treaties or in the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea, shall be subject to its exclusive jurisdiction on the high seas. Except in case of a real transfer of ownership or change of registry, a ship cannot change its flag during a voyage or while in a port of call.[140] Every State shall effectively exercise its jurisdiction and control in administrative, technical and social matters over ships flying its flag.[141] Warships on high seas have complete immunity from the jurisdiction of any State other than flag State.[142] This immunity is only for State owned or operated by State and used only on government non-commercial service.[143]

In case of a collision or any other incident of navigation concerning a ship on the high seas, involving the penal or disciplinary responsibility of the master or of any other person in the service of the ship, no penal or disciplinary proceedings may be instituted against such person except before the judicial or administrative authorities either of the flag State or of the State of which such person is a national. No arrest or detention of the ship, even as a measure of investigation, shall be ordered by any authorities other than those of the State.[144]

It is clear from the above provision that the legal order on the high seas is based on the rule of international law under which every ship on the high seas is required to have the nationality of and to fly the flag of one State. Thus international law leaves it upon municipal laws of various States to fix conditions to be fulfilled by ships authorised to sail under its flag, rules relating to discipline on board of the ships and regarding punishment of ships sailing without authorisation under their flags. The rules of international law are thus supplemented by municipal laws of the States.[145]

Right of Visit.—The general rule is that the State whose flag ship is flying (and of course is entitled to fly) has complete jurisdiction over the ship and its crew. But this exclusive jurisdiction is subject to some exception. One such exception is right of visit. The general rule is that a war ship which encounters on the high seas a foreign ship, other than a ship entitled to complete immunity, is not justified in boarding it. But the war ship may board such a ship if there is reasonable ground for suspecting that :

(a) the ship is engaged in piracy ;

(b) the ship is engaged in slave trade ;

(c) the ship is engaged in unauthorized broadcasting and the flag State of the war ship has jurisdiction under Article 109 of 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea ;

(d) the ship is without nationality; or

(e) though flying a foreign flag or refusing to show its flag, the ship is, in reality, of the same nationality as the war ship.

If any of the above grounds exist, the war ship may proceed to verify the ship's right to fly its flag. To this end, it may send a boat under the command of officer to the suspected ship. If suspicion remains after the documents have been checked, it may proceed to a further examination on board the ship, which must be carried out with all possible consideration. If the suspicions prove to be unfounded, and provided that the ship boarded has not committed any act justifying them, it shall be compensated for any loss or damage that may have been sustained.[146]

---

[139] Article 91 of the Law of the Sea Convention, 1982.

[140] Article 92.

[141] Article 94.

[142] Article 95.

[143] Article 96.

[144] Article 97.

[145] Oppenheim's International Law, Ninth Edition, Vol. 1, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Longman Group U. K. Ltd. and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, p. 731.

Right of hot pursuit.—Yet another exception to the exclusive jurisdiction of the flag State over a vessel in the high seas is the right of hot pursuit. Article 111 of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 provides that the hot pursuit of a foreign ship may be undertaken when the competent authorities of the State have good reason to believe that the ship has violated the laws and regulations of that State. Such pursuit must be commenced when the foreign ship or one of its boats is within the internal waters, the archipelagic waters, the territorial sea or the contiguous zone of the pursuing State, and may only be continued outside the territorial sea or the contiguous zone if the pursuit has not been interrupted. The right of the hot pursuit shall apply mutatis mutandis to violations in the exclusive economic zone or on the continental shelf, including safety zones around continental shelf installations, of the laws and regulations of the coastal State applicable in accordance with the convention to the exclusive economic zone or continental shelf, including such safety zones.

The right of the hot pursuit ceases as soon as the ship pursued enters territorial sea of its own State, or of a third State. Hot pursuit is not deemed to have begun unless the pursuing ship has satisfied itself by such practicable means as may be available that the ship pursued or one of the boats or other craft working as a team and using the ship pursued as a mother ship is within the limits of territorial sea, or, as the case may be, without the contiguous zone or the exclusive Economic Zone or above the continental shelf. The pursuit may only be commenced after a visual or auditory signal to stop has been given at a distance which enables it to be seen or heard by the foreign ship.

The above provisions also apply to a hot pursuit effected by an aircraft. It is, however, necessary to note that the right of hot pursuit can be exercised only by war ships or military aircraft, or other ships or aircraft clearly marked and identifiable as being on government service and authorised to that effect.

Finally, there is a provision for payment of compensation for any loss or damage caused where a ship has been stopped or arrested outside the territorial sea in circumstances which do not justify the exercise of the right of hot pursuit.

Conservation and Management of the Living Resources of the High Seas.—As noted earlier, freedom of high seas is not an absolute principle. It does not mean freedom to pollute or over-exploit. With a view to maintain a better balance between exploitation and conservation, U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 contains a separate section (i.e. Section 2 of Part VII - dealing with High Seas) relating to the conservation and management of the Living Resources of the High Seas.

The Convention confers on the nationals of all States the right to engage in fishing on the high seas. But this right is subject to (a) their treaty obligations; and (b) the rights and duties as well as the interests of the coastal States.[147] Thus the rights of the States or their nationals are not absolute. Further, all States have the duty to take, or to co-operate with other States in taking such measures for their respective nationals as may be necessary for the conservation of the living resources of the high seas.[148] States shall also co-operate with each other in the conservation and management of living resources in the areas of the high seas.[149]

IX. REGIME OF ISLANDS

As regards the Regime of Islands, Article 121 provides the following :

---

[146] Article 110.

[147] Article 116.

[148] Article 117.

[149] Article 118; See also Article 119.

1. An island is a naturally formed area of land, surrounded by water, which is above water at high tide.
2. Except as provided for in paragraph 3, the territorial sea, the contiguous zone, the exclusive economic zone and the continental shelf of an island are determined in accordance with the provisions of the convention applicable to other land territory.
3. Rocks which cannot sustain human habitation or economic life of their own shall have no exclusive economic zone or continental shelf.

X. ENCLOSED OR SEMI-ENCLOSED SEAS

"Enclosed or semi-enclosed sea" means a gulf, basin, or sea surrounded by two or more states and connected to another sea or the ocean by a narrow outlet or consisting entirely or primarily of the territorial seas and exclusive economic zones of two or more coastal states.[150] States bordering an enclosed or semi-enclosed seas should co-operate with each other in the exercise of their rights and in the performance of their duties under the convention.[151]

XI. RIGHT OF ACCESS OF LAND-LOCKED STATES TO AND FROM THE SEA AND FREEDOM OF TRANSIT*

"Land-locked state" means a state which has no sea-coast.[152] "Transit state" means a state, with or without a sea-coast, situated between a land-locked state and the sea, through whose territory traffic in transit passes.[153] The U. N. convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 provides that land-locked states shall have the right of access to and from the sea for the purpose of exercising the rights provided for in the convention including those relating to the freedom of the high seas and the common heritage of mankind. To this end, land-locked states shall enjoy freedom of transit through the territory of transit states by all means of transport.[154] The terms and modalities for exercising freedom of transit shall be agreed between the land-locked states and transit states concerned through bilateral, sub-regional or regional agreements.[155] Transit states, in the exercise of their full sovereignty over their territory, shall have the right to take all measures necessary to ensure that the rights and facilities provided for in Part X of the convention shall in no way infringe their legitimate interests.[156]

The provisions of the convention, as well as special agreements relating to the exercise of the right of access to and from the sea, establishing rights and facilities on account of the special geographical position of land-locked states, are excluded from the application of the most favoured nation clause.[157] Further, traffic in transit shall not be subject to any customs duties, taxes or other charges except charges levied for specific services rendered in connection with such traffic.[158] For the convenience of traffic in transit, free zones or other customs facilities may be provided at the ports of entry and exit in the transit states by agreement between those states and the land-locked states.[159] Last but not the least, ships flying the flag of land-locked states shall enjoy treatment equal to that accorded to other foreign ships in maritime ports.[160]

---

[150] U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, Article 122.

[151] Ibid, Article 123.

* See also for P.C.C. (1995) Q. 8(b).

[152] Article 124 (1) (a).

[153] Article 124 (1) (b).

[154] Article 125 (1).

[155] Article 125 (2).

[156] Article 125 (3).

[157] Article 126.

[158] Article 127 (1).

[159] Article 128.

[160] Article 131.

XII. INTERNATIONAL SEA-BED AREA

Definition and Delimitation of the "Area"

The first essential requirement of a legal regime of the International Sea-bed Area (hereinafter called the "Area") is that the precise limits of the Area should be clearly defined and they should be delimited from other maritime zones. The Area has been defined as the sea-bed and ocean floor and sub-soil thereof beyond the limits of national jurisdiction. A pertinent question therefore arises as to what is the outer limit of a coastal State's jurisdiction in sea-bed. The first and second U. N. Conferences on the law of the sea failed to solve this question satisfactorily. The first U. N. Conference on the law of the sea which was held in Geneva in 1958 and which adopted four conventions including the convention on the continental shelf. It need not be overemphasized here that the outer limit of the continental shelf is the limit where the coastal state's national jurisdiction in sea-bed ends.

Beyond the continental shelf, the sea bottom falls away more steeply into deep water, until it levels out again in the floor of main ocean basins, which lie as much as ten or even fifteen thousand feet below the surface. The "Area" may therefore, be defined as the sea-bed and ocean floor of the sea and sub-soil thereof beyond the continental shelf of a coastal State and extending upto the continental shelf of other coastal States. But one million dollar question is as to where the continental shelf ends. We have seen earlier that the definition of the continental shelf contained in Article 1 of the Geneva Convention on Continental Shelf, 1958 is vague. The elastic clause of the definition providing the exploitability test created great confusion in this field.[161] An effective and workable definition of the "Area" is contingent upon a workable definition and agreement on the continental shelf. It is heartening to note that Article 76 of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 has removed the ambiguities of the earlier definition.[162]

As regards the outer limit of the continental shelf, Article 76, paragraph 5 now provides that it shall not exceed 350 nautical miles from the baselines from which the breadth of the territorial sea is measured or shall not exceed 100 nautical miles from the 2,500 metre isobath, which is a line connecting the depth of 2,500 metres.

It may be added that since the continental shelf comprises of the sea-bed and sub-soil of the submarine areas that extend beyond the territorial sea, its definition and delimitation is contingent upon a workable definition and agreement on the territorial sea. There is, however, a general consensus of States that the breadth of the territorial sea of a coastal State should be upto a limit not exceeding 12 nautical miles, measured from baselines. The limit has now been adopted in the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.[163] The "Area" comprises of the sea-bed and ocean floor and sub-soil thereof beyond the limits of national jurisdiction. The sea-bed and ocean floor beyond the limits of national jurisdiction begins where the outerlimit of the continental shelf of a shelf ends. According to Art. 76 of the Convention, all coastal states have a continental shelf to a distance of 200 nautical miles from the baselines from which the territorial sea is measured where the outer edge of the continental margin does not extends up to that distance. In case of states whose continental margin extends beyond 200 nautical miles, the continental shelf shall not exceed 350 nautical miles or shall not exceed 100 nautical miles from the 2,500 metre isobath, which is a line connecting the depth of 2,500 metres.

Development of the Law Relating to "Area"

The credit of taking the initiative to move the machinery of the U. N. for revision and progressive development of the law of the sea goes to Malta who in 1967 proposed the following in the General Assembly: "Declaration and Treaty concerning the reservation exclusively for peaceful purposes of the sea-bed and the ocean floor underlying the seas beyond the limits of the present national jurisdiction and the use of their resources in the interest of mankind." [164] When the General Assembly met to consider the proposal, the representative of Malta moved for the deletion of the words "Declaration and Treaty" in view of the concern of certain delegations, who thought the emphasis on "legal objectives" was premature.[165] In pursuance of the proposal of Maltese Government the General Assembly established a 35-member ad hoc Committee on December 18, 1967, to study the peaceful uses of the sea-bed and ocean-floor beyond the limits of national jurisdiction. Subsequently, it was replaced by a permanent 42 members U. N. sea-bed committee to study the peaceful uses of the sea-bed and ocean floor. Its membership was increased to 86 and 91 in 1970 and 1971 respectively. Later on, for substantive work, the committee was organised into three sub-committees. These sub-committees were entrusted with the task of making substantive work for the preparations for the Third Conference on the Law of the Sea.

---

[161] S. Oda, International Control of Sea Resources (Leyden, 1963), p. 167.

[162] For definition of Continental Shelf ; sea Part VI of this Chapter.

[163] See Article 3 of the Convention.

A great land mark in the development of law relating to the "Area" was the adoption of the Declaration of Principles of International Law, Governing the Deep Sea Floor (i.e., International Sea-bed Area) by the General Assembly on December 17, 1970,[166] on the basis of the report of the U. N. Sea-bed Committee. It was adopted by a vote of 108 in favour to none against with 14 abstentions. The Declaration contained following principles : 1. Declaration of the "Area" as common heritage of mankind.[167] 2. Non-appropriation of the "Area" by States or Persons. 3. No claim, exercise or acquiring of rights by States or persons over the "Area" incompatible with future International Regime and the Declaration of Principles. 4. Availability of the Area to all States exclusively for peaceful purposes. 5. Regulation of activities of States on the Area in accordance with Principles of International Law including the Charter of the U. N. 6. Exploitation of Resources for the benefit of Mankind as a whole. 7. Reservation of the Area exclusively for peaceful purposes. 8. Establishment of an International Regime to be established by an international Treaty of a Universal character, generally agreed upon. 9. International co-operation in scientific research for peaceful purposes. 10. Prevention of pollution and contamination and protection and conservation of Natural Resources. 11. Due regard to the Rights and Legitimate Interest of coastal States. 12. The proposed International Regime not to affect superjacent waters, Air Space above waters and Rights of coastal States. 13. Responsibility of States to carry on the activities in the Area in conformity with the International Organisation to be established. 14. Adjudication of Disputes in the Area. 15. Moratorium on the Exploitation in the Area until the establishment of an International regime.

Declaration of the "Area" and its Resources as the common Heritage of Mankind.—As declared in the first paragraph of the operative part of resolution 2749 (xxv), dated 17 December 1970, "the sea-bed and ocean-floor and the sub-soil thereof, beyond the limits of national jurisdiction as well as the resources of the area, are the common heritage of mankind. As remarked by the late Ambassador, H. S. Amara Singhe, formerly President of the Third U. N. Conference on the Law of the Sea, in his banquet address to the Fifth Annual Conference of the Law of the Sea Institute, June 15 —19, 1970, "The concept of common heritage of mankind as we understand it, is in effect the concept of property held in trust for all mankind property which belongs to no single nation but to the entire world. The main objection to the common heritage concept seems to be based partly on the fear that some of the heirs to that heritage might carve out what they regard as their share. This is a misunderstanding of the common heritage concept. An essential feature of the concept of common heritage is the indivisibility of that heritage. It is the acceptance of the principle of indivisibility that a rational means of an equitable sharing in the benefits resulting from the exploitation of that heritage could be ensured."[168]

---

[164] U. N. Doc A/6695.

[165] See Daniel S. Cheever, "The Role of the International Organisation in Ocean Development", Int. Orgn., Vol. XXII (Summer 1968), p. 630.

[166] General Assembly Resolution 2749 (XXV). For a detailed study; see S. K. Kapoor, "Principles of International Law Governing the Deep Sea Floor", Lawyer (July, 1973), pp. 133-143.

[167] This is the most important principle relating to the Area. There is general agreement about this principle. Even before the entry into force of 1982 Convention, this principle has attained the status of Jus Cogens.

The principle of common heritage of mankind has become an indispensable principle so far as the "Area" and its resources are concerned. Reference may be made here to preamble of the Antarctica Treaty which recognized that "it is in the interest of mankind that Antarctica shall continue forever to be used exclusively for peaceful purposes and shall not become the scene or object of international discord........."[169] Thus the Antarctica Treaty, though very near to it, stopped short of declaring the Antarctica as the common heritage of mankind. However, the principle of common heritage of mankind has been extended or applied in other fields also. For example, Art. 11, paragraph 1 of the Agreement Governing Activities of States on the Moon and other Celestial Bodies (1979)[170] incorporates this principle in respect of Moon and its natural resources.[171]

Article 136 of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 incorporates the principle in the following words : "The Area and its resources are the common heritage of mankind. This principle also finds mention in the preamble of the convention. Paragraph 6 of Article 311 (which deals with "Relation to other conventions and international agreements") provides : "States Parties agree that there shall be no amendments to the basic principle relating to the common heritage of mankind set forth in Article 136 and that they shall not be party to any agreement in derogation thereof." This is indeed a very important provision and by its adoption in the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, the principle of common heritage of mankind has risen to the status of jus cogens or a peremptory norm of general international law.[172] However, it had certainly been better and of course more in conformity with Articles 53 and 64 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, if it had added that any agreement entered into by any state party in respect of the "Area" and its resources in derogation of the principle of common heritage of mankind would be void.[173]

However, as pointed out by Ambassador Arvid Pardo of Malta, "No doubt, the declaration of the Seabed and its resources as the common heritage of mankind was bound to change the structural relationship between rich and poor countries. And that change amounted to a revolution not merely in the law of the sea but also in international relations."[174]

Significance of the 1970 Declaration of Principles.—Although the above principles were contained in a Central Assembly resolution, which is generally said to be of recommendatory character only, many of these principles have assumed added significance as there emerged general consensus of the States on them in the Sessions of the Third U. N. Conference on the Law of the sea and most of them have incorporated in the Convention of the Law of the Sea. Resolution 2749 (XXV) of the General Assembly which incorporated the above principles was adopted by 108 votes to none, with 14 abstentions. Since no state voted against it, it may be said to have been adopted unanimously. Even those States who on 17 December 1970 did not vote in favour of the resolution, subsequently supported it. Besides this, the principles contained in the said resolution have been recited and reaffirmed in subsequent resolutions of the General Assembly. Thus the principles declared in the said resolution are such as cannot be violated by member States and they will govern the Area until all international legal regime over the Area is established.

---

[168] See The Law of the Sea—The U. N. Ocean Management, Edited by Lewis M. Alexander (1971) p. 373.

[169] See A.J.I.L., Vol. 54 (1960) p. 477.

[170] See (A/34/664), Doc. A/Res/34/68.

[171] For other provisions of the 1979 Agreement see Chapter on "Outer Space",

[172] The author has expressed this view in his doctoral thesis on "The Legal Regime of the International Sea-bed Area" for which he has been awarded LL.D. by Lucknow University in 1986.

[173] Ibid.

[174] U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXX, No. 1 (March, 1993), p. 87.

Resources of the International Seabed Area and U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.—On the basis of the report of the U.N. sea-bed committee, the Third U. N. Conference on the Law of the Sea held its first Session in Newyork in 1973. By the end of the ninth session consensus had emerged in respect of most of the issues relating to the legal regime of the area. After the end of the eleventh session on 30 April, 1982, the draft of the convention was adopted by an over-whelming majority of 130 States. Finally on 10 December, 1982, as many as 119 States signed the Convention. By 31st January, 1995, 159 States have signed the Convention and 72 States have ratified it. As of January 2015, 167 countries (166 countries plus European Union) have become parties to the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea.

It may be noted here that the wealth of the sea is estimated at 300 million dollars but it could be several times more than that amount. One of the most valuable resources on the bottom of the oceans are the black potato shaped mineral rich manganese nodules. Indeed the immediate commercial focus is on these nodules which are strewen across the sea-floor. The manganese nodules contain as many as 40 different metals but the principal component of these nodules is manganese, nickel, cobalt, copper, zirconium and iron. According to the experts, bottom of the ocean contains copper enough to last the entire world for 6,000 years, compared with 40 years reserves on land. So is the case with nickel and aluminium—there is enough nickel to last 150,000, years as compared to 100 years, reserves on land and aluminium enough for 20,000 years, compared with 100 years' reserves on land. Thus, manganese nodules are "the largest mineral deposit on this planet. But for exploiting and processing these metals, highly sophisticated technology is required. Deep sea-bed mining and processing technology is possessed by a few corporations belonging to the industrialized countries. The corporations which are engaged in development of deep sea-bed mining technology are : American, British, French, Belgian, German, Dutch, Australian and Japanese. As pointed out in the Report of the Secretary-General, fewer than 10 ventures are likely to become operational within the next decade. The consortia, or corporations belonging to America have already invested $ 200 million for developing deep sea-bed technology and command a considerable lead over others".

Thus the exploitation of the resources of the Area will result in direct and immediate benefits to these corporations and ultimately to the few industrialized countries to which these corporations belong. These few industrialized countries also happen to be the major importers of the minerals to be exploited from the Area. On the other hand, there are about 20 developing countries who are the traditional exporters of the minerals to be exploited from the area. The commercial exploitation of manganese nodules will cause a decline of the prices of these minerals thereby adversely, affecting the export earnings of the land-leased developing producers of these minerals. There was therefore an urgent need to prevent or at least minimize adverse effects of the exploitation of the resources of the Area on these land-leased producer developing countries of these minerals. Consequently, before establishing a legal regime of the area, it was necessary to settle two major issues—(i) system of Exploration and Exploitation of the Area; and (ii) Production policies. Both these issues generated a lot of controversy during the third U. N. Conference on the Law of the Sea (hereinafter referred as U. N. CLOS).

System of Exploration and Exploitation (or who may exploit the resources of the area ?) :

The developed and developing states took diametrically opposite positions in this respect when the Third U. N. CLOS started negotiations in this respect. The developed states wanted free and non-discriminatory access to the resources of the Area on the condition that, a part of the revenues earned would be given to the International Sea-bed Authority (hereinafter referred as "the Authority"). On the other hand, the developing states took the position that since the area and its resources have been declared as the common heritage of mankind the exploitation of the resources of the area will be carried out by 'the Enterprise' sea-bed mining arm of the proposed Authority. After prolonged negotiations, a package, or compromise was evolved reconciling the above opposite positions. This compromise is known as 'the parallel system' which may be summarised in the following words :

The activities in the Area may be carried out by the Enterprise and States Parties or States Entities in association with the Authority. Activities in the Area shall be carried out and controlled on behalf of mankind as a whole. States Parties or States Entities will be allowed to exploit the minerals of the Area on the condition that for mining a site, they will have to submit an application covering a total area, sufficiently large and of sufficient commercial value to allow two mining operations, within 45 days of the receipt of such application along with data concerning polymetallic modules, the Authority shall designate the part which is to be reserved solely for the conduct of activities by that Authority through the Enterprise or in association with the developing States. Each operator (other than Enterprise) will be allowed to exploit minerals only if he undertakes to transfer technology to the Enterprise. If the operator himself is not the owner of the technology, he shall obtain a written assurance from the owner of the technology that he shall transfer the same technology to the Enterprise if and when requested by the Authority. This will also apply to a developing State or group of developing States which has applied for a contract to mine sites. The obligation to transfer technology shall be included in each contract for the conduct of activities in the Area until 10 years after the Enterprise has begun commercial production of minerals from the resources of the Area and may be invoked during that period. This system shall continue for an interim period of 15 years. After fifteen years a review conference shall be held to see whether the 'parallel system' has worked properly, i.e., to see whether the reserved areas have been exploited in an effective and balanced manner in comparison with non-reserved areas and whether the system has resulted in the equitable sharing of benefits to be derived from exploitation of the area taking into particular consideration the interests and needs of the developing countries.

The above 'package' can neither be said to be perfect or viable. It suffers from a number of defects but only this much was possible under the circumstances.

Production Policies

Yet another issue that generated a lot of controversy was production policies. A compromise or package that has been evolved in respect of production policies comprises of three main points : (i) Commodity Agreements, (ii) Production control Formula, and (iii) A system of compensation or other measures of economic adjustment assistance. As indicated above, exploitation of the resources of the Area will adversely affect the export earnings of land-based producer developing countries. With a view to meet this situation, consensus has emerged that the Authority, acting through existing forums or such new agreements as may be appropriate in which all interested parties, including both producers and consumers participate, shall take measures necessary to promote the growth, efficiency and stability of markets for those commodities produced from the resources of the Area, at prices remunerative to producers and fair to consumers.

As regards production control or ceiling formula, consensus emerged that during an interim period (which shall begin five years prior to 1st January of the year in which the earliest commercial production is planned to commence under an approved plan of work and shall last 25 years or until the end of the Review conference) commercial production shall not be undertaken pursuant to an approved plan of work until an operator has applied for and has been issued a production authorization from the Authority during a period beginning not more than five years prior to the planned commencement of commercial production under that plan of work unless the Authority prescribes another period in its rules and regulations having regard to the nature and timing of project development. There is also consensus in respect of the production ceiling which shall be fixed for any year of the interim period beginning with the year of the earliest commercial production.

As regards a system of compensation or other measures of economic adjustment assistance, there is general consensus that following the recommendations from the council on the basis of advice from Economic Planning Commission, the Assembly shall establish a system of compensation or other measures of economic adjustment assistance including co-operation with specialized agencies and other international organizations to assist developing countries which suffer adverse effects or their export earnings or economics resulting from a reduction in the price of an affected mineral or the volume of the mineral exported, to the extent that such reduction is caused by activities in the Area. The Authority on request shall initiate studies on the problems of those states which are likely to be most seriously affected with a view to minimizing their difficulties and assisting them in their economic adjustment.

International Sea-bed Authority

Article 156 of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 provides for the establishment of the International Sea-bed Authority. All state parties to the Convention are ipso facto members of the Authority. The seat of the Authority is in Jamaica. The Authority may establish such regional centres or offices as it deems necessary for the exercise of its functions.

Nature and Fundamental Principles of the Authority

The Authority is the organization through which state parties shall, in accordance with Part XI of the Convention organize and control activities in the International Sea-bed Area (hereinafter to be referred as the Area), particularly with a view to administering the resources of the Area. The powers and functions of the Authority shall be those expressly conferred upon it by the Convention. The Authority shall also have such incidental powers, consistent with the Conventions, as are implicit and necessary for the exercise of those powers and functions with respect to activities in the Area. The Authority is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all its members.

Principal Organs of the Authority

The principal organs of the Authority are following :—

(1) The Assembly.—The Assembly consists of all the members of the Authority each member shall have one representative in the Assembly, who may be accompanied by alternates and advisors. The Assembly shall meet in regular annual sessions and in such special sessions as may be decided by the Assembly, or convened by the Secretary-General at the request of the Council or of majority of the members of the Authority. The Assembly shall adopt its rules of procedure. A majority of the members of the Assembly shall constitute a quorum. Each member shall have one vote. Decisions on questions of procedure, including decisions to convene special sessions of the Assembly, shall be taken by a majority of the members present and voting. Decision on questions of substance shall be taken by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting, provided such majority includes a majority of the members participating in the session. When the issue arises as to whether a question is one of substance or not that question shall be treated as one of substance unless otherwise decided by the Assembly by the majority required for decisions on the question of substance.[175]

The Assembly is the sole organ of the Authority which consists of all the members and is considered the supreme organ of the Authority to which the other principal organs shall be accountable as specifically provided in the Convention. The Assembly has the power to establish general policies in conformity with the relevant provisions of the Convention on any question or matter within the competence of the Authority. The Assembly has the power to elect the members of the Council, the Secretary-General from among the members proposed by the Council, the members of the Governing Board of the Enterprise and the Director-General of the Enterprise. The Assembly can establish subsidiary organs if it finds necessary for the exercise of its functions. The Assembly has the power to assess the contributions of members to the administrative budget of the Authority in accordance with an agreed scale of assessment based upon the scale used for the regular budget of the United Nations until the Authority shall have sufficient income from other sources to meet its administrative expenses.[176]

---

[175] Article 159 of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

The first session of the Assembly was held at Kingston (Jamaica) in two parts. The second part of the first session was held from February 27 to March 17, 1995 but it failed to elect 36 member Council. Subsequently in March, 1996 the members of the Council were elected. India was elected as member of the Council for two years i.e. upto March, 1998 and then from 2000 to 2004. Other states elected in this category were China, France and Germany.

(2) The Council.—The Council consists of 36 members of the Authority elected by the Assembly in the following order :

(a) four members from among those State Parties, which during the last five years have either consumed more than 2 per cent of total world consumption or have had net imports of more than 2 per cent of total world imports of the commodities produced from the categories of minerals to be derived from the Area, and in any case one state from the Eastern European (Socialist) region, as well as the largest consumer ;

(b) four members from among the eight State Parties who have the largest investments in preparation for and in the conduct of activities in the Area, either directly or through their nationals, including at least one state from the Eastern European (Socialist) region ;

(c) four members from among State Parties which, on the basis of production in Areas under their jurisdiction are major net exporters of the categories of minerals to be derived from the Area, including at least two developing states whose exports of such minerals have a substantial bearing upon their economics ;

(d) six member from among developing State Parties representing special interests ;

(e) eighteen members elected according to the principle of ensuring an equitable geographical distribution of seats in the Council as a whole, provided that each geographical region shall have at least one member elected under this sub-paragraph. For this purpose the geographical regions shall be Africa, Asia, Eastern European (Socialist), Latin America and Western European and others.

A majority of the members of the Council shall constitute a quorum. Each member of the Council shall have one vote. Decisions on questions of procedure shall be taken by a majority of the members present and voting. Decision on questions of substance have been divided into several categories, some will be decided by a two-thirds majority, some by a three-fourth majority, while some others will be decided by consensus (i.e., the absence of any formal objection).[177]

The Council is the executive organ of the Authority.

It shall have the power to establish in conformity with the Convention and the general policies established by the Assembly, the specific policies to be pursued by the Authority on any question or matter within the competence of the Authority.[178]

Subsidiary organs of the Council.—Following are the two subsidiary organs of the Council.

(A) Economic Planning Commission.

(B) Legal and Technical Commission.

---

[176] Article 160.

[177] Article 161.

[178] Article 162.

Each of the above commissions shall be composed of 15 members, elected by the Council from among the candidates nominated by the State Parties. However, if necessary, the Council may decide to increase the size of either commissions having due regard to economy and efficiency.[179]

(3) The Secretariat.—The Secretariat of the Authority comprises a Secretary-General and such staff as the Authority may require. The Secretary-General shall be elected for four years by the Assembly from among the candidates proposed by the Council and may be re-elected. The Secretary-General shall be the chief administrative officer of the Authority, and shall act in that capacity in all the meetings of the Assembly, of the Council and of any subsidiary organ, and shall perform such other administrative functions as are entrusted to the Secretary-General by these organs.[180]

Other organs of the Authority

(1) Enterprise.—The Enterprise is the organ of the Authority which will carry out activities in the Area directly as well as the transporting, processing and marketing of minerals recovered from the Area. The Enterprise shall, within the framework of the international legal personality of the Authority, have such legal capacity as is provided for in the statute set forth in Annex IV. The Enterpise shall act in accordance with this Convention and the rules, regulations and procedures of the Authority, as well as the general policies established by the Assembly, and shall be subject to the directives and control of the Council. Its principal place of business shall be the seat of the Authority.[181]

(2) Sea-bed Disputes Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Law.—The establishment of the Sea-bed Disputes Chamber and the manner in which it shall exercise its jurisdiction shall be governed by the provisions of Section 5 of Part XI, Part XV and of Annex VI.[182]

International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea.—After the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 came into force on November 16, 1994, vigorous efforts were made for the establishment of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea. It was established on October 21, 1996.

N.B.:—In view of its importance a separate chapter has been devoted in Part IV of the book. Please, therefore, see Chapter on International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea and Sea Disputes Chamber for a detailed discussion.

As per agreement that has been reached under the Convention Authority will comprise of the following organs : 1. Assembly; 2. Council; 3. Secretariat; and 4. Enterprise. The Assembly, Council and Secretariat shall be the principal organs of the Authority. The Enterprise will be established as an organ through which the Authority shall directly carry out activities in the Area. The Assembly, a policy-making organ, shall consist of all the members of the Authority. The Council shall consist of 36 members of the Authority elected by the Assembly. The Council shall establish its two organs—(i) An Economic Planning Commission; and (ii) A Technical Commission. The Secretariat shall comprise of a Secretary-General and such staff as the Authority may require. The Secretary General shall be appointed by the Assembly upon the recommendation of the Council. He shall be the Chief Administrative Officer of the Authority. In addition to the above-mentioned organs, it is also proposed to establish the Sea-bed Disputes Chamber of the Law of the Sea Tribunal for settlement of disputes.

The Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 having come into force on 16th November, 1994, the first meeting (three-day Kingston meeting which was mainly commemorative) was held on the same date i.e. 16th November, 1994. The Assembly decided to reconvene its first session from 27th February to 17th March, 1995. During this meeting it dealt with such substantive matters as election of members of the council of the Authority, its Secretary-General and members of other major organs.

---

[179] Article 163.

[180] Article 166.

[181] Article 170.

[182] Article 186.

As regards the first election of the judges of the International Tribunal, the State Parties to the convention decided on 21st November, 1994 to defer this until August, 1996.

It may be noted here that on 27th March, 1996, India has been elected as a member of the Council of International Sea-bed Authority for six years under investor category. It will remain a member for two years till March, 1998 and then for four years from 2000 to 2004. Under investor category China, France and Germany were also elected as members.

Financial Arrangements

As regards the funds of the Authority, there is general consensus that they shall include : (a) assessed contributions made by State Parties; (b) funds transferred from the Enterprise; (c) receipts of the Authority arising from activities in the Area ; (d) loans received; and voluntary contributions made by State Parties or other entities. Further, the funds of the Enterprise shall include : (a) amounts received from the Authority; (b) voluntary contributions made by State Parties for the purpose of financing activities of the Enterprise; (c) amounts borrowed by Enterprise; (d) income of the Enterprise through its operations; and (e) other funds made available to the Enterprise to enable it to carry out its functions and to commence operations as soon as possible. Moreover, the Enterprise shall be provided with the funds necessary to explore and exploit one mine site, and to transport, process and market the metals recovered therefrom, namely, nickel, copper, cobalt and manganese and to meet its initial administrative expenses. The amount of the said funds, and the criteria and factors for its adjustment, shall be included by the Preparatory Commission in the draft rules, regulations and procedures of the Authority.

It may be noted here that according to the latest report of the Secretary-General, the annual administrative costs of all the organs to be established taken together might range from $41 million to $53 million. The totals for building and equipping their headquarters were given as a range of from $ 104 million to $ 229 million. As to the cost of an initial sea-bed mining venture, the report assumed three alternative amounts $ 700, $ 1,000 million and $ 1,400 million of those amounts, states would be called on to invest half.

The decision of U. S. and certain other Western Countries not to sign the Law of the Sea Convention and its implications.—As pointed out above, 22 States including U. S., U. K., West-Germany, Italy, Belgium and Japan—the States which really matter so far as capital and technology required for the purpose—did not sign the convention. Envisaging the situation that the U. S. might not join the convention and might prefer to persuade its industrial partners, Japan, U. K., Belgium and France to enact national legislation with reciprocating provisions—a "mini-treaty", Mr. T. B. Koh, President of the Third U. N. CLOS said in a Press Conference held in April 17, 1981, if that option become a reality, the developing and the socialist countries might proceed to adopt the draft convention, become partners to it, with the result that under international law there would be a mini-treaty signed by some five industrialized states and a "Maxi-treaty" signed by over 100 States. If the developing States decided to take the matter to the International Court of Justice, the court might rule in favour of the Maxi-treaty side holding that the national law in question was contrary to international law. In that event those who had developed the expensive sea-bed mining technology involving major economic investments would not obtain the kind of legal security which was necessary from risking venture capital.[183]

At the signing ceremony of the convention at Montego Bay (Jamaica) 10 December, 1982, the U. S. stated that under the circumstances, "alternative ways of preserving national access to deep sea-bed resources are necessary, just and permitted by international law." But many speakers challenged the notion that a nation could legally stake a claim to deep-sea minerals which the General Assembly before it had proclaimed as "the common heritage of mankind."[184] Obviously the U. S. was referring to the doctrine of the freedom of the high seas under which it preferred to stake the claim. The U. S. took this position in the Deep Sea-bed Hard Mineral Resources Act enacted by the U. S. Congress in June, 1980. Summing up the views on that point in the debate President Koh said in his final address on 10 December, 1982 that "speakers from every regional and interest group, expressed the view that the doctrine of the freedom of the high seas can provide no legal basis for the grant by any state of exclusive title to a specific mine site in the international area of the sea-bed." He added, "Any attempt by any State to mine the resources of the deep sea-bed outside the convention will earn the universal condemnation of the international community and will incur grave political and legal consequences.[185] Thus the decision of America and some other countries not to join the convention deserves condemnation by all alike, more so because America had taken very active and keen interest at all stages and made a significant contribution in evolving the 'package' on which the convention is based. This is good as far as it goes but the fact remains that without America and some other industrialized countries who possessed capital and technology required the convention could be expected to achieve objectives.

---

[183] U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XVIII, No. 5 (May, 1981), p. 22.

Some of the main reasons for the refusal of the U. S. to sign the convention were the provisions relating to (i) transfer of technology, (ii) production policies, (iii) decision making through majority rule, (iv) possibility that national liberation movements, such as P.L.O., may get share in the benefits, (v) creation of Enterprise a supra-national company, and (vi) pioneer investors to assume heavy financial obligations. Under the provisions, a pioneer investor has to pay a fixed annual fee of one million dollar to the Seabed Authority. The U. S. wants this provision to be scrapped. Thus countries like the U. S. have not signed because they feel Chapter XI of the Convention should be modified so that they have the least obligations.

It may be noted that India was also one of the countries who have not ratified the Convention. Being inspired by U. S. attitude India was adopting a wait and watch attitude. If U. S. did to renegotiate the Convention is successful, especially if the provision regarding payment of one million dollar by a pioneer investor is scrapped, India may gain a million dollar a year. Besides this, as pointed out by an Indian diplomat at the U. N. at the end of five day last round of closed-door negotiations in first week of September, 1993, "Things have changed since 80's" and now more or less India is "sitting on the fence". In sharp contrast to India's strong stand in favour of developing nations in the 1970's and 80's, the current negotiations indicate that the Indian position, though unclear at present may shift in favour of the affluent. But even India is concerned about some other moves initiated by the U. S. These moves include a bid seeking to abolish the pioneer investor's voting rights in the Council and to establish a powerful finance committee with overall control.

Obstacles to Universal Participation Removed

Objection to the convention's provisions relating to deep-seabed mining dealt mainly with the detailed procedures for production authorization from the deep seabed. Complex financial rules of contracts, decision making in the Council of the Seabed Authority, and mandatory transfer of technology.

With a view to overcome these objections, the U.N.-Secretary-General undertook informal consultations with all parties, lasting nearly four years. As a result, the General-Assembly adopted on 28 July, 1994 the Agreement Relating to the Implementation of Part XI.

The Agreement, in essence, removes the obstacles that had stood in the way of Universal acceptance by substituting general provisions for the detailed provisions contained in the convention and by leaving it to the Authority to determine at a future date the exact nature of the rules it would adopt with respect to the authorization of deep-seabed mining operations.

---

[184] U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XX, No. 2 (1983), p. 5.

[185] Ibid.

The Agreement also removed the obligation for mandatory transfer of technology and ensured the representation of certain countries, in the Council, while giving those countries powers over decision-making.[186]

Above all, it was agreed that the Agreement and Part XI would be applied together. In case of conflict between the two, the provisions of the Agreement would prevail.

Pioneer Investors.—In 1979, the U. S. made a proposal regarding the ways to protect investments made by states and private consortia but withdraw it early in 1981. Therefore, before the 1982 session, the conference had not discussed any proposal on the subject. During the first week of the 1982 session the issue was again raised on a proposal made by the U. S. and other western countries whose firms were already involved in deep sea exploration. Consequently, a scheme was devised by the conference and was set out in Resolution II (Resolution I is on the establishment of Preparatory Commission). It was adopted alongwith the convention although it was not part of it for it was intended to take effect before the convention entered into force. The convention had to be adjusted to the scheme, since many of the guarantees it afforded would extend into the first generation of sea-bed mining operations under the control of the Authority. The scheme will entitle states and private investors to qualify for registration by the Preparatory Commission as pioneer investors. This will entitle them to explore but not commercially exploit—a selected area of the seabed until the convention comes into effect. Further, it would guarantee them priority over all others except the Authority's own Enterprise—once the Authority permits commercial production from the deep sea-bed.

To qualify as pioneer investors, States and private consortia would have to spend at least $ 30 million on sea-bed activities by 1st January 1983, not less than 10 per cent of which must have been on a specific portion of the sea-bed. But for developing countries (other than India which was provided for separately) the said date was extended to 1st January 1985. As regards the number of pioneer investors, the revised draft limited it to eight plus an unspecified number from developing countries, the number of those who could qualify for pioneer status. These eight are divided into two groups of four each. The first, consists of France, Japan, India and the Soviet Union, including their State enterprises and corporations. The second group of four consists of entities made up of firms (namely, Kennecott Consortium, Ocean Mining Associates, Ocean Management Incorporated and Ocean Minerals Company) having the nationality of or controlled by any one or more of the following : Belgium, Canada, Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, United Kingdom and United States.

Under this scheme, each investor other than a State would have to be registered with the Preparatory Commission by a "certifying State" which had signed the convention. The pioneers would be confined during the prevention period to exploration and prospecting for polymetallic nodules in an allocated area, commercial exploitation would be excluded before the convention entered into force. Each applicant would receive only one site. Each pioneer would be required to pay $ 2,50,000 fee to the Commission for registration, plus $ 2,50,000 to the Authority when it applied for a plan of work (mining contract). There would be an additional fee of $ 1 million per year from the time the pioneer area was allocated, payable to the Authority when the investor's plan of work was approved. Before applications are submitted, certifying States would have to ensure that claims for particular areas do not overlap. Pioneer investors would be guaranteed entry into the sea-bed mining area under the convention once it enters into force. Only those pioneers certified by States which had ratified the convention would be entitled to have plans of work approved.[187]

The total reserves of nodules have been estimated at 3,000 billion tonnes. Unlike fossil, nodules are renewable and are widely distributed throughout the three major oceans of the world. Multinational Companies have already spent about Rs. 2,400 crores in developing capacity to mine the nodules. The economic potential of the metals found in the nodules is so great that even if ten per cent of estimated deposits turn out to be economic, sufficient supplies of many metals will be available from the sea for thousands of years at our present rate of consumption. India is short of many metals that nodules can provide.

---

[186] U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXXII No. 1 (March, 1995) p. 12.

[187] U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XIX No. 6 (June 1982) pp. 9-12.

A large part of the demand of copper is met by imports as also more than half of zinc and lead, the entire requirement of nickle, cobalt and vanadium are imported. Nearly 15 laboratories all over the country are participating in the analysis of the nodules. The first haul of nodules from the sea-bed was lifted by Indian research vessel "R. v. Ganeshani", a vessel owned by C.S.I.R. and run by the National Institute of Oceangraphy. Later on three more ships joined the fleet. According to Dr. T. K. S. Murthy, head of the Uranium extraction division, Bhabha Atomic Research Centre, the richest site discovered has a density of 21 kg. of nodules per square metre. Nodules are found at a depth of 3000 to 6000 metres in all oceans of the world. Nodules mining involves massive investment. The estimated cost of processing, transporting and exploring for one million tonnes of nodules per year will be between Rs. 200 and Rs. 800 crores.[188]

As noted above, India has been accorded pioneer status in sea-bed mining. On 26 August, 1987, the then Prime Minister of India informed the Lok Sabha that the Preparatory Commission had allocated to India a site (of 1,50,000 square kilometres) in the sea-bed of Central Indian Ocean and that Indian claim has been registered. The General Committee of the Preparatory Commission for the International Sea-bed Authority and for the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea took this decision on August 17, 1987.[189]

It may be noted that France, Japan and the Soviet Union became pioneer investors in the International Sea-bed Area on 16 May, 1988, joining India. It is indeed a significant step towards putting into practice the 1982 United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea, by which the Area has been established. The above decision was taken by the Commission in its sixth session held at Kingston during 14 March—8 April, 1988. In the resumed sixth session of the Commission held in Newyork from 15 August to 2 September, 1988, the Commission held informal consultations on fulfilment of obligations of "pioneer investors" registered under Resolution II of the Third U. N. Conference on the Law of the Sea.

Apart from India, the Pioneer Investors Group now comprises of Japan, France, China and former Soviet Union (now Russia) plus a Consortium of Belgium, Canada, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Britain and the U. S.

Preparatory Commission.—Resolution I adopted by the U. N. Conference on the Law of the Sea in its 1982 session deals with the establishment of the Preparatory Commission. It defines powers and functions of the Commission which is to prepare for the establishment of the International Sea-Bed Authority and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea. The Commission would begin meeting between 60 and 90 days after 50 States signed or acceded to the convention. It would be financed from United Nations regular budget and serviced by the United Nations Secretariat. It would remain in existence until the end of the first session of the Assembly of the Authority. The Commission would prepare draft rules, regulations and procedures necessary to enable the Authroity to commense its functions, as well as perform the traditional preparatory functions of drafting agendas and a budget. It would also exercise the powers and functions assigned to it in the resolution on the treatment of preparatory sea-bed investments. The first session of the Preparatory Commission was held in Jamaica from 15 March to 8 April, 1983. During its first session the Commission established four special Commissios of equal status with the Plenary. It also established a General Committee consisting of the Chairman and other officers of the Preparatory Commission and of the Sepcial Commissions.

---

[188] See the Pioneer, dated 12 April, 1986, p. 10.

[189] See I.J.I.L., Vol. 28 (1988), pp. 126-151.

The first part of the second session of the Preparatory Commission was held in Kingston, Jamaica from 9 March to 13 April, 1984. The third session of the Preparatory Commission was held in Jamaica in March-April, 1985. The fourth session was held in Jamaica from 17 March to 11 April, 1986. The sixth session was held in two parts—the first part in Kingston from 14 March to 8 April, 1988 and the second part from 15 August to 2 September, 1988. The seventh session of the Commission was held in two parts. The first part of the session was held at Kingston from 27th February to 23rd March, 1989. The Commission discussed the matter relating to liabilities of pioneer investors in respect of exploration of Sea-bed. It also considered the matters relating to Land-based producer States, Enterprise, Mining Code and Sea Law Tribunal. The second part or resumed seventh session was held from 14 August, 1989 to 1st September, 1989 at Newyork. In this resumed session the Commission considered duties, training etc., of new pioneer investors. In the eighth session, which was held from 13 to 31st August, 1990, the Commission approved the understanding on the fulfilment of obligation by the Registered Pioneer Investors and their certifying States. The ninth session of the Preparatory Commission was also held in two parts—(i) from 25 February to 22nd March, 1991 at Kingston, and (ii) 12 to 30th August, 1991 at Newyork. In the first part of the session China was welcomed as the fifth new pioneer investor. The tenth session was also held in two parts—(i) 24th February to 13th March, 1992 at Kingston; and (ii) 10th August to 21st August, 1992 at Newyork. In this session, an agreement was reached in respect of the Registration of exploitation of minerals from Sea-bed.

The eleventh session of the Preparatory Commission for the International Sea-bed Authority and for the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea was held at Kingstom from 22 March to 2nd April, 1993. In this session the Commission stressed the need for a framework agreement to deal with "hard core" issues that have so far eluded resolution. The "hard core" issues mainly involve provisions of Part XI of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea which deal with mining of the Sea-bed in area outside the jurisdiction or sovereignty of States. The Commission also decided not to hold any more meetings in 1993. Instead, it decided to make provisions every year for a two-week annual session, until the entry into force of the Convention.[190]

The Preparatory Commission concluded its last session on 12th August, 1994 ending 12 years of work. In its final report, the Commission recommended approval of a $2.5 million expenditure to establish and operate the International Seabed Authority, starting on 16th November, 1994. The Authority is to be headed by a Secretary-General who started work on 1st June, 1995. The Commission also approved the registration of the Republic of Korea as a pioneer investor and waived the $1million annual fee provided for in the convention for the pioneer investors.[191]

Provisional Understanding Regarding Sea-Bed Matters.—As referred in the beginning, on 3rd August, 1984, eight developed countries, namely, Belgium, France, Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Japan, Netherlands, the U. K. and the U.S.A. entered into a Provisional Understanding Regarding Sea-bed Matters. It aims to resolve conflicts arising out of possible overlapping in the areas claimed by pioneer investors. It provides that no party shall issue an autorization in respect of such areas. Further without such authorization or registration, no party shall itself engage in deep sea-bed operations. It also provides that no party shall authorize, or itself engage in, exploitation of the hard mineral resources of the deep sea-bed before 1 January, 1988. Thus eight developed countries established some form of a 'Mini Treaty' to facilitate the exploitation of deep sea-bed resources in terms of unilateral legislation.[192] As indicated earlier, such a Treaty will be void in view of Article 137 (3) and the Declaration adopted by the Preparatory Commission on 30 August, 1985.

---

[190] U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXX, No. 2 (June 1993), p. 71.

[191] U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXXI, No. 4 (December 1994), p. 42.

[192] See Bhimsen Rao, "Preparatory Commission for the International Sea-bed Authority and for the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea", I.J.I.L., Vol. 25 (1985) p. 226 at p. 234.

It is significant to note that Article 15 of the Provisional Understanding provides that the agreement is without prejudice to, nor does it affect, the position of the parties, or any obligations assumed by any of the Parties, in repect of the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea. It may be noted here that France, Japan, Belgium and Italy have signed the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea. Thus half of the States Parties to the Provisional Understanding have signed the Convention. Federal Republic of Germany has given an indication that it may also join the Convention if the Preparatory Commission could accommodate its deep sea-bed mining interests under the pioneer investors.[193] The position of U. K. is, though not as good, nearly same. It has been pointed out :

> "What has been called 'the convoluted compromise' over prospective community participation will certainly be widely interpreted as an attempt of the Federal Republic of Germany and the U. K. to secure eventually a form of limited accession with major accession.[194] If such a trend continues, the U. S. may be left alone in the field. It may therefore, be hoped that it will not be long before the U. S. also joins the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982." [195]

The world consesus will ultimately triumph and the 1982 Convention will provide an effective legal regime over nearly 70 per cent of the surface of our globe. Thus the Provisional Understanding between eight Developed Countries, rather I will prefer to call it 'Provisional Misunderstanding' will be null and void because of the 1982 Convention which is backed by world Consensus.

Thus, one major difficulty which has stood in the way of the treaty's universal acceptance was that the majority of the industrialized States are opposed to provisions governing the International regime for deep Sea-bed mining. As remarked by U. N. Secretary-General, Boutros-Boutros Ghali, a comprehensive solution would have to safeguard the principle of the common heritage of mankind. He added that it was the U. N.'s duty to ensure that the Convention "enters fully into force at last and really becomes the corner stone of tomorrow's international maritime law." [196]

Agreement Relating to the Implementation of Part XI of the convention (28 July, 1994).

With a view to overcome the objections of the industrial states, the U.N. Secretary-General undertook informal consultations with all interested parties, lasting nearly four years. As a result, the General Assembly adopted on 28 July 1994 the Agreement Relating to the Implementation of Part XI, thus removing the obstacle that stood in the way of universal participation of states to the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982. The General Assembly adopted this resolution (48/263) by a vote of 121 to none, with 7 abstentions.

XIII. PROTECTION AND PRESERVATION OF MARINE ENVIRONMENT*

One of the main achievements of the Third U. N. Conference on the Law of the Sea is to adopt generally agreed provisions relating to protection and preservation of the marine environment. These provisions which will govern nearly three-fourth of the surface of the earth are contained in Part XII of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea. In view of the increasing realization of the environment in general and that of marine environment in particular, these provisions are very important, nay, must for the survival of mankind.

---

[193] Ibid,at p. 244.

[194] K. R. Simmonds. "The Status of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea" I.C.L.Q., Vol. 34, p. 359 at p. 368.

[195] See also R. P. Anand, "U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea and the United Sates", I.J.I.L., Vol. 24 (1984) p. 153 at pp. 198-199.

[196] U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXX No. 2 (June, 1993) p. 71.

* IAS (2005) Q. 7(a).

The Convention provides that States have the obligation to protect and preserve the marine environment.[197] States have the sovereign right to exploit their natural resources pursuant to their environmental policies and in accordance with their duty to protect and preserve the marine environment.[198] The Convention imposes duty on States, individually or jointly as appropriate, to take measures to prevent, reduce, and control pollution of the marine environment.[199] States shall co-operate on a global basis and, as appropriate on a regional basis, directly or through competent international organizations, in formulating and elaborating international rules, standards and recommended practices and procedures consistent with this Convention, for the protection and preservation of the marine environment, taking into account characteristic regional centres.

The Convention provides for detailed International rules and national legislation to prevent, reduce and control pollution from land based sources.[200] sea-bed activities subject to national jurisdiction,[201] activities in the area[202] by dumping,[203] vessels[204] from or through the atmosphere.[205] States are responsible for the fulfilment of their international obligations, concerning the protection and preservation of the marine environment. They shall be liable in accordance with International law.[206]

XIV. MARINE SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH

Part XIV of the Convention deals with marine scientific research.[207] According to the Convention, all States and competent International organizations have the right to conduct marine scientific research subject to the rights and duties of other States as provided under the Convention.[208] States and competent international organizations have been enjoined to promote and facilitate the development and conduct of marine sientific research in accordance with the Convention.[209] The Convention lays down general principles for the conduct of marine scientific research.[210] Detailed provisions relating to conduct and promotion of marine scientific research.[211] Scientific research installations or equipment in the marine environment,[212] responsibility and liability[213] and settlement of Disputes and Interim Measures[214]have been made.

XV. SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES

Since the Convention on the Law of the Sea would have been incomplete without provisions relating to Settlement of Disputes, Part XV of the Convention is devoted to such provisions. These provisions may broadly be divided into two parts—(i) General Provisions, and (ii) Compulsory Procedures Entailing Binding Decisions.

As regards the General Provisions, Art. 279 imposes obligation upon State Parties to settle disputes by peaceful means. According to Article 280, State Parties may agree to settle a dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention by any peaceful means of their own choice. The Convention also provides for procedure where no settlement has been reached by the Parties.[215] Provisions relating to obligation to exchange views[216] and conciliation[217] have also been made.

---

[197] Article 192.

[198] Article 193.

[199] Article 194. See also Articles 195 and 196.

[200] Article 207.

[201] Article 208.

[202] Article 209.

[203] Article 210.

[204] Article 211.

[205] Article 212.

[206] Article 235.

[207] See Articles 238-278.

[208] Article 238.

[209] Article 239

[210] Article 240.

[211] See Articles 245 to 257

[212] See Articles 258 to 262.

[213] Article 263.

[214] Article 264 and 265.

As regards Compulsory Procedures Entailing Binding Decisions, the Convention has made "a significant departure from the traditional principle of International law under which a State has the sovereign right to refuse to submit a dispute to an independent body." [218] Article 286 of the Convention provides that any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention shall, where no settlement has been reached by recourse to Section 1 (i.e., provisions referred above), be submitted at the request of any party to the dispute to the court or tribunal having jurisdiction. This is however, subject to certain limitations contained in Section 3 comprising of Articles 297, 298 and 299. As regards choice of procedure, Article 287 (1) provides that when signing, ratifying or acceding to this Convention or at any time thereafter, a State shall be free to choose, by means of a written declaration, one or more of the following means for the settlement of disputes concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention :

(a) The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea established in accordance with Annex. VI;

N.B.—The International Tribunal for the Law of Sea referred to in Article 287 was finally established on 21 October, 1996. This has been discussed in detail in the next chapter, i.e. Chapter 20.

(b) the International Court of Justice;

(c) an arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with Annex. VII;

(d) a special arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with Annex. VIII for one or more of the categories of disputes specified therein.

Further, a declaration made under the above provision shall not affect or be affected by the obligation of a State Party to accept the jurisdiction of the Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea to the extent and in the manner provided for in Part XI, Section 5.[219]

Article 288 which deals with the jurisdiction of a court or tribunal referred to in Article 287 also provides that in the event of a dispute as to whether a court or tribunal has jurisdiction, the matter shall be settled by decision of that court or tribunal.[220] As regards applicable law, Article 293 provides the following :

1. A court or tribunal having jurisdiction under this section shall apply this Convention and other rules of international law not incompatible with this Convention.
2. Paragraph 1 does not prejudice the power of the court or tribunal having jurisdiction under this section to decide a case ex aequo et bono, if the parties so agree.

Lastly, Article 296, provides that any decision rendered by a court or tribunal having jurisdiction under Section 2 shall be final and shall be complied with by all the parties to the dispute. But any such decision shall have no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular dispute. Article 297 is on the lines of Articles 59 and 60 of tne Statute of the International Court of Justice and combines both these articles. Article 296 is however, conspicuous by its silence in respect of the power of the court or tribunal to construe its judgment at the request of any party in the event of dispute as to the meaning or scope of the judgment.

---

[215] Article 281.

[216] Article 283

[217] Article 284.

[218] Jorge R. Coquia, "Settlement of Disputes in the U. N. Convention on the Law of the Sea",I.J.I.L.. Vol. 25 (1985) p. 171 at p. 190.

[219] Article 287 (2).

[220] Article 288 (4).

Nevertheless, "the New Convention contains a number of innovative and very significant provisions involving the settlement of international disputes. While the provisions are limited only to disputes arising from the Convention on the Law of the Sea, they can be considered as a significant break through for the peaceful settlement of international disputes with more effective and binding effect." [221] To achieve the desired effect, these provisions should be fully implemented.

Prompt Release of vessels and crews

Article 292 of the U.N. Convention on the Law of Sea, 1982 deals with the prompt release of vessels and crews. It provide the following :

1. Where the authorities of a State Party have detained a vessel flying the flag of another State Party and if it is alleged that the detaining state has not complied with the provisions of this Convention for the prompt release of the vessel or its crew upon the posting of a reasonable bond or other security, the question of release from detention may be submitted to any court or tribunal agreed upon by the parties, or failing such agreement within 10 days from the time of detention, to a court or tribunal accepted by the detaining state under Article 287 or to the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, unless the parties otherwise agree.

2. The application for release may be made only by or on behalf of the flag state of the vessel.

3. The court or tribunal shall deal without delay the application for release and shall deal only with the question of release, without prejudice to the merits of any case before the appropriate domestic forum against the vessel, its owner or its crew. The authorities of the detaining state remain competent to release the vessel or its crew at any time.

4. Upon the posting of the bond or other financial security determined by the court or tribunal, the authorities of the detaining state shall comply promptly with the decision of the court or tribunal concerning the release of the vessel or its crew.

The above provisions were invoked by Saint Vincent and the grenadines against Guinea in The M/v. Saiga case which was decided by the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea on 4th December, 1997. The facts this case are as follows :

On 13 November, 1997, the Agent of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines filed in the Registry of the Tribunal an application under Article 292 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea instituting proceedings against Guinea in respect of a dispute concerning the prompt release of M/v. "Saiga" and its crew. According to Saint Vincent and the Grenadines M/v. "Saiga" did not enter the territorial waters of Guinea. While the ship was drifting in the exclusive economic zone of Sierra Leone it was attacked by two customs patrol boats of Guinea. It was alleged that the Guinean authorities had no jurisdiction to take such action. At the time of the incident, the M/v. "Saiga" served as a bunkering vessel supplying fuel oil to the fishing vessel and other vessels operating off the coast of Guinea. In the early morning of 27 October, 1997, the M/v. "Saiga" having crossed the maritime boundary between Guinea and Guinea Bissau, entered the exclusive zone of Gunea approximately 32 nautical miles from the Guinean island of Alcatraz. On 28th October, 1997, the M/v. "Saiga" was arrested by Guinean customs patrol boats. The arrest took place at a point south of the maritime boundary of the exclusive economic zone of guinea. In the course of action, at least two crew members were injured on the same day the vessel was brought into Conakry where the vessel and its crew were detained. Subsequently, the two injured crew members were allowed to leave and the cargo was discharged in Conakry upon the orders of local authorities. No bond or other financial security was requested by Guinean authorities for the release of the vessel and its crew or offered by Saint Vincent and the Grenadines.

Guinea contended that the Application had not been submitted in conformity with Article 110 of the Rules of the Tribunal and Article 292 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea was not applicable to the case. Guinea further stated that M/v. "Saiga" was involved in smuggling, an offence under the customs Code of Guinea and that the detention had taken place after the exercise by Guinea of the right of hot pursuit in accordance with Article 111 of the convention.

---

[221] Jorge R. Coquia, note 218 p. 171.

Before proceeding with the facts, the Tribunal held that it has jurisdiction.

While relying upon Article 292 of the Convention Saint Vincent and the Grenadines also refered to Articles 73, 220 and 226. Guinea, on the other hand, urged that reference made by Saint Vincent and Grenadines to Article 73[222] of the Convention is unfounded because a bond has been posted and Article 292 is not applicable to the case which, in its opinion concerns smuggling. Guinea further stated that the arrest of the M/v Saiga was in conformity with International Law and its release cannot be claimed on the basis of Article 292 of the Convention. According to Guinea : (a) the bunkering must be qualified its an infringement of its customs legislation; (b) the bunkering took place in its contiguous zone (less than 24 nautical miles from the island of Alcatraz); and (c) the arrest was justified because it was effected following the exercise of the right of hot pursuit according to Article 111 of the Convention.

Before proceeding to decide substantive issues, the Tribunal observed that it is not called upon to determine whether true detention of the M/v "Saiga" was legitimate. It was called upon to determine whether the detention consequent to the arrest is in violation of a provision of the Convention "for the prompt release of the vessel or its crew upon the posting of a reasonable bond or other financial security".

From the pleadings and documents submitted by Guinea there also emerged inductions that the violation of which the M/v Saiga was accused was seen as the violation concerning its rights in the exclusive economic zone while discussing the applicability of Article 73 to the present dispute, the Tribunal observed that in the light of the independent character of the proceedings for the prompt release of vessels and crews, when adopting its classification of the laws of the detaining state, the Tribunal is not bound by the classification given by such state. The Tribunal can, on the basis of the arguments made, conclude that, for the purposes of the present proceedings, the action of Guinea can be seen within the framework of Article 73. The Tribunal then proceeded to consider the submission of Guinea that Article 73 of the Convention cannot form a basis for the application because a bond or other security has not been offered, or posted.

The Tribunal pointed out that in the case under consideration Guinea has not notified the detention as provided for in Article 73, paragraph 4, of the convention. Guinea has refused to discuss the question of bond and the ten day time-limit relevant for the application for prompt release has elapsed without the indication of willingness to consider the question. The Tribunal, therefore, observed that in the circumstances, it does not seem possible to the Tribunal to hold that Saint Vincent and the Grenadines responsible for the fact that a bond has not been posted. The Tribunal further held that taking into consideration the commercial value of the gasoil discharged and the difficulties that be incurred in restoring the gasoil to the holds of the M/v "Saiga", it is reasonable that the discharged oil shall be considered as a security to be held and as case may be, returned by Guinea, in kind or in its equivalent in United States dollars at the time of judgement.

After having unanimously decided that the Tribunal has jurisdiction under Article 292 of the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea to entertain the Application filed by Saint Vincent and the Grenadines on 13th November, 1997, the Tribunal decided the following by 12 votes to 9 :

(i) that the Application is admissible.

(ii) that Guinea shall promptly release the M/v. Saiga and its crew from detention.

(iii) that the release shall be upon the posting of a reasonable bond or security; and

---

[222] For the provisions of Article 73, see matter earlier discussed under Exclusive Economic Zone.

(iv) that the security shall consist of : (1) the amount of gasoil discharged from the M/v. Saiga; (2) the amount of 400,000 United States dollars, to be posted in the form of a letter of credit or bank guarantee, or, if agreed by the parties, in any other form.

Subsequently on 22nd December, 1997 Saint Vincent and Grenadines instituted proceedings for provisional measures in accordance with Annex. VII of the Convention in respect of the dispute concerning the M/v. Saiga. In this case i.e. the M/v "Saiga" No. 2 (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea), the Tribunal gave its orders on 11th March, 1998 on 13th January, 1998, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines filed with the Registry of the Tribunal a request for the prescription of provisional measures in Convention with the arrest by Guinean authorities of a vessel, the M/v Saiga, flying the flag of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines on 20th February, 1998 the Tribunal was informed that the Government of Guinea and the Government of Saint Vincent and the Grenadiners had agreed to transfer to the Tribunal the arbitration proceedings instituted by Saint Vincent and the Grenadines. The Tribunal was also informed by the parties that the M/v Saiga, its Master and crew had been released in execution of the Tribunal's judgement of 4th December, 1997. The Tribunal unanimously prescribed the following provisional measure under Article 290, paragraph 1, of the Convention :

"Guinea shall refrain from taking or enforcing any judicial or administrative measure against the M/v Saiga, its Master and the other members of the crew, its owners or operators, in connection with the incidents leading to the arrest and detention of the vessel on 28th October, 1997 and to the subsequent prosecution and conviction of the Master."

Further, the Tribunal unanimously recommended "that Saint Vincent and the Grenadines and Guinea endeavour to find an arrangement to be applied pending the final decision and to this end the two states should ensure that no action is taken by their respective authorities or vessel flying flag which might aggravate or extend the dispute submitted to the Tribunal".

The U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 has already entered into force. As pointed out by U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros Ghali, addressing the first meeting of the Assembly of the International Seabed Authority on 16th November, 1994, the entry into force of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea has turned the dream of a comprehensive law for the oceans into a reality and is one of the greatest achievements of this century.[223]

So far 168 countries (166 countries plus European Union) have become parties to the Convention on the Law of the Sea. U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea is now regarded as codification on the customary Law of the Sea.

---

[223] U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXXII, No. 1, (March, 1995), p. 8.

CHAPTER 17

THE INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNAL FOR THE LAW OF THE SEA AND SEA-BED DISPUTES CHAMBER

Introduction.—Article 287 of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea provides that when signing, ratifying or acceding to the convention or at any time thereafter a state shall be free to choose, by means of a written declaration, one or more of the following means for the settlement of disputes concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention :

(a) The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea established in accordance with Annex VI.
(b) The International Court of Justice ;
(c) an arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with Annex VIII;
(d) a special arbitral tribunal constituted in accordance with Annex VIII for one or more of the categories of disputes specified therein.[1]

It is further provided that a declaration made under paragraph 1 of Article 287 shall not affect or be affected by the obligation of a state party to accept the jurisdiction of the Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea to the extent and in the manner provided for in Part XI of the Convention, section 5.[2] Further, a State Party, which is a party to the dispute not covered by a declaration in force, shall be deemed to have accepted arbitration in accordance with Annex VII.[3]

The United Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 having come into force on November 16, 1994 vigorous efforts were made to establish the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea. The seat of the Tribunal is in the Free and Hanseatic city of Hamburg in the Federal Republic of Germany. The Tribunal may, however, sit and exercise its functions elsewhere whenever it considers this desirable. In August, 1996, 21 Judges of the Tribunal were elected. In accordance with the Law of the Sea convention, they were elected on the basis of 'equitable geographical distribution'. Dr. P.C. Rao of India was also elected as one of the Judges of the Tribunal. After all formality were completed, the Tribunal was finally established on 21 October 1996.[4]

Composition.—The International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea comprises of a body of 21 members, elected from among persons enjoying the highest reputation of fairness and integrity and of recognized competence in the field of the law of the sea. In the Tribunal as a whole the representation of the principal legal system of the world and 'equitable geographical distribution' shall be assured.[5]

No two members of the Tribunals may be the nationals of the same State. There shall be no fewer than three members from each geographical group as established by the General Assembly of the United Nations.[6] On August 1996, twenty one members of the Tribunal were elected on the basis of 'equitable geographical distribution' out of these

---

[1] Article 287, paragraph 1.

[2] Article 287, para 2.

[3] Ibid., para 3.

[4] Article 1 of the Statute of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, Annexe VI of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

[5] Article 2 of the Statute.

[6] Article 3.

21 members, 5 are from Asia, 5 from Africa, 4 from Western Europe 4 from Latin America and, Caribbean States and 3 from Eastern Europe.

The members of the Tribunal are elected for nine years and may be re-elected; provided however, that the members elected at the first election, the terms of seven members shall expire at the end of three years and the terms of seven more shall expire at the end of six years. The members of the Tribunal whose terms are to expire at the above-mentioned initial period of three and six years shall be chosen by lot to be drawn by the Secretary-General of the United Nations immediately after the first election.[7]

Access to the Tribunal.—All the State Parties to the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea have access to the Tribunal. The Tribunal shall be open to entities other than State Parties in any case expressly provided in Part XI of the Convention or in any submitted persuant to any other agreement conferring jurisdiction on the Tribunal which is accepted by all the parties to that case.[8]

Applicable Law.—The Tribunal shall decide all disputes and applications in accordance with Article 293 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea. According to Article 293, the Tribunal shall apply the Convention and other rules of international law not incompatible with the Convention. However, this will not prejudice the power of the Tribunal to decide a case ex acquo et bono, if the parties so agree.

Any decision rendered by the Tribunal shall be final and binding and shall be complied with by all parties to the dispute. But any such decision shall have no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular dispute.[9]

Jurisprudence.—According to Article 288 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982, the Tribunal shall have jurisdiction over any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the Convention which is submitted to it in accordance with Part XV of the Convention. The Tribunal shall also have jurisdiction over any dispute concerning the interpretation or application of an international agreement related to the purposes to the Convention, which is submitted to it in accordance with the agreement.

In the event of a dispute as to whether the tribunal has jurisdiction, the matter shall be settled by decision of the Tribunal.

Thus the Tribunal exercises jurisdiction over all disputes and all applications submitted to it in accordance with the Convention and all matters specifically provided for in any other agreement which confers jurisdiction on the Tribunal.[10] As regards reference of disputes subject to other Agreements, Article 22 of the Statute of the Convention provides that of all the parties to a treaty or convention already in force and concerning the subject matter covered by the Law of the Sea Convention so agree, any disputes concerning the interpretation or application of such treaty or convention may, in accordance with such agreement, be submitted to the Tribunal.

Thus the jurisdiction of the Tribunal is not compulsory. It is optional and voluntary and based on the consent of parties to the dispute.

Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber

Composition.—Article 186 of the Convention on the Law of the Sea provides that the establishment of the Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber and the manner in which it shall exercise its jurisdiction shall be governed by the provisions of section 5 of Part XI, Part XV and Annex VI of the Convention. Article 14 of the Statute (Annex VI) provides that a Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber shall be established in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of Annex VI containing Articles 35 to 40. Article 35, of the Statute, which deals with the composition of Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber, provides that the Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber shall be composed of 11 members, selected by a majority of the elected members of the Tribunal from among them. In the selection of the members of the Chamber, the representation of the principal legal systems of the world and equitable geographical distribution shall be assured.

---

[7] Article 5.

[8] Article 20. See also Article 291 of the Convention.

[9] Article 296 of the Convention.

[10] Article 21 of the Statute.

The members of the Chamber shall be selected every three years and may be selected for a second terms. The Chamber shall elect its President from among its members, who shall serve for the terms for which the Chamber has been selected.

The Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber may form ad hoc chamber, composed of three of its members, for dealing with a particular dispute submitted to it in accordance with Article 188, paragraph 1(b).

Special Chambers.—The Tribunal may form such chambers, composed of three or more of its elected members, as it consider necessary for dealing with particular categories of disputes. This is provided in Article 15, paragraph 1 of the Statute of the Tribunal. Acting pursuant to this provision the Tribunal at a meeting on 14 February 1997 formed Special Chamber for Fisheries Disputes. The Tribunal at its meeting on 20 February 1997 selected seven members of the Tribunal to serve in the chamber for Fisheries Disputes. The seven members selected are : Hugo caminos, Soji Yamamoto, Paul Bamela Engo, P. Chandrasekhara (India), David H. Anderson, Edward A. Laing and Gudmundur Eiriksson. The term of office of these members will end on 30th September 1999. The Tribunal also decided that the Chamber for Fisheries Disputes will be available to deal with disputes which the parties agree to submit to it concerning the interpretation or application of any provision of :

(a) U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea concerning the conservation and management of marine living resources ; and

(b) any other agreement relating to the conservation and management of marine living resources which confers jurisdiction on the Tribunal.[11]

On the same date i.e. on 14 February 1997, the Tribunal formed a standing special chamber for Marine Environment Disputes on 20 February 1997, the Tribunal selected seven members to svine on this special chamber. The members selected are : Rudiger Wolfruom (President of the Chamber), Alexander Yankov, Soji Yamamoto, Antoly L. Kolodkim, Choon-Ho Park, Joseph S. Warioba and Mohamed Mouldi Marsit. The term of the office of the members will end on 30 September 1999. The Tribunal also decided that the Chamber will be available to deal with disputes which the parties agree to submit to it concerning the interpretation or application of any provision of :

(a) the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea concerning the protection and preservation of marine environment.

(b) special convention and agreements relating to the protection and preservation of the marine environment referred to in Article 237 of the convention; and

(c) any agreement relating to the protection and preservation of the marine environment which confers jurisdiction in the Tribunal.[12]

Advisory opinions.—According to Article 191 of the U.N. Convention on the Sea, the Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber shall give advisory opinions at the request of the Assembly or the Council of the International Sea-Bed Authority on legal questions arising within the scope of their activities. Such opinions shall be given as a matter of urgency.

---

[11] See Doc. ITLOS/1997/Res/of 30 April 1997.

[12] See ; Doc. ITLOS/1997/Res. 2 of 30 April 1977.

Finality and Binding Force of Decisions.—The decision of the Tribunal is final and shall be complied with by all the parties to the dispute. But the decision of the Tribunal shall have no binding force except between the parties and in respect of that particular dispute. In the event of dispute as to the meaning or scope of the decision, the Tribunal shall construe it upon the request of any party.[13]

Cases Decided by the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea.—Following are the cases which have been decided by the Tribunal :—

(1) The M/v. "Saiga" case (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines v. Guinea)[14]

(2) The M/v. "Saiga" case (Saint Vincent and the Grenadines v. Gunia)[15].—Request for Provisional measures.

So far twenty one cases have been decided by the Tribunal. Following are the last three cases decided by the Tribunal :

(19) M.V. 'Virginia' G case (Panama-Guinea Bissau, 2011).

(20) ARA Liberated (Q2) (Argentina-Ghana, 2012).

(21) Green peace Arctic Sunrise Ship case (Netherland-Russia, 2013).

The current President of the Tribunal is Shunj Ivanai and the Vice President is Albert J. Hoffman. 161 countries (member States) have conferred jurisdiction upon the Tribunal to decide their disputes.

N.B.—These cases have been discussed in the preceding chapter on "the Law of the Sea".

Agreement on Cooperation and Relationship between the U.N. and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea

On 18th December, 1997 the U.N. and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea (ITLOS) entered into an Agreement on Cooperation and Relationship for the Law of the Sea.[16] Under the agreement the U.N. recognizes ITLOS as an autonomous international judicial body with jurisdiction as provided for in the relevant provisions of the Convention and the statute of International Tribunal annexed thereto.[17] As regards cooperation and coordination, Article 2 of the agreement provides that the U.N. and the International Tribunal with a view to facilitating the effective attainment of their objections and the coordination of their activities, will : (a) consult and cooperate, whenever appropriate, on matters of mutual concern; and (b) pursue whenever appropriate, initiatives to coordinate their activities.

The agreement also provides for reciprocal representation,[18] exchange of information and documents,[19] Personnel arrangement,[20] Administration cooperation,[21] Budgetary and Financial matters,[22] Financing of Services[23] etc. As regards reports to the U.N., Article 5 provides that the International Tribunal shall keep the U.N. informed of its activities that may require the attention of the U.N. For this purpose, the International Tribunal may, when it deems it appropriate : (a) Submit reports to the U.N. through the Secretary General of the U.N. (b) Notify the Secretary General of the U. N. whenever in its opinion, a question within the competence of the security, in particular relating to the application of Article 298, paragraph 1(c) of the Convention arises in connection with the work of the International Tribunal. As regards Conference services, the Agreement provides that upon the request of the International Tribunal on a reimbursable basis, such facilities and services as may be required for the sessions of the International Tribunal including translation and interpretation services, documentation and conference services.[24]

---

[13] Article 33 of the Statute.

[14] Decided on 4th December, 1997.

[15] Decided on 11th March, 1998.

[16] See ITLOS/INF 29 dated 12th March, 1998.

[17] Article 1 of the agreement.

[18] Article 3.

[19] Article 4.

[20] Article 6.

[21] Article 8.

[22] Article 10.

[23] Article 11.

The agreement has already entered into force because as required under Article 14, both the General Assembly of the U.N. and the International Tribunal have approved it.

Conclusion.—The establishment of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea is a great landmark in the development of the Law of the Sea. In some circles its establishment has been criticised on the ground that it was not necessary in the presence of the International Court of Justice. This criticism does not seem to be justified. The codification of the entire law of the sea which covers nearly 71.4% of the earth's space, would have been incomplete if it did not provide dispute settlement mechanism. A right without a remedy is meaningless and contradiction in terms. Law of the sea has its own special problems and may involve special disputes and can be better dealt with by a Law of the Sea Tribunal, rather than by a general tribunal such as the International Court of Justice. Though it is true that the International Tribunal of the Law of the Sea is only one of the means of for the settlement of disputes relating to the Law of the Sea including the interpretation or application of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea and the Jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice has been left intact, yet the importance of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea cannot be undermined because it is best suited to deal with the disputes relating to the Law of the Sea. The dispute relating to the Law of the Sea requires special dealing by men who are well versed and are of recognized competence in the field of Law of the Sea. This is manifest from the fact that alongwith the establishment of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea, provision has been made for the establishment of Sea-Bed Disputes Chamber, Special Chambers and ad hoc chamber for dealing with special problem and disputes relating to the Law of the Sea, yet another reason which justifies the establishment of the International Law of the Sea and adds to its significance is that the International Sea-Bed Authority is an unique International organization. It will not only grant licences and contracts for sea-bed mining but will itself undertake the exploration and exploitation of the sea-bed of the International Sea-Bed Area. For such an undertaking of commercial nature it is necessary that the disputes arising in the process must be settled promptly. The International Tribunal for the Law of Sea is best suited to perform these tasks.

---

[24] Article 7(1).

CHAPTER 18

PIRACY*

Definition.—There has been a great controversy in respect of the definition of the term 'piracy'.[1] According to traditional international law, navigation in the high seas with the object of committing violent acts against other persons and property for private (or their own) interests and without being authorised or permitted by any State, is called 'piracy'. Different jurists have given different definitions of the term 'piracy'. But as remarked by Story, J., in United States v. Smith,[2] "Whatever may be the diversity of definitions in other respects, all writers concur in holding that robbery or forcible depredations upon the sea animo furandi, is piracy." In an American case,[3] the Federal Court expressed the view that the armed ship in the sea should be under the authority of some State and if such a ship is not under the authority of any State, it would be treated in the category of pirate ships, irrespective of the fact whether it has committed piracy or not. The law relating to piracy was codified in the Geneva Convention on High Seas, 1958. Article 15 of the Convention defines 'piracy' in the following words : Piracy consists of any of the following acts :

(1) Any illegal act of violence, detention or any act of depredation committed for private ends by the crew or the passengers of a private ship or a private aircraft, and directed (a) on the high seas, against another ship or aircraft, or against persons or property on board such ship or aircraft ; (b) against a ship, aircraft, persons or property in a place outside the jurisdiction of any State.

(2) Any act of voluntary participation in the operation of a ship or of an aircraft with knowledge of facts making it a pirate ship or aircraft.

(3) Any act of inciting or of internationally facilitating an act described in sub-paragraph (1) or sub-paragraph (2) of this article.[4]

"The only clear innovation in the provision .... is the reference to aircraft, a sensible application of analogy. The essential feature of the definition is that the acts must be committed for private ends. It follows that piracy cannot be committed by warships of other government ships, or government aircraft, except where the crew has mutinied and taken control of the ship or aircraft (Article 16). Acts committed on board a ship by the crew and directed against the ship itself, or against persons or property on the ship, are not within the definition."[5]

A ship or aircraft is considered a pirate ship or aircraft if it is intended by the persons in dominant control to be used for the purpose of committing one of the acts referred to in Article 15. The same applies if the ship or aircraft has been used to commit any such act, so long as it remains under the control of the persons guilty to that act.[6]

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 3(d) ; I.A.S. (1961), Q. No. 2 ; I.A.S. (1958), Q. No. 3 ; P.C.S. (1969), Q. No. 3(e) ; C.S.E. (1994) Q. 5(c) ; IAS (2009) Q. 8(b).

[1] See Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Second Edition (1968), p. 238 ; see also Serhassan Pirates (1845), 2 Wm. Rob. 354 ; The Magellam Pirates (1853), 1 Sp Fcc. Ad. 81 ; In re Piracy Jure Gentium, (1934) A.C. 586.

[2] (1820) 5 Wheat 153, 161.

[3] The Ambrose Light, (25 Fed. Rep. 408).

[4] The definition noted above has been retained without any change in Article 101 of U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.

[5] Brownlie, see supra note 1, at p. 239.

[6] Article 17 of the 1958 Geneva Convention on the High Seas. This provision has been retained in 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea.

Essential elements of 'piracy'.—Following are the essential elements of piracy :

(1) Violence or robbery at high seas must be for private ends. Such acts committed by warships, Government ships or aircraft cannot be called 'piracy'. For example, in the Second World War German U-Boats sank enemy ships in the area of long-distance blockade in the high seas without any prior intimation. This act cannot be called 'piracy' because it was committed under the authority of the State of Germany. In fact, this act is violation of the laws and custom of war and is a war crime.

(2) Illegal acts of violence, detention or any act of depredation committed for private ends must be against the crew or passengers of a private ship or private aircraft. The only exception of this is recognised in Article 16 which provides that the acts of piracy committed by a warship, government ship or government aircraft whose crew has mutinied and taken control of the ship or aircraft are assimilated to acts committed by a private ship.

(3) Illegal acts of violence, detention or any act of depredation may be either on the high seas or in a place outside the jurisdiction of any State.

(4) Such acts must be directed against a ship, aircraft, persons or property.

(5) Violence, detention or any act of depredation may constitute piracy provided that above elements are satisfied.

(6) Committing of actual robbery is not essential for piracy. Even an unsuccessful attempt to commit robbery at high seas will constitute piracy. This was held in Re Piracy Jure Gentium.[7] The facts of this case are as follows :

In 1931, some Chinese citizens were arrested on the charge of piracy. They were tried in Hong Kong and held guilty. In this case accused had made an unsuccessful or abortive attempt to commit robbery at high seas. The Court was confronted with the question as to whether actual robbery was essential for piracy. The Hong Kong Court referred this question to the Privy Council for its opinion. The Privy Council held that for an act to constitute piracy, actual robbery is not essential. Even if an accused is guilty of making an unsuccessful attempt to commit robbery, he will be guilty of having committed piracy and will be punished.

(7) Any act of voluntary participation in the operation of a ship or an aircraft with knowledge of facts making it a pirate ship or aircraft will also constitute piracy.[8]

(8) Any act of inciting or of intentionally facilitating any illegal act described above will also constitute piracy.

Piracy by a war ship, government ship or government aircraft whose crew has mutinied.—According to Article 102 of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, the acts of piracy committed by a war ship, government ship or government aircraft whose crew has mutinied and taken control of the ship or aircraft are assimilated to acts committed by a private ship or aircraft.

Piracy committed by unrecognised insurgents.*—One of the important legal effects of the recognition of insurgency is that insurgents are not treated as pirates. But so long as they remain unrecognised, they can be apprehended and punished as they commit piracy. This can be understood with the help of following illustration : P and A are vessels owned by unrecognised insurgents against the established Government of Chile. Their purpose is to blockade and besiege the port. They carry arms and soldiers. For example A, in the course of her voyage, stops X, a French merchantman. By force A takes from X an official in the employment of the Government of Chile, as also a large quantity of coal without payment. Y, a British man-of-war appears on the scene. Y captures P and A both the vessels and their crew. Y condemns them as pirates.[9] Here Y is justified in capturing P and A and condemning them as pirates because acts of P and A constitute piracy in view of the definition and essentials of piracy discussed above. According to Article 21 of the Geneva Convention on the High Seas a Seizure on account of piracy may only be carried out by warships or military aircraft, or other ships or aircraft on government service authorized to that effect. Thus, Y, a British warship is justified in capturing P and A. As regards the jurisdiction to capture such vessels, Article 19 of the Convention on the High Seas propounds the theory of Universal jurisdiction whereby every State may seize a pirate ship or aircraft. The principle of Universal jurisdiction in respect of piracy is being discussed below in a little greater detail. Y was, therefore, justified in capturing P and A and condemning them as pirates.

---

[7] (1934) A.C. 586.

[8] Article 15(2) of Geneva Convention on the High Seas.

* Asked in I.A.S. (1958) Q. No. 3.

Concept of universal jurisdiction in respect of the crime of piracy.—By universal jurisdiction in respect of a crime, it is generally meant that all States exercise jurisdiction in respect of that crime. When a crime is against the interests of international Community (i.e., Delict Jure Gentium) then all the States are entitled to apprehend and punish persons accused of such crimes.[9] The principle of universal jurisdiction applies in respect of the crime of piracy, war crimes,[10] and to some extent the crime of aircraft hijacking.[11] Persons accused of committing crime of piracy may be apprehended and punished because they are regarded as enemies of the whole mankind. In the words of Judge Moore : "A pirate is treated as an outlaw, as the enemy of mankind —hostes humane generis—whom any nation may in the interest of all capture and punish".[12] The concept of Universal jurisdiction has been accepted and adopted in the 1958 Geneva Convention on the High Seas. Article 19 of the Convention provides that on the high seas, or in any other place outside the jurisdiction of any State, every State may seize a pirate ship or aircraft, or a ship taken by piracy and under the control of pirates, and arrest the persons and seize the property on board. The Courts of the State which carried out the seizure may decide upon the penalties to be imposed and may also determine the action to be taken with regard to the ships, aircraft or property, subject to the rights of third pirates acting in good faith. This provision has been retained without any change in Article 105 of the 1982 U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea.

There is a great controversy in respect of the property of the ship thus seized. According to the practice of States in the seventeenth century, the property of such a ship became the property of the State which seized the ship. But in the eighteenth century, it was generally accepted that the seized ship and its property should be returned to the real owners. This rule is called pirata non mutat dominium. It is still a prevalent rule. But if it is not clear as to who is the owner of the ship and its property, they become the property of the State which seized them.[13]

Where the seizure of a ship or aircraft on suspicion of piracy has been effected without adequate grounds, the State making the seizure shall be liable to the State the nationality of which is possessed by the ship or aircraft, for any loss or damage caused by the seizure.[14] As noted above, a seizure may be carried out by warships or military aircraft or other ships or aircraft on government service authorised to that effect.[15] A warship which encounters a foreign merchant ship on the high seas may board her on the ground

---

9. See J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Eighth Edition (1977), p. 307.
10. See the Eichman Case, (1926) 136 I.L.R. 277 where the Supreme Court of Israel upheld the exercise of Universal jurisdiction in respect of War Crimes.
11. See also Chapter on "State Jurisdiction".
12. The Lotus Case, P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 10 (1927), p. 70.
13. L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, pp. 616-617.
14. Article 20 of the Geneva Convention on the High Seas. See also Article 106 of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea.
15. Article 21 ; See also Art. 107 of 1982 Convention.

suspecting that the ship is engaged in piracy.[16] This may be done on other grounds also if permitted by treaty.[17] In case, however, the suspicions prove to be unfounded, and provide that the ship boarded has not committed any act justifying them, it shall be compensated for any loss or damage that may have been sustained.[18]

Piracy under Municipal law.—There is difference in the concept of piracy under International Law and Municipal Law. Some States may declare crimes those acts of violence, detention or depredations, which are not crimes under international law. On the other hand, States may also declare crimes lesser acts of violence than those declared by international law. For example, in England every British citizen who assists the enemy of the King or Queen or transports slaves in the high seas, is treated as a pirate. But foreigners can be treated as pirates only in accordance with the rules of International law.[19] Thus the concept of piracy in municipal law is different from that of international law.

---

16. Article 22 (1) (a).
17. Article 22 (1).
18. Article 22 (3).
19. To put it in the words of Oppenheim : "........... Since a State cannot enforce its Municipal laws on the open sea against others than its own subjects it cannot treat foreigners on the open sea as pirates unless they are pirates according to the Law of Nations. Thus, when in 1958, before the abolition of slavery in America, British men-of-war molested American vessels suspected of carrying slaves, the United States rightly complained", see supra Note 13 at p. 617.

CHAPTER 19

AIR LAW (INCLUDING AIRCRAFT-HIJACKING)

Air space : Various theories regarding air space*

As pointed out earlier each State exercises complete sovereignty over its territory which comprises of lands, waters, maritime belts, air space, etc. According to the old view each State exercises sovereignty over its complete air space. In the modern times, this view is subjected to criticism and has been criticized by the jurists. There are several views or theories prevalent in this connection. According to the first view, air space is available for each State and the aircrafts of each State may pass through it without any obstruction. This view has been vehemently criticised because it is contrary to many international treaties. Each State exercises control over its air space and the aircrafts of another State can enter in its air space only after seeking its prior permission. In accordance with the second view, each State exercises control over its air space up to unlimited height. It is entitled to exercise complete control over it and may not permit the entry of the aircrafts of other States in this area. This view also does not seem to be correct because in view of the rapid scientific and technological developments aircrafts can go to a very high attitude. It is not possible for each State to exercise control over unlimited height. Since it is not possible to exercise control over unlimited air space, this view has lost much of its relevance. According to third view, a State exercises control over the lower strata of the air space and its sovereignty is limited only to that extent. This view seems to be better than the other two views mentioned earlier because sovereignty can be effective only when the State can exercise control over it. However, the greatest difficulty in the general acceptance of this theory is that no State is prepared to accept it affirmatively. According to the fourth view, the State concerned can make rules in regard to the outer space so as to ensure its security. But only a few States of the world have capability to enforce such rules. Lastly, each State has sovereignty over air space extending to the unlimited height subject only to the providing of innocent passage to the aircrafts of other States. Only a few States of the world can effectively exercise such sovereignty.

Thus there is a great controversy in respect of law relating to airspace. But there is general agreement regarding certain matters. There is general agreement that each State exercises over the airspace over its territory. This sovereignty is essential for the defence and security of the State. But at the same time there is need for the freedom of aerial navigation for commercial, scientific and humanitarian purposes. With a view to reconcile these conflicting needs, the concept of functional sovereignty has been suggested. There is also the urgent need of evolving the legal regime of air space as new branch of international law. In view of the great significance of the subject, a separate chapter has been devoted to "Air Law". However, due to paucity of space, it is proposed to discuss in this chapter only the following two aspects of Air Law—

I. Aerial Navigation.
II. Aircraft Hijacking.

I. Aerial Navigation

A number of international conventions have been concluded to regulate aerial navigation. The more important of them are given below—

(1) Paris Convention of Aerial Navigation 1919.—This convention framed certain rules regarding aerial navigation during peace time. According to the convention, each State exercises complete sovereignty over its air space. Further, during peace, parties to the convention will give innocent passage to the other State parties to the convention. The convention did not frame rules for the period of war.

---

* See also for C.S.E. (1991) Q. 6(b).

 See also for I.A.S. (1957), Q. 7.

(2) Havana Convention.—This convention was adopted mainly by the States of American continent. Several rules regarding aerial navigation were adopted under the convention.

(3) Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules Relating to International Carriage by Air or Warsaw Convention, 1929.—This convention was signed at Warsaw on 12 October, 1929. According to Article 1 of the convention, the convention applies to all international carriage of persons, luggage or goods performed by aircraft for reward. It applies equally to gratuitous carriage by aircrafts performed by an air transport undertaking.

(4) Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation, 1944.—Chicago convention is the most important of all treaties and conventions relating to aerial navigation. It was signed by 53 States. This convention was concluded on 7th December, 1944 and entered into force on 14th April, 1947. The International Civil Aviation Organisation (ICAO) created a framework for International Civil aviation including the principle that every State has complete and exclusive sovereignty over the airspace above its territory and that no scheduled flight may operate over the territory of a contracting State without its consent. It is also important to note here that the convention confers on the ICAO Council the power to settle disputes between contracting parties and its decision is binding on the parties. From 20 to 22 March, 2006. Civil aviation leaders from around the world have adopted a global strategy which will usher in a new era of openness and transparency concerning safety information. Five Freedoms of air were for the first time declared under this convention. Some of the important provisions of the Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation, 1944 are as follows :

(i) The contracting States recognize that every State has complete and exclusive sovereignty over the airspace above its territory.[1]

(ii) For the purposes of this Convention the territory of a State shall be deemed to be the land areas and territorial waters adjacent thereto under the sovereignty, suzerainty, protection or mandate of such State.[2]

(iii) The Convention shall be applicable only to civil aircraft, and shall not be applicable to State aircraft used in military, customs, and police services. No State aircraft of a contracting State shall fly over the territory of another State or land thereon without authorization by special agreement otherwise and in accordance with the terms thereof.[3]

(iv) Each contracting State agrees that all aircrafts of the other contracting States, being aircraft not engaged in scheduled international air services shall have the right, subject to the observances of the terms of this Convention, to make flights into or in transit non-stop across its territory and to make stops for non-traffic purposes without the necessity of obtaining prior permission and subject to the right of State flown over to require landing. Each contracting State nevertheless reserves the right, for reasons of safety of flight, to require aircraft desiring to proceed over regions which are inaccessible or without adequate air navigation facilities to follow prescribed routes, or to obtain special permission for such flights. Such aircraft, if engaged in the carriage of passengers, cargo, or mail for remuneration or hire on other than scheduled international air services, shall also, subject to the provisions, of Article 7, have the privilege of taking on or discharging passengers, cargo or mail, subject to the right of any State where such embarkation or discharge takes place to impose such regulations or limitation as it may consider desirable.[4]

---

[1] Article 1 of the Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation, 1944.

[2] Article 2.

[3] Article 3.

[4] Article 5.

(v) Last but not the least important provision runs as follows : No scheduled International Air Service may be operated over or into the territory of a contracting State, except with the special permission or other authorisation of that State, and in accordance with the terms of such permission or authorization.[5]

(vi) Aircrafts have the nationality of the State in which they are registered.[6]

(vii) An aircraft may be validly registered in more than one State, but its registration may be changed from one State to another.[7]

Thus aerial navigation is generally controlled by several international treaties. Besides these multilateral treaties and conventions, many States have concluded bilateral treaties which govern their relations to aerial navigation.[8]

*Five Freedoms of Air.—Before and after the First World War many problems relating to international air transport arose. Because of the increase in the transport through airways, the need for definite rules of international law was felt. In order to evolve definite rules of international law regarding this a Conference was held at Chicago in 1944. This Conference is known as International Civil Aviation Conference, Chicago, November, 1944. This Conference declared the following five freedoms of air :—

(1) freedom to fly across foreign territory without landing ;

(2) freedom to land for non-traffic purposes ;

(3) freedom to disembark in foreign territory traffic originating in the State of the origin of the craft ;

(4) freedom to pick up in any foreign country traffic destined for the State of origin of aircraft ; and

(5) freedom to carry traffic between two foreign countries.

In order to give concrete shape to the above five freedoms two agreements were concluded. They are as follows :

(1) Chicago International Air Services Transit Agreement, 1944.—This agreement incorporated the first two freedoms.[9]

(2) Chicago International Air Transport Agreement, 1944.—This agreement incorporated the last three freedoms. But this agreement was signed by a very few countries.

Thus most of the States of the world agreed to provide the first two freedoms to each other. "The International Air Services Transit Agreement" or 'the two freedoms Agreement' has been widely accepted .... The International Transport Agreement or the "five freedoms" Agreement on the other hand has had a few adherents and that its effect is minimal at best." [10] It may be noted here that in the absence of multilateral treaties most of the States regulate their relations through bilateral treaties. A brief reference may also be made here to the International Civil Aviation Organisation which was established in 1947. A large number of the States are its members. This Organisation has made many rules relating to International Air Transport and International Air Traffic. The ICAO has been discussed in a little greater detail under the chapter "Specialized Agencies". Following are the treaties which have been adopted under this Organisation :

---

[5] Article 6.

[6] Article 17.

[7] Article 18.

[8] For detailed study see also Bin Cheng and R.H.F. Austin, "Air Law" in The Present State of International Law and other Essays, Edited by Prof. Dr. Maarten Bos. (1973), pp. 183-200 ; S. Bhat, "Safety in Air—Recent Developments", I.J.I.L., Vol. 14 (1974), pp. 386-399.

* See also for I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 11 (e) ; I.A.S. (1954), Q. No. 12 ; P.C.S. (1976), Q. No. 10(f) : P.C.S. (1969), Q. No. 4 ; P.C.S. (1984), Q. 6 ; see also matter discussed above under the heading "Chicago Convention on International Civil Aviation, 1944".

[9] Article 1 of the Agreement provides that each party to the Agreement grants to the other contracting States the following freedoms of the air in respect of scheduled international air services : The privilege to fly across its territory without landing ; (ii) The privilege to land for non-traffic purposes.

[10] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 173.

(1) Convention of 1948 on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft.

(2) Rome Convention of 1952 on damage caused by foreign aircraft to their party on the service.

(3) Protocol of amendments of the Warsaw Convention, 1959 concerning the liability of the Air Carrier to passengers and Cargo concluded at Hague in 1955.

II. Aircraft-Hijacking*

Meaning and definition of 'Hijacking':—"Aircraft hijacking is a contemporary addition to the roster of international and national crimes and the necessity for its control at international and national level is only beginning to be recognised by States." [11] In its wide sense hijacking is an act against the safety of civil aviation and resembles piracy.[12] According to Article 11 of Tokyo Convention, 1963, when a person on board has unlawfully committed by force or threat thereof, an act of interference, seizure or wrongful exercise of control of an aircraft in flight or when such an act is about to be committed, contracting States shall take all appropriate measures to restore control of the aircraft to its lawful commander or to preserve its control of the aircraft. Further, the contracting State, when the aircraft lands, shall permit its passengers and crew to continue their journey as soon as practicable and shall return the aircraft and its cargo to the persons lawfully entitled to the possession. Article 13 further provides that any contracting State shall take the delivery of any person whom the aircraft commander delivers and that it shall immediately make a preliminary enquiry into the facts. It is clear from the above provisions that an attempt to define the term 'hijacking' has not been made, but it simply imposes certain obligations upon a contracting State and lays more emphasis on the return of the hijacked aircraft and its passengers to those persons who are entitled to its possession and to permit its passengers and crew to continue their journey as soon as practicable.

Article 1 of the Hague Convention of 1970, provides that "Any person who on board an aircraft in flight : (a) unlawfully, by force or threat thereof, or by any other form of intimidation, seizes or exercises control of that aircraft or attempts to perform any such act, or (b) is an accomplice of a person who performs or attempts to perform any such act, commits an offence ...." This provision also does not define the term 'hijacking', but simply mentions its essential elements which are following :

(i) Unlawful use of force or threat thereof or any other form of intimidation ;

(ii) To do above-mentioned acts with a view to seize that aircraft or to exercise control over it ;

(iii) The said acts should have been committed on board an aircraft in flight ;

(iv) Accomplice of person who performs or attempts to perform the above-mentioned act is also guilty of the offence of hijacking.

The above-mentioned essential elements are similar to those mentioned in Article 11 of the Tokyo Convention, 1963. The only innovation in 'Hague Convention, 1970' is that it includes an accomplice of a person who performs or attempts to perform any such act.[13] The wider concept of the offence of hijacking has been incorporated in the Montreal Convention, 1971.[14] Article I of the Montreal Convention, 1971, provides that any person commits an offence if he unlawfully and intentionally—(a) performs an act of violence against a person on board an aircraft in flight if that act is likely to endanger the safety of that aircraft ; (b) destroys an aircraft in service or causes damages to such an aircraft which renders it incapable of flight or it is likely to endanger its safety in flight ; or (c) places or causes to be placed on an aircraft in service, by any means whatsoever, a device or substance which is likely to destroy that aircraft, or to cause damage to it which renders it incapable of flight, or to cause damage to it, which is likely to endanger its safety in flight; or (d) destroys or damages air navigation facilities or interferes with that operation if any such information which he knows to be false, thereby endangering the safety of an aircraft in flight. Besides this, it is further provided that any person also commits an offence if he attempts to commit any of the offence mentioned earlier or if he is an accomplice of a person who commits or attempts to commit any such offence.

---

* See also I.A.S (1972), Q. No. 10(i) ; P.C.S. (1984), Q. No. 10(d)

[11] Alone E. Evans, "Aircraft Hijacking : Its Causes and Cure", A.J.I.L., Vol. 63 (1969), p. 695.

[12] See Dr. Sami Shubber, "Is Hijacking of Aircraft Piracy in International Law,"? BYBIL, Vol. XLIII (1968-69), p. 193 ; see also S.C. Chaturvedi, "Hijacking and the Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 11 (1971), p. 89.

[13] See Sami Shubber, "Aircraft Hijacking under the Hague Convention, 1970—A New Regime", I.C.L.Q., Vol. 22, Part 4 (1973), p. 687 at p. 690.

[14] For the text of the Montreal Convention : see A.J.I.L., (1971), pp. 742-48.

Development of law relating to hijacking.—The increase in number of incidents of hijacking and increase in the dangers against the safety of the flights of aircraft presented grave problems before the international community and particularly before the International Civil Aviation Organisation. (I.C.A.O.). In order to solve this problem and to punish the hijackers a Convention was adopted in 1963, known as the Tokyo Convention, 1963. Despite the adoption of this Convention the number of incidents continued to increase and this Convention failed to solve the problem.[15] India also acceded to the Tokyo Convention and with a view to give effect to the provisions of the Convention Parliament of India, enacted the Tokyo Convention Act, 1975.[16] Increase in the number of Incidents relating to hijacking and the shortcomings of the Tokyo Convention compelled the States to think and take some effective measures to solve the problem and to give deterrent punishment to the hijackers. This process started in September, 1968, when the International Civil Aviation Organisation Council was asked to study the problem of hijacking. In December, 1968, the Council entrusted this matter to a Legal Sub-committee. This Legal Sub-committee prepared a draft for Convention. In order to consider this draft and to adopt a Convention, a Conference was called in December, 1970. The Convention was finally adopted and was known as the Hague Convention, 1970. After having been ratified by the prescribed number of States, Hague Convention came into force on October, 1971.

Main provisions of the Hague Convention, 1970.—Hague Convention is a significant milestone for suppressing the crime of hijacking.[17] As pointed out earlier, the Hague Convention further developed the concept of hijacking. As compared to the Tokyo Convention, it further widened the net to apprehend the hijackers and to ensure the safety of flights of civil aircraft's. The State parties may have jurisdiction over the hijackers in some or other way and it will become difficult for hijackers to escape the process of law. As pointed out by Sami Shubber; "These features of jurisdiction have brought the offence of hijacking very near to piracy under International Customary Law. Thus it is not without justification that the 'Aerial Piracy' has been applied to this new regime in the field of International Civil Aviation." [18] Yet another special feature of the Hague Convention is that the offences shall be deemed to be included as extraditable offences in any Extradition Treaty existing between contracting States. The contracting States undertake to include the offences as extraditable offences in every Extradition Treaty to be concluded between them. It is further provided that each of the offences shall be treated, for the purpose of extradition between the contracting States, as if it had been committed not only in the place in which it occurred, but also in the territories of the States required to establish their jurisdiction in accordance with the provisions contained in Article 5 of the Convention. Thus, "the Hague Convention, 1970, may be considered as a big step forward in the endeavour of the international community to suppress hijacking of aircraft and remove the threat caused by it to international civil aviation." [19] Further, "The Hague Convention borrows heavily from the Tokyo Convention, which may lead one to wonder whether or not its adoption, as a protocol to the Tokyo Convention would have been more desirable, as there would have been some advantage to be gained from the link between the two instruments, for example, rights of aircraft commander and crew members to take measures, protection of such persons, arrest and delivery of hijackers, simplicity of arrangements and so forth." [20] With a view to give effect to the provisions of the Hague Convention, 1970, the Indian Parliament enacted the Anti-Hijacking Act, 1982.[21]

---

[15] For shortcomings of Tokyo Convention see Sushma Malik, "Legal Aspects of the Problems of Unlawful Seizure of Aircraft", I.J.I.L., (1969), p. 61 at pp. 65-71 ; see also A. Samuel, "Crimes Committed on Board Aircraft", BYBIL, Vol. XLII (1967), p. 1.

[16] For Text of the Act see I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), pp. 274-279.

[17] Sami Shubber, "Aircraft Hijacking under the Hague Convention, 1970—A New Regime". I.C.L.Q., Vol. 22 (1973) p. 687 at p. 725.

[18] Ibid.

Montreal Convention, 1971.—Undoubtedly, Hague Convention is a great milestone in the field of suppressing the offence of hijacking yet it is subject to some criticism so far as certain provisions relating to jurisdiction of States and extradition of offenders or hijackers are concerned. Moreover, it may also be noted that despite the provisions of Hague Convention, the incidence to hijacking continued to increase. Consequently, a Conference was called at Montreal from 8th to 23rd September, 1971. As a result of this conference, a Convention (known as Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation, 1971) was adopted. Under Article 1 of the Convention, the concept of the offence of hijacking was further widened. Under this Convention, the State parties have undertaken that they will provide deterrent punishment to the hijackers. Other provisions are similar to that of the Hague Convention. It would not be wrong to say it is simply an improvement of the Hague Convention. As a matter of fact, it would have been better if the provisions of Montreal Convention had been adopted as protocol to the Hague Convention.[22] With a view to give effect to the Montreal Convention, 1971, the Parliament of India passed, "The Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against Safety of Civil Aviation Act, 1982.[23]

Montreal Convention, 1991 or the Convention on the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Detection, 1991

As noted above, there are several international conventions against unlawful interference with civil aviation. Among such conventions following are more important :

(i) Tokyo Convention (1963);
(ii) Hague Convention (1970);
(iii) Montreal Convention (1971);
(v) Protocol for the Suppression of Unlawful Act of Violence at Airports Serving International Civil Aviation, 1988.

Despite the above conventions the incidents of unlawful acts against the safety of International Civil Aviation could not be reduced. In such incidents the plastic bombs or explosives have been prominently used. For example, on 21 December, 1988, Pan Am Flight 103 while flying over Lockerbie (Scotland) was blowen by a plastic bomb. This resulted in the death of 270 passengers. From 12, February to March 1, 1991 a conference was held at Montreal. In this conference the representatives of 79 countries adopted a convention known as Montreal Convention, 1971 or the convention on the Marking of Plastic Explosives for the Purpose of Detection, 1991. The parties to this convention undertook to prevent the manufacture and going outside their territories plastic explosives without commercial markings. It was also agreed that plastic explosives or bombs which are not necessary for army or police be destroyed within a period of three years. As regards plastic bombs and explosives the Convention provides that they are to be destroyed within a period of 15 years. The Convention provides for the establishment of International Explosives Technical Commission. Both the Security Council and the General Assembly have supported and approved this Convention. As remarked by the then Secretary General of the U.N., Perez de Cuellar, "nothing perhaps activates corporation like a universally shared sense of danger of the threat of terrorism that spares few countries or individuals is indeed practically a universal one." .

---

[19] Sami Shubber, "Aircraft Hijacking under the Hague Convention, 1970—A New Regime". I.C.L.Q., Vol. 22 (1973) p. 687 at p. 725.

[20] Ibid, at p. 726.

[21] Act No. 65 of 1982. The Gazette of India, Extraordinary, Part II, Section 1, November 8, 1982. See also I.J.I.L., Vol. 22 (1982), pp. 484-486.

[22] As remarked by Cheng and R.H.F. Austin, "As anticipated, the Hague Convention and the Montreal Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation which was signed on 23 September, the following years are couched in a most identical terms, except for the definition of the offence. The Hague Convention is directed against the Hijackers who on board an aircraft in flight, by force or intimidation, unlawfully takes over control of the aircraft. The Montreal Convention is aimed at the person who unlawfully, and intentionally (i) commits any act which is likely to endanger the safety of an aircraft in flight, (ii) destroys an aircraft in service or places a device or substance on board an aircraft in service which is likely to destroy such an aircraft, or (iii) causes damage to aircraft in service renders it incapable of flight, or places a device substance on board an aircraft in service which is likely to cause such damage." "Air Law", in The Present State of International Law and other Essays (Kluwar—The Netherlands—(1973), p. 183 at p. 197.

[23] Act No. 66 of 1982. The Gazette of India, Extraordinary, Part II, Section 1, Nov. 8, 1982. See also I.J.I.L., Vol. 22 (1982), pp. 486-490.

This convention entered into force on 21 June 1998 after have been ratified by 35 signatory States. As of February 2015, the convention has been ratified by 152 countries (151 United Nations Members and Nive).

Hijacking of Indian Aircraft and I.C.A.O.—Jurisdiction case (India v. Pakistan).[24]— An Indian Aircraft was hijacked and taken to Lahore (Pakistan). Instead of apprehending the hijackers and to ensure that they get proper punishment, the Government of Pakistan did not do so. As a result of which the hijackers burnt the aircraft. This act on the part of Pakistan was a clear violation of Tokyo Convention.[25] It was also against the resolution of Security Council (Resolution 286, 1970) in which the States were asked to take all possible steps to prevent the interference of hijackers in the international civil aviation. As a reprisal the very next day India suspended with immediate effect the overflight of all Pakistan aircrafts—civil and military over Indian territory till the issue was satisfactorily resolved. India demanded extradition of hijackers, but Pakistan rejected this demand. Pakistan on the other hand, complained to the International Civil Aviation Organisation that the suspension of overflights by India was a violation of international and bilateral commitments and requested the I.C.A.O. Council on March 3, 1973, to declare that India's decision to suspend the overflights was illegal. India raised certain preliminary objections and contended that the Council has no jurisdiction to hear and decide Pakistan's complaint. The contention of India was, however, overruled by the President of the Council. India's preliminary objections were rejected by the Council on July 29, 1971. India appealed to the International Court of Justice on August 30, 1971, against the said decision. Pakistan objected to the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice to hear and decide India's appeal. The International Court of Justice by a majority of 13 votes to 3 rejected the Government of Pakistan's objection on the question of its competence and held that it had jurisdiction to entertain India's appeal. The Court, however, held by a majority of 14 to 2, that the Council of International Civil Aviation Organisation was competent to entertain the application and complaint laid before it by the Government of Pakistan on March 3, 1971, and in consequence rejected the appeal made to the Court by the Government of India against the decision of the Council assuming jurisdiction in those respects. Thus the case again went to the International Civil Aviation Organisation, who could decide it on merits.

It may be noted here, that India and Pakistan entered into Simla Agreement and agreed to settle all their disputes through bilateral negotiations and through peaceful means. Subsequently, Delhi Agreement, 1973 and Delhi Tripartite Agreement, 1974 were entered into to resolve matters relating to the repatriation of Pakistani Prisoners of War. The representatives of India and Pakistan also held several round of talks relating to the resumption of flights of aircraft by both countries over the territory of each other but with no success, so far. The main stumbling block in the solution of this problem was Pakistan's persistent refusal to withdraw her case pending in the Council of the I.C.A.O. India, on her part made it clear that she would not entertain any proposal for resumption of Pakistani overflight through her territory unless and until Pakistan first withdrew her case from the Council of the I.C.A.O. This stand was in conformity with the letter and spirit of the Simla Agreement between the two countries. In view of India's insistence, Pakistan withdrew its case from the Council of the I.C.A.O. and subsequently Pakistani overflights over Indian territory were resumed.

---

[24] I.C.J. Rep. (1972), pp. 46 ff.

[25] For details of the incident see also, "Hijacking—An International Crime", 1971 (1) S.C.C., p. 36.

In 1976, one more Indian aircraft was hijacked and taken to Lahore. This time Pakistan arrested the hijackers and returned the aircraft and passengers to go back to India. Pakistan assured India that deterrent action would be taken against the hijackers but subsequently released them on the ground that there was no sufficient evidence to prosecute them.

Two cases of hijacking took place in September 1981 and July 1984, yet another case of hijacking took place on 5th Sept. 1986 when four armed terrorists seized a Pan American Jumbo jet with 399 passengers and cabin crew on board at Karachi airport. Later on, in the terrible shoot out that ensued, 18 persons were killed and several other were injured.

Hijacking of an Indian Airlines' Plane (IC 814) [Dec. 1999].—An incident of hijacking of an Indian Airlines, air bus IC 814 took place in mid-air over Lucknow on 24th December, 1999. The ill-fated plane was on flight from Kathmandu to New Delhi with 187 passengers. Before landing at Kandhar at 8.33 P.M. the next day, the air craft flew from Kathmandu to Amritstar, Lahore and Dubai. At Dubai the hijackers earlier released 27 hostages and off loaded the body of a victim, Ripon Katyal, who was killed on board the hijacked Indian Airlines' Airbus. The greatest problem faced by Indian Government in respect of the hijacking of Indian Airlines' airbus IC 814 was that the hijacked plane landed at Kandhar (Afghanistan) because India has not recognised the Taliban Government of Afghanistan and as such India has no diplomatic relations with Taliban Government. India had to seek the help of Taliban Government to rescue the passengers and secure the release of the aircraft. India had no option left except to request Taliban Government for help. In the beginning the Taliban officials expressed resentment with Indian Government for not initiating negotiations with the hijackers rather they compelled Indian Government to start negotiations otherwise they would force the hijackers to leave Kandhar.

India's longest hijack crisis ended on the night of 31st December, 1999 as the 155 passengers and crew reached New Delhi after being freed by the five hijackers in exchange of three dreaded militants. The circumstances were such that the Indian Government had no option left but to release the said three militants to save the lives of 155 passengers.

Under International Law, it was the obligation of the Taliban Government, to rescue the passengers, and crews and return the aircraft to India. Even if it is admitted that they could not take any action against the hijackers keeping in view the safety of the passenger their conduct was certainly questionable after the passengers had been freed and the hijackers had come down the aircraft. Contrary to the norms of International law the hijackers were allowed to go scot-free and declared that they gave the hijackers a few hours time to leave Afghanistan.

Hijacking has been described as aerial piracy and any state, whether bound by any international convention or not, can apprehend, assume jurisdiction over them, and can try and punish them. The Taliban Government did not, therefore, act according to the rules of International Law.

While the Taliban Government forced the Indian Government to negotiate with the hijackers, in case of hijacking of Ariana Airline Boeing 727 of Afganistan with 160 passengers which landed at Stansted Airport of U.K. on 7th February, 2000, the Taliban Administration took the stand that they would neither negotiate nor cede to the demands of the hijackers as terrorism is strongly condemned by them. Contrary to their conduct, the British officials not only negotiated with the hijackers but ultimately got freed all the passengers without the loss of a single life and also apprehended the hijackers.

Last but not the least on 8th February, 2000 at the inaugural meeting of the joint working group on counter terrorism by India and America, the two sides have agreed to intensify their joint cooperation to ensure that the perpetrators of the hijacking of Indian Airlines flight IC-814 are brought to justice. India has also agreed to take U.S. assistance in tackling the menace of terrorism in general and hijacking in particular.

Principle of universal jurisdiction in respect of the crime of the hijacking.*—The principle of universal jurisdiction is recognised in respect of the crime of piracy and war crimes. Since hijacking is generally described as aerial piracy, the principle of universal jurisdiction should apply in respect of the crime of hijacking. By universal jurisdiction in respect of a crime, it is meant that the crime is against the interests of international community and in order to suppress such a crime, all States can exercise jurisdiction in respect of the crime. The Hague Convention, 1970, and the Montreal Convention 1971 on hijacking have gone a long way to confer universal jurisdiction, to a great extent, on all States. "If an offender or alleged offender is within the territory of a State, both conventions contain provisions for him to be taken into custody and if he is not extradited, for his case to be placed before the prosecution authorities. Although neither Convention creates a duty to extradite or an inescapable duty to prosecute authorities are nevertheless under a duty "to take their decision in the same manner as in the case of any ordinary offence of a serious nature under the law of that State. If the decision is in the affirmative, the above mentioned universal jurisdictional clause ensures that the courts will be competent to hear the case." [26]

Evaluation.—The greatest difficulty in the field of suppression of the offence of hijacking is the extradition of hijackers. Under International Law extradition is based on bilateral treaties. Thus, "By its very nature extradition is not a matter regulated by International Law............ The duty to surrender cannot arise except under a treaty." [27] An attempt was made under Hague Convention to solve this problem. Article 8 of the Hague Convention provided that offence shall be deemed to be included an extraditable offence in the common extradition treaty existing between contracting States. The contracting States further undertook to include the offence as extraditable in every extradition treaty to be concluded between them. The obvious effect of this provision is that the offence of hijacking may not be treated as a political crime. It is undoubtedly a great achievement of the Hague Convention.

---

* See also for C.S.E. (1991) Q. 5(c).

[26] Bin Cheng R.H.F. Austin, "Air Law, in The Present State of International Law and other Essays" (1973), 183 at p. 197 ; See also Chapters on "State Jurisdiction" and "Piracy".

[27] Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. II, 2nd Edition, p. 720.

The Montreal Convention, 1971 has tried to improve upon the provision of Tokyo Convention. Thus it may be said that at present there is no lack of adequate law for the suppression of the offence of hijacking. The need is to properly implement the existing provisions. The Hague Convention and Montreal Convention have enhanced the jurisdiction of State parties in respect of hijackers. It may, however, be admitted that despite those Conventions the number of incidents has not decreased ; one of the reasons is that these Conventions have not been ratified by a number of countries. Tokyo Convention which entered into force on 4 December, 1969, has upto now been ratified by 88 State parties. Hague Convention which entered into force on 14 October, 1971 has upto now been ratified by 79 States. Lastly, the Montreal Convention which entered into force on 26 January, 1973 has upto now been ratified by 75 States.[28] Yet another reason is that these Conventions have not ended the criminal jurisdiction of the States. For example Article 5(iii) of the Montreal Convention provides : "This Convention does not exclude any criminal jurisdiction exercised in accordance with national law." Moreover, these Conventions have not fixed the punishment for this crime. For example, Montreal Convention under Article 3 simply, provides that each contracting State undertakes to make the offences mentioned in Article 1 punishable by severe penalties. As a matter of fact, the need is to establish an International Criminal Court which may try and punish international offences such as hijacking. "The greatest hurdle in the establishment of an International juridical Organ to try persons guilty of hijacking and other crimes is the concept of national sovereignty." [29] As pointed out by Prof. Agrawala : "............ mere municipal legislation by certain interested States providing for compulsory prosecution and punishment of hijackers landing in its territory or escaping to it, could not be a complete answer to the problem, since the States most willing to punish hijackers are not the ones wherein the hijackers generally land or escape to.

Therefore, only the imposition of an international obligation on all States and to extradite or to punish, and consequent national legislation and action by all giving effect to such an obligation, could prove really fruitful." Further, "It is not as easy to put into effect a fool-proof legal framework and create an international regime for preventing and deterring acts of unlawful interference with civil aviation, as it is to commit such acts. Many factors, political and economical, play their part, and the efforts of nations with divergent interests have to be co-ordinated. If the concern with the problem continues with an unceasing interest and enthusiam of the aviation community, and efforts are not given up in despair, better results might come forth in not to distant a future."

Yet another shortcoming in the existing law is in respect of extradition of the hijackers. "Extradition of alleged offenders is obligatory only when there is a treaty to that effect and hijacking is not included as an extradition offence, in some extradition treaties. Moreover, extradition treaties often provide that State is under no obligation to extradite its own nationals, or persons who have committed crimes of political nature.[30] Further, "The reluctance of States to extradite hijackers who have acted for political motives is understandable, hijacking an aircraft is often the only way in which an individual can escape from a country where he is liable to political, social or religious persecution and it would be undesirable to require other State to send him back to a country where he faces such persecution. But unless such an individual is punished, there is danger that other people with less excusable motives will be tempted to imitate him. It is therefore a matter of regret that the Hague and Montreal Conventions stopped short of requiring States to prosecute hijackers, who are not extradited." [31] As regards actions against States which refuse to extradite or prosecute, it may be suggested. "An amendment to the Chicago Convention which empowered the Council of I.C.A.O. to order the suspension of all services to or from member States of I.C.A.O. which refused to extradite or prosecute hijackers would override air service treaties previously concluded between member States. If member States were forced to choose between accepting such an amendment and ceasing to be members of I.C.A.O., they would probably accept the amendment, because they would not want to lose the advantage of membership of I.C.A.O." [32] It was unfortunate that such an amendment when presented to the I.C.A.O. Assembly in 1973, could not be adopted as it failed to secure the requisite 67 votes. It could secure only 65 votes, i.e., only two votes less than the requisite number.

---

[28] U.N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIV, No. 10 (November, 1977), pp. 13-14.

[29] S.C. Chaturvedi, "Hijacking and the Law", I.J.I.L. (1971), p. 89 at p. 101.

[30] Michael Akehurst, "Hijacking", I.J.I.L., Vol. 14 (1974), p. 81 at p. 85.

N. B.—For this please see Chapter on "International Criminal Law and the Establishment of an International Criminal Court."

Conclusion.—Despite the steps that have been taken so far to suppress the crime of hijacking, there has been no reduction in the number of incidents of hijacking. Rather the incidents of hijacking have increased recently. ".........while much has been achieved much more remains to be done to effectively deal with hijacking. The process is continuing but still the fact comes out clear : nation States are not prepared to fetter their sovereignty, therefore the aircraft users seem to be condemned to rely on co-operation between States which seems to be more an outcome of convenience and more diplomacy than the result of any sense of obligation." [33]

Efforts to induce States to prosecute or extradite hijackers presuppose that criminal sanctions against hijackers are an effective means of preventing hijacking. This assumption is not necessarily true. Indeed, there is a danger of that imprisoning hijackers who are the members of an organised gang may increase rather than reduce the number of future hijackings; the other membrs of the gang will seize other airliners and threaten to destroy them and kill the passengers and crew unless their comrades are released from prison." [34] There is need to tackle the problem of suppressing the crime of hijacking afresh. With this in view, a special Session of the U.N. General Assembly should be convened and united effort should be made to plug the loopholes in the existing law. In the meantime preventive measures such as search of all passengers and their luggages, etc. before they board aircrafts should be tightened.[35]

---

[31] Michael Akehurst, "Hijacking", I.J.I.L., Vol. 14 (1974), p. 81 at p. 85 ; Jessup has rightly remarked : "One may still recognise the reason for the usual rule in the ex-traditional treaties that an accused will not be surrendered if the crime with which he is charged is a 'political' one ; given the difference in political systems and ideologies, this rule is not likely to be forsaken. But it has spawned the unfortunate thesis that aerial hijacking cannot be subject to uniform standards of punishment because "territoristic" activities may be inspired by political motives with which the State of refuge may be sympathetic even though it does not advocate the methods used to advance such interests. One may note that in the history of the law of piracy, the defence of political motivation did not loom large and piracy was (and is) an offence against the law of nations. Aerial piracy which even more seriously and directly endangers the lives of innocent persons, should be similarly characterised. The philosophy of transnational law leads to that conclusion." "The present State of Transnational Law", in The Present State of International Law and other Essays (Kluwer—The Netherlands—1973), p. 339 at pp. 341-342.

[32] Michael Akehurst, see supra note 30 at p. 87.

[33] Damodar Wadegaonkar, "Hijacking and International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 22 (1982) p. 360 at p. 374.

[34] Michael Akehurst, "Hijacking", I.J.I.L., Vol. 14 (1974), p. 81 at pp. 87-88.

Since many States do not still seem to be prepared to take stringent measures against hijackers and in view of the present state of international relations and affairs, preventive measures comprising of thorough searches of all passengers, and their luggage constitute the best means to prevent or at least minimise the incidents of hijacking.

---

35. To quote Michael Akehurst again : "The best solution would be to search all passengers and their handluggage before they board an aircraft, in order to make sure that they are carrying no weapons. Such searches are carried out at many airports and are usually very effective, but they need to be applied rigorously to all passengers at all airports. It would be undesirable to lay down detailed rules of international law on the subject ; much depends on local conditions, and the form and intensity of the search are best left to the discretion of national authorities. But there is much to be said in favour of the adoption by I.C.A.O. of the principle of such searches as an international standard under Article 37 of the Chicago Convention, because such searches provide the most effective means of preventing hijacking". Ibid, at pp. 88-89.

CHAPTER 20

OUTER SPACE

It has been aptly pointed out : "We live on the shores of this tiny world, the third planet of nine, circling an average star, the Sun. This star is just among billions in a great city of stars, the Milky way, itself just one among a billion other stellar cities stretching on perhaps forever. This Universe is more vast than all imagining, and filled with wonders more than we can dream, is a heritage for all mankind." [1]

So far as the question of air space is concerned it has been made clear earlier that the State concerned exercise complete control over it. The other States can get some rights over it only through some agreements or treaties.* There is no customary rule of International law in regard to giving innocent passage through the territorial air space. As aptly pointed out by Edward Collins, "States have complete legal control over the airspace over their territory, other States have only rights in it as are acquired of treaty. There is no customary right of innocent passage through territorial airspace...."[2]

As remarked by Greek Philosopher Socrates in the 5th Century B.C., "Man must rise above the earth—to the top of the atmosphere and beyond—for only thus will he fully understand the world in which he lives." [3] Views are divided about the definition and delimitation of air space and outer space. It need not be overemphasized that there is practical and legal necessity to define the legal boundaries between the two.

At one time it was believed that the States exercised sovereignty over its outer space to the unlimited extent. The rapid progress of science and technology has made this view meaningless. Many efforts have been made to conclude international agreement in regard to the outer space. The first phase of the space developments started on 1st October 1957, when the Soviet Union launched its first sputnik. Since then efforts have been made to achieve international co-operation in this field. The early perspectives were provided by jurists and intellectuals. Subsequently the United Nations through various resolutions crystallized these speculations into legal principles.[4] As early as on 13 December, 1958, the General Assembly of the United Nations passed a resolution,[5] wherein it recognized "the common interest of mankind in outer space" and "that it is the common aim that outer space should be used for peaceful purposes only." The General Assembly established an ad hoc Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space to report to it, inter alia. "The nature of legal problems which may arise in the carrying out of programmes to explore Outer Space, "On 12 December, 1959, another resolution[6] entitled 'International Co-operation in the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space", was passed by the General Assembly. It established a Committee on the Peaceful Uses of outer space. On December 1977, the Assembly decided to enlarge the membership of the Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space from 37 to 47 (Resolution 32, 196B). On the same subject, the Assembly passed other resolutions on 20 December, 1961,[7] 14 December, 1962,[8] and on 13 December, 1963.[9] The last resolution i.e., dated 13 December, 1963, entitled "Declaration of Legal Principles Governing The Activities of States in the [1] See U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXIX, No. 4 (December, 1992), p. 49.

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1960), Q. No. 6; P.C.S. (1974) Q. No. 3 ; P.C.S. (1964) Q. No. 7 ; I.A.S. (1964), Q. No. 12(d) ; P.C.S. (1978) Q. 9(a).

[2] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World, p. 173.

[3] See note 1, at p. 57.

[4] S. Bhatt, Legal Controls of Outer Space, (1973), p. 273.

[5] Resolution 1348 (XIII).

[6] Resolution 1471 (XIV) 11.

[7] Resolution 1721 (XVI).

[8] Resolution 1902 (XVII).

[9] Resolution 1962 (XVIII).

Exploration and Use of Outer Space" which was unanimously adopted by the General Assembly is very important, particularly because most of its principles were incorporated in the Treaty of Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of outer space including the Moon and other celestial bodies, 1966[10] (hereafter referred as "the Outer Space Treaty"). Thus during the decade from 1957 to 1967 the legal regime of Outer Space was in a continuous state of Development.

The first U.N. Conference on Outer Space (i.e. UNISPACE-I) was held in August, 1968 and was attended by 78 States.

The Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space is concerned with questions such as remote sensing, nuclear power sources, geostationary orbit, definition and delimitation of outerspace, arms race in outerspace. These matters were discussed in its sub-committees—(i) the Scientific and Technical Committee from 13 to 24 February, 1984 in Newyork and (ii) the Legal Sub-committee from 19 March to 6 April 1984 in Geneva. The term, "remote sensing" refers to the detection and analysis of the earth's resources and phenomena by sensors carried in aircraft and spacecraft. Four main types of remote sensing are—meteorological ocean observation ; military surveillance and reconnaissance, and land observation. The Scientific and Technical Sub-Committee reaffirmed that remote sensing from outer space should be carried out with the greatest possible international corporation and participation and that developing countries should receive aid to meet their needs in the area." [11] As regards Nuclear Power sources, both the Committees expressed concern for the safe use of space vehicles and objects powered by nuclear sources. The "nuclear-safe orbit of space vehicles carrying nuclear reactors was also discussed in the working group. It was suggested that the orbit lifetime of such vehicles should be 300 to 600 years after reactor shut down. Others felt a specific minimum life-time was not desirable.[12]

Both the Sub-committees continued consideration of aspects of geostationary orbit, the orbit 22,300 miles directly above the equator, where Satellites circle at the same speed as the earth rotates. It is the only orbit capable of providing continuous contract with ground stations via a single satellite. Satellites in this orbit appear to be stationary in the sky because they circle the earth at the same speed as the earth rotates. Because of problems of interference among radio frequencies, the orbit can be occupied by a limited number of satellites at any one time. So far, with less than 150 satellites occupying the orbit, there have been few problems in finding space. There may, however, be conjestion in the future if its use continues to grow at the present rate of 18 per cent annually.

As regards definition and delimitation of outer space, the Legal Sub-committee established a working group to deal with this problem. The subject of arms race was discussed in both the sub-committees.

The U. N. Committee on the Peaceful Uses of outer space met in the Vienna International centre from 12 to 21 June 1984 to consider questions relating to the militarization of outer space. But there was an impasse and the committee failed to reach any agreement on the question of future treatment of the item on the militarization of outer space.[13]

In 1989, the General Assembly asked the U. N. Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space to continue to give priority to considering ways and means of maintaining outer space for peaceful purposes.[14] The Outer Space Committee considered in 1989 the advisability of the Assembly declaring 1992 as International Space Year. In 1989 session theme was "Space technology as an instrument for combating environmental problems, particularly those of developing countries." On 8th December, 1989, the General Assembly endorsed the initiative to designate 1992 as International Space Year.

---

[10] See U. N. Doc. A/6621, 17 December, 1966, pp. 11-18.

[11] U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXI, No. 4 of 1984, p. 32.

[12] Ibid, at p. 34.

[13] U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXI, No. 6 of 1984, p. 98.

[14] See Resolution 43/56.

In 1990 NASA launched Hubble Space telescope to study distant galaxies as well as ESA-built ulysses space craft on a five-year journey to explore the Sun. In 1991 Japan launched the Yohkoh Solar-observing spacecraft. Further, the ESA launched a new microwave remote sensing satellite—the Earth Resources Satellite (ERSI)—which can create accurate radar images of the Earth, regardless of cloud, fog or darkness. Moreover, NASA launched a remote sensing satellite—the Upper Research Satellite (UARS)—to spearhead a long term, space-based investigation.

1992 having been declared as the International Space Year (ISY), yearlong and worldwide celebration of humanity's future in the new space age were organised under the aegis of 29 national space agencies and 10 international organisations including the U. N. It may be noted that 1992 is the thirty-fifth anniversary of the birth of the space age for in 1957, the first man-made satellite (Sputnik) was launched by the former Soviet Union during the International Geophysical year, which highlighted Scientific inquiry and international cooperation. Addressing the World Space Congress on 28th August, 1992 at Washington D.C. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros Ghali said, "one of the central goals of International Space Year is to highlight the importance of understanding the Earth as a single complex, interdependent system and to stress the unique role that space science and technology can play in promoting that understanding."[15] While commemorating International Space Year (ISY) during thirty-fifth session in June, 1992, Peter Hohenfeller of Australia, Chairman of the U. N. Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space, the primary international policy making forum on space affair, said, "I can see no better use to be made of the rapid advances in space science and technology can play in promoting that understanding."[16]

In its 37th Session held at Vienna from 6 to 16 June, 1994 the Committee on the peaceful uses of outer space, proposed for a Third U. N. conference on the exploration and peaceful uses of outer space. In its 38th Session held from 12 June to 22 June, 1995, the Committee approved two texts on the debris of outer space and crafts in space (which include transportation crafts). The Committee also asked the Scientific and Technological Committee to consider in 1996 all the proposals for convening the Third U. N. conference on outer space by the end of the 20th century.

Legal Status of Outer Space.—Following are some of the international treaties and conventions which point out the legal status of outer space :

(1) The Outer Space Treaty*

Outer Space Treaty, 1967 is a landmark event in this connection. Some of the important provisions of the Outer Space Treaty of 1967 are as follows~~,~~—

(1) Outer space, including the moon and other celestial bodies, shall be free for exploration and use by all States without discrimination of any kind, on a basis of equality and in accordance with international law, there shall be free access to all areas of celestial bodies. There shall be freedom of scientific investigation in outer space.[17]

(2) Outer space, including the moon and other celestial bodies, is not subject to national appropriation by claim of sovereignty, by means of use or occupation, or by any other means.[18]

---

15. U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXIX, No. 4 (December 1992) p. 50.

16. Ibid.

* See also for C.S.E. (1996) Q. 8(a) ; UPPCS (2008) Q. 8.

17. Article I of Outer Space Treaty of 1966.

18. Article II; Therefore if a State X lands craft on the moon and claims to have acquired an inchoate title to territory, the claim will be invalid. If the State concerned is a party to the outer space Treaty, the claim will be invalid by virtue of Article II noted above. The answer will be the same even if the State concerned is not a party to the Treaty because of General Assembly Resolution, 1962 (XVIII), entitled "Declaration of Legal Principles Governing the Activities of States in the Exploration and Use of Outer Space which was adopted unanimously by the United Nations General Assembly on December, 1963.

(3) State parties to the treaty undertake not to place in orbit around the earth any objects carrying nuclear weapons or any other kind of weapons of mass destruction, install such weapons on celestial bodies or station such weapons in outer space in any other manner.[19]

(4) The moon and other celestial bodies shall be used by all States parties in the Treaty exclusively for peaceful purposes. The establishment of military bases, installations and fortifications, the testing of any type of weapons and the conduct of military manoeuvres on celestial bodies shall be forbidden.[20]

(5) States parties to the Treaty shall regard astronauts as envoys of mankind in outer space and shall render to them all possible assistance in the event of accident, distress or emergency landing on the territory of another State Party or on the high seas. When astronauts make such a landing they shall be safely and promptly returned to the State of registry of their space vehicle.[21]

(6) States Parties to the Treaty shall bear international responsibility for national activities in outer space.[22]

(7) Each State Party to the Treaty that launches or procures the launching of an object into outer space, including the moon and other celestial bodies, and each State Party from whose territory or facility an object is launched, is internationally liable for damage to another State Party to the Treaty or to its natural or juridical persons by such object or its component parts on the earth, in air space or in outer space, including the moon and other celestial bodies.[23]

(8) A State Party to the Treaty on whose registry an object launched into outer space is carried shall retain jurisdiction and control over such object and over any personnel thereof, while in outer space or on a celestial body.[24]

Several of the above provisions, particularly Nos. 5 to 8 impose limitation on the national sovereignty of States Parties to the Treaty. It has been rightly remarked, "There are, however, in space developments two factors, namely, the extraordinary interdependence in space activities and the growing convergence of interests, which have radically changed the dimensions and objectives of the purely national interest. The immense potentialities of practical space applications were bound to lead to ever-increasing international co-operation without which the full benefits of these applications cannot be obtained.[25] Further, "The United Nations, recognising the revolutionary developments to be expected in this new dimension, has started to plant trees. As the space era is an era of space speed, there is very reason to expect that notwithstanding the obstacles to be overcome, these trees will grow at a faster rate than the human mind can at this juncture visualise."[26] Thus the Outer Space Treaty is a significant landmark in the evolution of international law relating to outer space.[27]

As regard national sovereignty in regard to outer space, it may be noted that some States have recently declared the extension of their sovereignty to include segments of the geostationary orbit. But such an extension is inconsistent with Outer Space Treaty which had been signed by 69 States by 1977 and which prohibits national appropriation of outer space by claims of sovereignty. Article 1 of the Outer Space Treaty no doubt proclaims freedom of the exploration and use of outer space but this freedom in fact suggests equal access by all States to outer space and non-appropriation of any part of outer space and this freedom can be exercised only with certain conditions and restrictions mentioned in the Treaty. As rightly pointed out by a Soviet author[28] "the extension of State sovereignty to outer space and its component parts is prohibited by international space law with freedom of space being its major principle." However, non-extension of State sovereignty to outer space and its component parts does not mean that the principle of respect for State sovereignty is alien to international space law. To be sure, relations between States with regard to their space activities are governed by international space law with strict compliance with the principle." Further, freedom of space should not be interpreted as an unrestricted right to any type of space activities. Numerous conditions and restrictions are embodied in the 1967 Treaty and other sources of international space law. Freedom of space should not be used as a pretext for violating sovereign rights of other States on earth."[29]

---

[19] Article IV; see also General Assembly Resolution, 1884 (XVIII) dated 17 October, 1963.

[20] Article IV.

[21] Article V.

[22] Article VI.

[23] Article VII.

[24] Article VIII.

[25] D. Goedhuis, "The Present State of Space Law" in the Present State of International Law and other Essays (1973), p. 201 at p. 243.

[26] Ibid, at p. 244.

[27] For the detailed study of the Treaty and its Provisions see M. Chandrasekharan "The Space Treaty", I.J.I.L., Vol. 7 (1967), p. 61; Piradev and Rybakov, "First Space Treaty", International Affairs, (Moscow, March, 1967), p. 21; Damodar Wade, Goankar, "Legal Problems of Outer Space", I.J.I.L., Vol. 9 (1969), p. 47.

As remarked by an eminent author,[30] "The Space Treaty is a landmark in the process of development of space law. It represents the common interests of mankind. It has ended the mere speculative phase. It enshrines certain principles of space law which took a decade to form and crystallize. It represents in more specific and more binding terms the rules of customary law such as contained in various U. N. resolutions.

A major failure of Space Treaty is that it does not provide any international control machinery to look after the larger interests of the international community...............The treaty does not provide for compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice (I. C. J.) for the settlement of disputes." Moreover, "the treaty has not resolved the boundary between air space and outer space."[31]

As of January, 2019, 102 countries have ratified the Treaty other 27 countries have signed but not completed ratification.

(2) The agreement on the Rescue of Astronauts, the Return of Astronauts and the Return of Objects Launched into Outer Space, 1967

Yet another landmark in the development of space law is the Agreement on the Rescue of Astronauts, The Return of Astronauts and the Return of Objects Launched into outer space which was commended upon by the General Assembly on December 10, 1967. The agreement entered into force in December, 1968. As of January 2019, 98 countries have ratified the Agreement and 24 others have signed. The Agreement provides that each contracting party which receives information or discovers that the personnel of a space craft have suffered accident or are experiencing conditions of distress or have made an emergency, or unintended landing in territory under its jurisdiction or on the high seas or in any other place not under the jurisdiction of any State shall immediately, (a) notify the launching authority or, if it cannot identify and immediately communicate with the launching authority, immediately make a public announcement by all appropriate means of communication at its disposal; (b) notify the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who should disseminate the information without delay by all appropriate means of communication at his disposal.[32] If owing to accident, distress, emergency or unintended landing, the personnel of a spacecraft land in territory under the jurisdiction of a contracting party, it shall immediately take all possible steps to rescue them and render them all necessary assistance. It shall inform the launching authority and also the Secretary-General of the U. N. of the steps it is taking and of their progress.[33] If owing to accident, distress, emergency or unintended landing, the personnel of a space craft land in territory under the jurisdiction of a contracting party or have been found on the high seas or in any other place not under the jurisdiction of any State, they shall be safely and promptly returned to representatives of the launching authority.[34] Expenses incurred in fulfilling obligations to recover and return a space object or its component parts shall be borne by the launching authority.[35]

---

[28] V. Vereshchetin, "On the Importance of the Principle of State Sovereignty in International Space Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 17 (1977) p. 203 at p. 208.

[29] Ibid.

[30] S. Bhatt, note 4, at pp. 276-277.

[31] Ibid, at p. 278.

[32] Article 1 of the Agreement.

[33] Article 2.

(3) The Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by Space Objects, 1971.

The third great landmark in the development of international space law is the Convention on International Liability for Damage caused by Space Objects, which was agreed on and commended by the General Assembly on November 29, 1971.[36] The Convention entered into force in September, 1972. The convention provides that a launching State shall be absolutely liable to pay compensation for damage caused by the space object on the surface of the earth or to aircraft or to aircraft in flight.[37] In the event of damage being caused elsewhere than on the surface of the earth to a space object of one launching State or to persons or property on board such a space object of another launching State, the latter shall be liable only if the damage is due to its fault or the fault of persons for whom it is responsible.[38] Whenever two or more States jointly launch a space object, they shall be jointly and severally liable for any damage caused.[39] The convention provides for the establishment of a Claims Commission in case there is no settlement between the State which suffers damage and the launching State.[40]

The falling of "Skylab" in July 1979, raised the question of applicability of Liability Convention of 1971. Put in orbit in 1973 by NASA of America, it was expected to re-enter earth's atmosphere in 1980. It fell well in advance in July 1979. Though causing panic in India and abroad, it in fact fell in the sea causing no damage to any country. Moreover, irrespective of the fact whether a state was a party to the convention or not, American President had offered well in advance to pay compensation for any damage caused by the falling of 'Skylab'. Even the absence of such an offer America would have been internationally liable under the customary international law for any damage caused.

As of January 2019, 96 countries have become parties to the convention on International Liability for Damage caused by space Objects. Besides three inter-governmental organisations (European Space Agency, European Organisation for the Exploitation of Meteorological Satellites and the European Telecommunication Satellite Organisation) have declared their acceptance of the rights and obligations provided in the Agreement.

(4) The Convention on Registration of Objects Launched into Outer Space, 1974.

The fourth landmark is Convention on Registration of Objects Launched into Outer Space which was adopted by the U. N. General Assembly on 12 November, 1974 as an annex to Resolution 3235 (XXIX).[41] Article II of the Convention provides that when a space object is launched into earth orbit or beyond, the launching State shall register the space object by means of an entry in an appropriate registry which it shall maintain. Each launching State shall inform the Secretary-General of the U. N. of the establishment of such a registry. Under Article IV each State or registry is under an obligation to furnish certain information concerning each space object carried on its registry to the Secretary-General of the U. N. The Convention on Registration of Objects Launched into Outer Space entered into force on 15th September, 1976, after its ratification by the U. S., Bulgaria, Canada, France and Sweden were the four countries who had ratified it earlier.[42]

---

[34] Article 4.

[35] Article 5 (5).

[36] See General Assembly Resolution 2777 (XXVI).

[37] Article II of the Convention.

[38] Article III.

[39] Article V.

[40] See Articles XIV-XX.

[41] For the text of the Convention, see I.J.I.L., Vol. 14 (1974), pp. 446-449.

India acceded to the convention on 18 January, 1982. As of January 2019, 69 countries have ratified the convention. Besides this, two inter-governmental organisations (European Space Agency and European Organisation for the Exploitation of Meteorological Satellites) have declared their acceptance of the rights and obligations provided in the Registration Convention.

(5) The Agreement Governing the Activities of States on the Moon and other Celestial Bodies, 1979.

The fifth landmark is the Agreement Governing the Activities of States on the Moon and other Celestial Bodies which was adopted by the General Assembly on 5th December, 1979 as an annex of Resolution 34/68. The Agreement entered into force on 11 July, 1994. The main provisions of this agreement are following :

(1) All activities on the moon, including its exploration and use, shall be carried out in accordance with international law, in particular the charter of the U. N. and taking into account the Declaration on Principles of International law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations adopted by the General Assembly on 24 October, 1970, in the interest of maintaining international peace and security and promoting international cooperation, and mutual understanding and with due regard to the corresponding interests of all other States Parties.[43]

(2) The moon shall be used by all States Parties exclusively for peaceful purposes.[44]

(3) The exploration and use of the moon shall be the province of all mankind and shall be carried out for the benefit and in the interests of all countries, irrespective of their degree of economic or scientific development.[45]

(4) There shall be freedom of scientific investigation on the moon by all States Parties without discrimination of any kind on the basis of equality and in accordance with international law.[46]

(5) The moon and its resources are the common heritage of mankind.[47]

(6) The moon is not subject to national appropriation by any claim of Sovereignty by means of use or occupation, or by any other means.[48]

(7) States Parties to this Agreement hereby undertake to establish an international regime, including appropriate procedures, to govern the exploitation of the natural resources of the moon as such exploitation is about to become feasible.[49]

(8) The main purposes of the international regime to be established shall include :

   (a) The orderly and safe development of the natural resources of the moon;

   (b) The rational management of those resources;

---

[42] U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIII, No. 9 (October 1976), p. 35.

[43] Article 2.

[44] Article 3, paragraph 1.

[45] Article 4, paragraph 1.

[46] Article 6, paragraph 1.

[47] Article 11, Paragraph 1. See also K. Narayana Rao, "Common Heritage of Mankind and the Moon Treaty", I.J.I.L., Vol. 21 (1981), p. 275.

[48] Ibid, paragraph 2.

[49] Ibid, paragraph 5.

(c) The expansion of opportunities in the use of those resources;

(d) An equitable sharing by all States Parties in the benefits derived from those resources, whereby the interests and needs of the developing countries as well as the efforts of those countries which have contributed either directly or indirectly to the exploration of the moon, shall be given special consideration.[50]

(9) States Parties shall retain jurisdiction and control over their personnel, space vehicles, equipment, facilities, stations and installations on the moon. The ownership of space vehicles, equipment facilities, stations and installations shall not be affected by their presence on the moon.[51]

(10) States Parties to this Agreement shall bear international responsibility for national activities on the moon, whether such activities are carried out by governmental agencies or by non-governmental entities, and for assuring that national activities are carried out in conformity with the provisions of this Agreement. States Parties shall ensure that non-governmental entities under their jurisdiction shall engage in activities on the moon only under the authority and continuing supervision of the appropriate State Party.[52]

As of January 2018, 18 countries have become parties to this Agreement.

Australia, Austria, Belgium, Chile, Kazakistan, Lebanon, Mexico, Morocco, Netherlands, Pakistan, Peru, Phillipines and Uruguay, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Turkey.

France, Guatemala, India, Romania have signed but not ratified.

In practice, it is a failed treaty since it has not been ratified by any nation which engages in manned and space exploitation or has plans to do so, for example, the U.S., European Union, Russian Federation, People's Republic of China, Japan and India. Thus since its creation in 1979, there has been negligible effect on actual space flight.

It may be noted that in September 2009, India's Chandrayan-I discovered the presence of water molecules on the moon. As pointed out by ISRO Scientist Mylaswami "It is one of the mile stones (of the mission). We have to quantify it. It was a combined team effort. Finding presence of water or ice has been one of the mission's scientific feat was a landmark event in international space cooperation between India and other countries. Busting the myth Mr. Annadurai, "The current thinking was that only other planetary bodies were the source of water molecules on Moon. Chandrayan-I mission has changed the thinking. The new theory is that water molecules are generated then and there. This is now being analysed".

Later on, the presence of water on Moon was confirmed by NASA's mission to Moon. But all these developments are taking place irrespective of the Agreement Governing the Activities of States on the Moon and other Celestial Bodies, 1979.

(6) Vienna Conference on the Exploration and Peaceful Uses of Outer Space (UNISPACE-82 or UNISPACE II).

The UNISPACE-82 was held at Vienna from August 9 to August 22, 1982, with 94 States participants and 45 observers. The Conference reviews the developments in the field of outer space taking place since 1968. The conference appealed the States not to increase arm race beyond earth. This appeal was specially directed to States having nuclear capability. A report adopted by consensus asked the States to follow outer space Treaty, 1967 which has prohibited the use of weapons of mass-destruction in outer space. It is unfortunate that the two great powers—U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R.—are lying each other in production of most advanced weapons of destruction instead of establishing peace in the outer space. To quote only one example, U. S. President Reagan's recent "Star War" Missile defence project is most likely to endanger peace in outer space. Besides being violative of 1972-Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty (ABM), this would accelerate the arms race and jeopardise efforts being made to ensure peaceful uses of outer space. The UNISPACE-82 also considered the question of monopoly of some industrialized countries in the field of science and technology and recommended increased cooperation between the developed and developing countries in this respect.

---

[50] Article 11, paragraph 7.

[51] Article 12, paragraph 1.

[52] Article 14, paragraph 1.

(7) UNISPACE-III

As noted above, the Committee on the Peaceful Uses of Outer Space in its 37th Session held from 6 to 16 June, 1994 proposed the convening of the Third U. N. Conference on the Exploration and Peaceful Uses of Outer Space (UNISPACE-III) by the end of this century. The third U.N. Conference on exploration and Peaceful Uses of Outer Space (i.e. UNISPACE-III) was held in Vienna (Austria) from 19 to 30 July, 1999. The key objective of the conference was to create a blueprint for the peaceful uses of outer space in the 21st century. It considered the following subjects :

(i) Future of Exploration of Planets;

(ii) Use of Micro-wave systems or micro-satellites in the exploration of outer space;

(iii) Security of future outer space programmes in respect of debris of outer space;

(iv) Maintenance and supervision of outer space based environment; and

(v) Use of Mobile Satellite Communication.

The above-mentioned five major treaties and UNISPACE - I to III constitute the highlight of the development of space law.[53] To safeguard the common interests of mankind and to ensure the establishment and the maintenance of a viable, co-operative public order of the outer space, the moon and other celestial bodies, it is most important that full recognition be given to inclusive interests of States in outer space.[54] "The policy of inclusive access to and use of outer space resources means that each State must take full advantage of opportunities in space, subject to the limitation that activities must be peaceful and unharmful to common interest. This highlights the significance of freedom and equality of access to the outer space resources. The protection of exclusive interest is called for only in one single case, when it is reasonably, necessary for the protection of the security of the State............However, the inclusive exploitation of space resources takes place in a sort of unorganized arena. Proposals concerning the establishment of a special enterprisory organization of space has not found much favour among States. Therefore, the future of public order of space is heavily dependent upon cooperation among States, both at the multilateral and bilateral level. The United Nations plays a very important role in coordinating the activities of different States in outer space, ensuring a uniform and progressive economic and technological development of the entire world."[55]

To conclude in the words of an author,[56] there is need for a global policy for the Space Age. This need has arisen, especially in recent years, on account of the common destiny and common survival of mankind. For carrying out of the programme of a united policy there is need of an international organization. Such a policy, in the context of the contemporary period, shall guide States in the discharge of their responsibilities, provide a workable means for future progress, and establish a stable system of law and order."

---

[53] See also Surya P. Sharma, "International Law of the Outer Space : A Policy Oriented Study", I.J.I.L., Vol. 17 (1977) p. 185 at p. 190.

[54] Ibid. at p. 201.

[55] Ibid. at p. 201.

[56] S. Bhatt, note 4 at p. 289.

(8) International Space Year (ISY), 1992

N.B.—This has already been discussed earlier in this Chapter.

India's Mission to the Moon.—N.B. : This has already been discussed earlier under the caption, "The Agreement Governing the Activities of the States on the Moon and other Celestial Bodies, 1979".

(9) Indian Space Research Organisation's (ISRO) grand Performance :

N.B.—For this please see Appendix II.

CHAPTER 21

NATIONALITY

Definition and meaning.—Nationality may be defined "...... as the legal status of membership of the collectively of individuals whose acts, decisions and policy are vouchsafed through the legal concept of the State representing those individuals".[1] Fenwick defines the term 'Nationality' in the following words : "'Nationality' may be defined as the bond which unites a person to a given State which constitutes his membership in the particular State, which gives him a claim to the protection of that State and which subjects him to the obligation created by the laws of that State".[2] In the famous case of Re Lynch the British Mexican Claims Commission defined the term 'Nationality' in the following words : "A man's nationality forms a continuing state of things and not a physical fact which occurs at a particular moment. A man's nationality is a continuing legal relationship between the sovereign State on the one hand and the citizen on the other. The fundamental basis of a man's nationality is membership of an independent political community. This legal relationship involves rights and corresponding duties upon both on the part of the citizens no less than on the part of the State".[3] A similar definition was given by the International Court of Justice in Nottebohm case (second phase).[4] According to the World Court under International Law, nationality is "a legal bond having as its basis a social fact of attachment, genuine connection of existence and sentiments together with the existence of reciprocal rights and duties. It may be said to constitute a juridical expression of the fact that the individual upon whom it is conferred either directly by the law or as a result of an act of the authorities, is in fact more closely connected with the population of State conferring nationality than with that of any other State." Thus the basis of nationality is the membership of an independent community. In U.S. v. Wong Kum Ark,[5] Justice Gray held that the State may determine as to what type or class of people shall be entitled of citizenship. !t is for the internal law of each State to determine as to who is, and who is not its national. This is, however, subject to particular international obligations. Although, nationality is determined by the internal law of a State, it cannot claim that its determination must be acceptable to other States unless and until its determination is in conformity with the rules of international law. In Nottebohm case[6] the World Court observed :

> "A State cannot claim that the rules (relating to acquisition of nationality) which it has thus laid down are entitled to recognition by another State unless it has acted in conformity with this general aim of making the legal bond of nationality accord with the individual's genuine connection with the State which assumes the defence of its citizens by means of protection as against other States."

Development of the Law of Nationality and its importance*.—The rules of nationality are determined by State law. But due to the lack of uniformity in State laws in regard to the nationality, many difficulties were experienced. Consequently, difficult problems of Statelessness, double nationality, etc. arose. In Hague Conference of 1930, endeavour was made to end the conflicts arising out of divergent State laws in respect of nationality. Consequently a convention on the conflict of Nationality Law was signed and adopted. In this connection, an attempt was made to resolve the problems relating to nationality and Statelessness. Besides this, Convention of the Nationality of

---

1. J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (Butterworths, Singapore, 1989) p. 340.
2. Charles G. Fenwick, International Law (Third Indian Reprint, 1971), pp. 301-302.
3. Annual Digest of Public International Law Cases, 1929-1930, p. 221 at p. 228.
4. I.C.J. Rep. (1955), at p. 23.
5. (1898) 169 U.S. 649 at p. 668 ; see also Stoeck v. Public Trustee, (1921) 2 Ch. 69.
6. I.C.J. Rep. (1955) p. 4 at p. 23.

* See also for P.C.S. (1986), Q. 7.

Married Women was adopted in 1957. Last but not the least, Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness was adopted in 1961.

International Importance of Nationality.*—Nationality is often determined by State laws. "Nationality is the principal link between an individual and International Law." [7] Under International Law, nationality has often been used as a justification for the intervention of a Government to protect another country.[8] It may, however, be noted that international law does not create a correlative right in favour of the individuals. It creates rights only in favour of the States whose nationals they are. In Paneyezys Saldutiskis case[9] the Permanent Court of International Justice observed : "......... in taking up the case of one of its nationals, by resorting to diplomatic action or international judicial proceedings on his behalf, a State is in reality asserting its own right, the right to ensure in the person of its nationals, respect for the rules of international law.[10] The right is necessarily limited to intervention on behalf of its own nationals because, in the absence of special agreement, it is the bond of nationality between the State and individual which alone confers upon the State the right of diplomatic protection, and it is as a part of the function of diplomatic protection that the right to take up a claim and ensures respect for the rules of International law must be envisaged."

As pointed out by Starke,[11] the laws relating to nationality have following importance under International law :

(1) The protection of rights of diplomatic agents are the consequence of nationality.
(2) If a State does not prevent offences of its nationals or allows them to commit such harmful acts as might affect other States, then that State shall be responsible for the acts committed by such a person.
(3) Ordinarily, States do not refuse to take the persons of their nationality. By nationality we may mean loyalty towards particular State.
(4) Nationality may also mean that the national of a State may be compelled to do military service for the State.
(5) Yet another effect of nationality is that the State can refuse to extradit its own nationals.
(6) According to the practice of large number of States during war, enemy character is determined on the basis of nationality.
(7) States frequently exercise jurisdiction over criminal and other matters over the persons of their nationality.

In a number of cases, the Permanent Court of International Justice has held that State may by agreement take matters, such as nationality, out of domestic jurisdiction and make them of international concern and subject to international jurisdiction.[12]

Distinction between Nationality and Domicile.—It has been pointed out earlier that the basis of nationality is the membership of a man with an independent community. On the other hand, domicile denotes the residence of the person. Thus there is a great difference between 'nationality' and 'domicile'. While nationality denotes the relation of man with his nation which protects him and the person is bound to follow the rules enacted by that State, on the other hand, domicile denotes the residence of the person. Consequently, a person may acquire nationality through domicile. In different countries there are different rules and processes in regard to the acquisition of nationality through domicile. In D.P. Joshi v. State of Madhya Bharat,[13] the Supreme Court of India explained the meaning of domicile in the following words : "Domicile has reference to the system of law by which a person is governed, and when we speak of domicile of country, we assume that the same system of law prevails all over that country. But it might well happen that laws relating to succession and marriage might not be the same all over the country and that different areas in the State might have different laws in respect of those matters. In that case each area having a distinct set of laws would itself be regarded as a country for the purpose of domicile. Domicile of a person means his permanent home. Domicile of origin of a person means 'the domicile received by him at his birth." [14] Further, "the domicile of origin, though received at birth, need not be either the country in which the infant is born, or the country in which his parents are residing, or the country to which his father belongs by the race or allegiance or the country of the infant's nationality." [15]

---

* See also for I.A.S (1973), Q. No. 4 ; I.A.S. (1938), Q. No. 2 ; P.C.S. (1985), Q. 4.

[7] Oppenheim's International Law, Ninth Edition, Vol. I, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, (1992) p. 857.

[8] Ralston, International Arbitral Law and Procedure, (1926), pp. 137, 160 ; see also Hyde, International Law (1945) Vol. II, p. 479 ; Brown's Claim case, Annual Digest, 1923-24, Case No. 35.

[9] (1939) P.C.I.J. Reports, A/B No. 75 at p. 76.

[10] See Mavrommatis Palestine Concessions (Jurisdiction) case, (1926) P.C.I.J., Series A. No. 2, p. 12 ; Brazillian and Serbian Loans case, (1929) P.C.I.J., Series A, Nos. 20-21, p. 17.

[11] Starke, see supra note 1 at pp. 342-343.

[12] See Tunis Morocco Nationality Decrees, P.C.I.J., Series B, No. 4 (1923) ; see also German Settlers in Poland, P.C.I.J., Series No. 7, 16 (1923) ; case Concerning certain German Interests in Upper Silesia, P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 6, 14, 16 (1925) ; Treatment of Polish Nationals in Danzing Territory, P.C.I.J., Series B, No. 44, 121.

 See also for I.A.S (1958), Q. No. 2.

Distinction between Nationality and Citizenship*.—Often nationality and citizenship are considered to be synonymous of each other. But the fact is otherwise. There is a great difference between nationality and citizenship. By nationality under international law, we mean the legal relationship which exists between the nation and the individual. Citizenship, on the other hand, denotes the relations between the person and the State law. In other words we may say through nationality the civil and natural rights of a person may come under international law whereas the rights of citizenship are the sole concern of the State law. It is possible that all the citizens may possess the nationality of a particular State, but it is not necessary that all the nationals may be the citizens of that particular State. Citizens are those persons, who possess full political rights in that State. But a person who possesses only nationality in a particular State may not possess all political rights.

Modes of Acquisition of Nationality.—Following are the modes of acquisition of nationality :—

(1) By Birth.—A person acquires nationality of the State where he is born. He also acquires the nationality of his parents at the time of his birth.

(2) Naturalisation.—Nationality may also be acquired by naturalisation.

When a person living in a foreign State for a long time acquires the citizenship of that State then it is said to be state of nationality acquired through naturalisation. In Nottebohm case,[16] International Court of Justice held that in respect of grant of nationality there is no obligation of the States if that man has no relationship with the State of Naturalisation. In this case, the court applied the principle of effective nationality. A brief reference of this case may be made here.

Nottebohm's case.—Born in 1881 in Germany Friedrich Nottebohm went to Guatemala in 1905. He had German nationality by birth and remained a German national until 1939. Since 1905 he resided in Guatemala where he carried on the business of banking, commerce and plantation. But he continued his business relations with Germany and went to Germany several times. After 1931 he visited his brother who resided in Leichtenstein. In 1938 he left Guatemala. After reaching Leichtenstein, he through his attorney, submitted an application for naturalisation as a citizen of Leichtenstein, and the same was granted on 13 October 1939. Thereafter he conducted himself exclusively as a national of Leichtenstein, particularly with regard to Guatemala. He returned to Guatemala at the beginning of 1940 on Leichtenstein passport and in Guatemala his change of nationality was enrolled on the register of Aliens. As a result of war measures his property was seized in 1943 and he was arrested by Guatemalan authorities and handed over to the armed forces of the U.S. in Guatemala. Later on, he was deported to the U.S. and interned there for more than two years. In 1944, as many as 57 legal proceedings were started against him in Guatemala obviously to confiscate all his properties. After his release from internment in the U.S. he wanted to go to Guatemala to oppose cases filed against him but he was refused readmission to Guatemala. In 1946 he went to Leichtenstein and lived there thereafter. In 1949 his properties in Guatemala were confiscated under the law of Guatemala.

---

[13] A.I.R. 1955 S.C. 334 at p. 338 ; see also Somerville v. Somerville, (1801) 5 Ves. 750 at p. 786 ; Winans v. Attorney-General, (1904) A.C 287 at p. 290 ; Whicker v. Hume, 28 L.J. Ch. 396 at p. 400.

[14] Dicey on Conflict of Laws, 6th Edition, p. 87.

[15] Ibid, at p. 88.

* See also for P.C.S. (1974), Q. No. 2(c) ; P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 2(a).

 See also for P.C.S. (1971), Q. No. 7(a) ; P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 8 ; P.C.S. (1981), Q. No. 8(a) ; P.C.S. (1988), Q. 7.

 See also for P.C.S. (1975), Q. No. 2(c) ; C.S.E. (1985), Q. No. 5 (a).

[16] I.C.J. Rep. (1955), p. 4.

* See also for I.A.S. (1964), Q. No. 5 ; C.S.E. (1983), Q. No. 5(c).

After having been domiciled in Leichtenstein for five years, Leichtenstein espousing his case, filed a case in the International Court of Justice on 11 December 1951. By its judgment dated 18 November 1953, the court rejected the preliminary objection of Guatemala against the jurisdiction of the Court. In the second phase the court considered only the admissibility of claims (of reparation summing into ten millions Swiss Frances) and held by a majority of eleven to three that Leichtenstein was not entitled to extend its protection vis-a-vis Guatemala. Thus the International Court of Justice rejected the claims made by Leichtenstein espousing the case of Nottebohm to be inadmissible. Further, the World Court had to decide whether by the fact of grant of nationality by the naturalisation to Nottebohm by Leichtenstein would directly entail an obligation on the part of Guatemala to recognise Leichtenstein's right to exercise its protection over Nottebohm. Propounding the principle of effective nationality, the World Court observed :

> "It must ascertain whether the factual connection between Nottebohm and Leichtenstein in the period preceding, contemporaneous with and following his naturalisation appears to be sufficiently close, so preponderant in relation to any connection which may have existed between him and any other State, that it is possible to regard the nationality conferred upon him as real and effective as the exact juridical expression of a social fact, of a connection which existed previously or came into existence thereafter." [17]

The Court noted that Guatemala was the main centre of Nottebohm's business and he remained there for as many as 34 years. Even after his removal in 1943 as a result of war measures Guatemala remained the main seat of his business. As compared to this, in connection with Leichtenstein were extremely tenors. At the time of his application for naturalisation, he had neither any settled abode nor had resided in that country for a long time. Nor did he intend to transfer his business activities to Leichtenstein. Applying the above principle the Court held that Nottebohm did not enjoy the nationality of Leichtenstein. The Court said that it was the bond of nationality between a State and an individual which alone conferred upon the State the right to put forward claim on his behalf on the international plane, the grant of nationality was entitled to recognition by other States only if it represented a genuine connection between the individual and the State granting its nationality. Nottebohm's nationality was not based on any genuine prior link with Leichtenstein and the object of his naturalization was to enable him to acquire the status of a neutral national in time of war. On the basis of these reasons, the Court held that Leichtenstein was not entitled to espouse his case and put forward an international claim on his behalf against Guatemala.

(3) By resumption.—Sometimes it so happens that a person may lose his nationality because of certain reasons. Subsequently, he may resume his nationality after fulfilling certain conditions.

---

[17] The Court further observed : "In order to decide upon the admissibility of the application, the Court must ascertain whether the nationality conferred on Nottebohm by Leichtenstein by means of a naturalization which took place in circumstances which have been described, can be validly invoked as against Guatemala, whether it bestows upon Leichtenstein a sufficient title to the exercise of protection in respect of Nottebohm as against Guatemala .... what is involved is not recognition for all purposes but merely for the purposes of the admissibility of the application and secondly, that what is involved is not recognition by all States but only by Guatemala." Ibid., at pp. 16-17, see also p. 20.

(4) By subjugation.—When a State is defeated or conquered, all the citizens acquire the nationality of the conquering State.

(5) Cession.—When a State has been ceded in another State, all the people of the territory acquire nationality of the State in which their territory has been merged.

In addition to the above-mentioned modes, there may be some other modes whereby a person may acquire nationality. For example, if a person is appointed in the public service of another State, he acquires the nationality of that State.

Loss of Nationality.* —Following are the modes of loss of nationality :—

(1) By Release.—In some States law provides that the citizens may lose nationality by release. In the loss of nationality by release it is necessary to submit an application for the same. If the application is accepted, the person concerned is released from the nationality of the State concerned.

(2) By deprivation.—In certain States law may provide that if the national of that State without seeking prior permission of the government obtains employment in another State, he will be deprived of his nationality.

(3) Long Residence Abroad.—Yet another mode of the loss of nationality is the long residence abroad. State laws of many States contain provisions in this connection that if a person resides for a long period abroad, his nationality ends.

(4) By Renunciation.—A person may also renounce his nationality. The need for renunciation arises when a person acquires nationality of more than one State. In such a condition, he has to make a choice as to of which country he will remain the national. Consequently, he has to renounce the nationality, of one State.

(5) Substitution.—Some States provide for the substitution of nationality. According to this principle, a person may get nationality of a State in place of the nationality of another State. This is called nationality by substitution whereby he loses the nationality of one State and acquires the nationality of another State.

Double Nationality and Nationality of Married Women.—Because of the conflict of the laws of nationality of different countries, a situation often arises when a person possesses nationality of more than one State. For example a woman, who after her marriage acquires the nationality of her husband may continue to possess her original nationality. Double nationality may also be acquired by birth such as by the parents who are at the time of birth in a Foreign State.[18] Treaties may provide that persons may by their will select their nationality. The Hague Conference of 1930 made an attempt to remove the difficulty arising out of double nationality in consequence of war. Articles 3 to 6 to the Hague Convention contain the provisions in this connection. For example Art. 5 provides that such a person shall be treated in third State as if he has only one nationality. The third State will either recognize the nationality of the State where he often resides or will recognize the nationality which is more relevant in accordance with the facts and circumstances of each individual case. Articles 8 to 11 provide for the nationality of married women. In these provisions, an endeavour has been made to remove difficulties arising out of double nationality. According to the principles contained in these provisions if a woman marries then she will automatically acquire the nationality of her husband. In the recent times the Convention on the Nationality of Married Women is yet another significant attempt to remove the difficulties and problems arising out of the double nationality.

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1971), Q. No. 7(b) ; P.C.S. (1988), Q. 7.

 See also for I.A.S. (1968), Q. No. 12(b) ; I.A.S. (1958), Q. No. 2 ; I.A.S. (1956), Q. No. 6 ; P.C.S. (1973), Q. No. 10(b) ; P.C.S. (1969), Q. No. 3(d) ; P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 8 ; C.S.E. (1983), Q. No. 5(c) ; For answer see also Nottebohm case discussed earlier ; P.C.S. (1988), Q. 7.

[18] As pointed out by an Indian author, "An individual may possess dual or multiple citizenship with or without intent and with or without knowledge. It may arise either from concurrent application of the principles of jus soli and jus sanguinis at birth or from the conflict of citizenship laws as to naturalization and expatriation. A person enjoying dual nationality would be subject to claim from both the States. He may be subjected to taxes by both of them ; he is not entitled by one of the two States of which he is national while in the territorial jurisdiction of the other ; both the States can insist on military service by him in case of a war ; one State could be suspicious of his loyalty to it and subject him to the disabilities of an enemy alien including sequestration of his property while the other holds his conduct treasonable". S.K. Agrawala, International Law, Indian Courts and Legislature (1965), p. 105.

Reference may also be made here to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948. Article 15(1) of the Declaration provides that every one has the right to nationality. Article 15(2) further provides that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality nor denied the right to change his nationality. It is very unfortunate that the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 has not incorporated the right of everyone to a Nationality and the right not to be deprived of one's nationality. The Covenant however affirms the right of every child to acquire a nationality.[19]

Reference may be made here to the Convention on the Nationality of Married Women, 1957. This convention was adopted on 29 January, 1957. It entered into force on 11 August, 1958. As of 2013, this convention had 74 countries as parties.

On 7th November, 1967, the General Assembly of the U.N. adopted the declaration on elimination of discrimination against women.[20] Subsequently, on 18th December, 1979 the Assembly adopted the Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women.[21] This Convention came into force in 1981. As of 2nd June 2012, 187 countries have ratified the convention. Subsequently, optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women 1999 was adopted. So far 77 countries have ratified it. Under Article 9 of the convention, States Parties agreed to grant to women equal rights with men to acquire, change or retain their nationality. They also undertook to ensure in particular that neither marriage to an alien nor change of nationality by the husband during marriage shall automatically change the nationality to the wife, render her stateless or force upon her the nationality of the husband. State Parties shall also grant women equal rights with respect to nationality of their children.

Statelessness*.—Sometimes it so happens that a person does not possess the nationality of any State.[22] Such a state is referred to as the state of Statelessness. At present this is one of the burning problems of international law. A person who does not possess the nationality of any nation cannot exercise the rights conferred upon him by international law.[23] In Stoeck v. The Public Trustee,[24] it was held that if a person is not a citizen of any State, he will be called Stateless. The facts of this case are as follows :—

Under the Treaty of Versailles, 1919, the allied nations had reserved the right to retain and liquidate the property of German citizens. Some property of the appellant (Stoeck) also came under the said provisions, Stoeck filed a case contending that he was not a German citizen and hence his property could not be seized under the said provisions. When the case was proceeding, Stoeck was living in Germany. He was born in 1872 in Prussia, but in 1895 he left Prussia to live in Belgium. In 1896 he obtained release from the citizenship of Prussia, in accordance with the law of Germany. Thereafter, he never applied for German citizenship. In November, 1896, he left Belgium and came to England. He made England his permanent residence but could not get English citizenship through naturalisation. In 1916 he was interned and in 1918 he was deported from England. The Court held that Stoeck was not a German citizen.

---

[19] See "After 30 years, an International Bill of Human Rights", U.N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIII, No. 4 (April 1976), p. 50.

[20] Sea G A Resolution 2263 (xxii) of 7th November, 1967.

[21] See U.N. Doc. No. A/Res/34/180.

* See also for I.A.S. (1956), Q. No. 6 ; I.A.S. (1958), Q. No. 2 ; I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 4 ; P.C.S. (1975), Q. No. 2(b) ; P.C.S. (1968), Q. No. 8.

[22] In the words of an Indian author, "......... Since the municipal laws of different States differ in many points concerning this matter, as a consequence an individual sometimes comes to possess more than one nationality and sometimes none at all" ; see supra note 17.

[23] "Stateless persons are not only without the diplomatic protection of any State, they are also refused enjoyment of rights dependent on reciprocity. Nationality is important to the individual not only with regard to political rights and privileges but also because his civil status and capacity may be dependent upon it. There are many essential rights, such as, personal capacity (attainment of majority, capacity of the married women), family rights (marriage, divorce, adoption of children), matrimonial regime (in so far as this is not regarded as part of the law of contract), and succession to movable (and in some cases to immovable) property which an individual cannot enjoy in a normal way so long as his personal State which determines these rights, is in doubt". Ibid, at pp. 105-106.

[24] (1921) 2 Ch. 67.

Russell, J. observed "the question of what state a person belongs to must ultimately be decided by the municipal law of the state to which he claims to belong or to which it is alleged that he belongs.[25]" The above rule has been followed in Oppenhimer v. Cattermole.[26] The same principle has been incorporated in Hague Convention of 1930. Article 2 of the convention provides that any question as to whether a person possesses the nationality of a particular State shall be determined in accordance with the law of that State.

The situation of Statelessness is recognized under German Law, English Law and under International Law. In International Law, it is generally agreed that whether a person is a citizen of a particular State is determined by the law of that State. Oppenheim has compared such persons with the ships floating in the open sea without the flag of any country. A serious attempt to remove the difficulties arising out of Statelessness was made in the Hague Convention of 1930. Later on after the establishment of United Nations attention was given to remove the difficulties arising out of this problem. According to Article 15 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, each person is entitled to have nationality and the nationality of any person cannot be taken away or snatched arbitrarily. Statelessness "is a condition which not only means great hardship and lack of security for individuals, but involves the existence of a serious gap in the application of International Law.[27]

Reference may be made here to the Convention on the Status of Stateless Persons, 1954. This convention was adopted on 28th September, 1954. It entered into force on 6th June, 1960. So far there are 62 parties to this convention.

Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness, 1961.—The International Law Commission considered the subject of Statelessness together with the question of nationality between 1952 and 1954. In 1954, the General Assembly decided to convene a Conference to conclude a Convention on reduction of Statelessness. The conference was called in 1959 and adopted in 1961 the Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness. The Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness, 1961 entered into force on December 13, 1975. So far 73 countries had ratified or acceded to the convention. India has not ratified it and, as such, is not a party to this convention. Following are the main provisions of the Convention:—

(i) A party to the Convention shall grant its nationality to a person born in its territory who would otherwise be Stateless. Such a nationality shall be granted either by birth or by operation of law.[28]

(ii) A child born in wedlock in a territory of a party to the Convention, and whose mother is national of that State, shall get that nationality in case the child would otherwise be Stateless.[29]

(iii) A contracting State shall grant its nationality to a person who is born in its territory and who would be otherwise Stateless and on account of certain reasons he is unable to acquire the nationality of the Contracting State. But this is subject to certain conditions including the condition that at the time of the person's birth the nationality of one of his parents was that of the Contracting State.[30]

(iv) A State party to the Convention shall also grant its nationality to a person who was although not born in the territory of such State party yet at the time of his birth, one of his parents was the national of that State party. Such a grant of nationality may be subject to certain conditions and may be granted either upon application or by operation of law.[31]

---

[25] Stoeck v. The Public Trustee, (1921) 2 Ch., at p. 78.

[26] (1973) Ch. 264, pp. 270, 273.

[27] Starke, see supra note 1 at p. 346.

[28] Article 1 of the Convention.

[29] Ibid.

[30] Article 1.

(v) Loss of nationality as a result of any change in the personal status of a person such as marriage, termination of marriage, and adoption, shall be conditional upon possession or acquiring of another nationality.[32]

(vi) A person shall not be deprived of his nationality, so as to become Stateless, on the ground of departure, residence abroad or failure to register.[33]

(vii) Naturalisation abroad or renunciation shall not result in loss of nationality unless the person concerned acquires another nationality.[34]

(viii) Except in the circumstances provided in Art. 7, normally a person shall not lose the nationality of the State party to the Convention if such loss renders him Stateless.[35]

Following steps may be taken to solve difficulties arising out of Statelessness :—

(1) It should be the duty of the States either to regard definite nationality of the person or not to recognise it. In this connection, Hague Convention is the first important step to remove the difficulties arising out of Statelessness and to lessen the number of persons who do not possess the nationality of any State. In recent times, Convention on the Reduction of the Statelessness, 1961 is a significant improvement on the provisions of the Hague Convention and goes a long way to remove the number of such persons, who do not possess the nationality of any other State.

(2) It should also be the duty of the States not to deprive the nationality of persons unless and until there is sufficient cause for it.

(3) Stateless persons liberally be granted nationality.

(4) Stateless person should be conferred upon some rights through international treaties. In this connection, Geneva Convention of the Status of Refugees, 1951 and Status of Stateless Persons, 1954 deserve a special mention.[36]

Thus we see that efforts have been made to remove the number of Stateless persons under international law but still there are many difficulties in this connection. Much has been done in this connection but much still remains to be done. Regarding the deprivation of nationality of Ugandan-Asians, Justice V.K. Krishna Iyer has aptly remarked, "By this Convention (i.e., the Convention of the Reduction of the Statelessness, 1961), Statelessness is sought to be minimised and grant of nationality liberalised and obligated. And if nationality is ensured to a person, he acquires political rights which stand four square between the offending State and the expelled. The Ugandan Asians, for instance, without complete disregard of the Convention of the Reduction of Statelessness cannot be deported. Nor can any particular racial groups be deported on the arbitrary fiat of any rule."[37]

---

[31] Article 4.

[32] Article 5.

[33] Article 7.

[34] Article 7.

[35] Article 7.

[36] Ibid., at pp. 346-347.

[37] "Mass Expulsion as Violation of Human Rights", I.J.I.L., Vol. 13 (1973), p. 169 at p. 171.

CHAPTER 22

EXTRADITION*

Basis of the principle of extradition.—Ordinarily each State exercises complete jurisdiction over all the persons within its territory. But sometimes there may be cases when a person after committing crime runs away to another country. In such a situation, the country affected finds itself helpless to exercise jurisdiction to punish the guilty person. This situation is undoubtedly very detrimental for peace and order. In such a situation peace and order can be maintained only when there is international co-operation among the States. There is social need to punish such criminals and in order to fulfil this social necessity the principle of extradition has been recognised. "The inability of a State to exercise its jurisdiction within the territory of another State would seriously undermine the maintenance of law and order if there were no cooperation in the administration of justice. The awareness among national decision-makers of the social necessity of jurisdictional co-operation is illustrated by the widespread practice of returning a person who is accused or who has been convicted of a crime to the State in which the crime was committed." [1]

Meaning and definition of the term extradition.—Extradition is the delivery of an accused or a convicted individual to the State on whose territory he is alleged to have committed or to have been convicted of a crime, by the State on whose territory the alleged criminal happens to be for the time being." [2] According to Starke, "The term 'extradition' denotes the process whereby under treaty or upon a basis of reciprocity one State surrenders to another State at its request a person accused or convicted of a criminal offence committed against the laws of the requesting State, such requesting State being competent to try the alleged offender.[3] In the view of eminent jurist Grotius, it is the duty of each State either to punish the criminals or to return them to the States where they have committed crime. In practice, however, States do not accept such obligation. Under International Law, extradition is mostly a matter of bilateral treaty. In principle, each State considers it a right to give asylum to a foreign national. "States have always upheld their right to grant asylum to foreign individuals as an inference from their territorial supremacy, those cases where a treaty imposes an obligation to extradit them." [4] Thus there is no universal rule of customary international law in existence imposing the duty of extradition.

Is there a general duty of States in respect of extradition ?—International Law does not recognise any general duty of States in respect of extradition. Extradition depends on the provisions of the existing extradition treaties. In Factor v. Laubenheimer,[5] the Court held : "The principles of International Law recognize no right to extradition apart from treaty while a government may, if agreeable to its own constitution and laws, voluntarily exercise the power to surrender a fugitive from justice to the country from which he fled......the legal right to demand his extradition and the correlative duty to surrender him to the demanding State exist only when created by treaty." But as pointed out in Wheaton's International Law,[6] there is no universally recognised practice that there can be no extradition except under a treaty, for, some countries grant extradition without a treaty. Reference may be made here to the Extradition Act, 1962, which governs the law relating to extradition in India. Chapter III of the Act deals with the return of fugitive criminals from Commonwealth countries with extradition arrangements. Chapter II deals with extradition of fugitive criminals to foreign States and to Commonwealth countries to which Chapter III does not apply. Under Section 4 of the Act, a requisition for the surrender of a fugitive criminal of a foreign State can be made to the Central Government. The Central Government may, if it thinks fit, order for magisterial inquiry.[7] Under sub-section (4) of Section 7, if the magistrate is of the opinion that a prima facie case is made out in support of the requisition of the foreign State or Commonwealth country, he may commit the fugitive criminal to prison to await the orders of the Central Government, and shall report the result of his inquiry to the Central Government. If on the receipt of the said report and statement, the Central Government is of the opinion that the fugitive criminal ought to be surrendered to the foreign State or Commonwealth country, it may issue a warrant for the custody and removal of the fugitive criminal and for his delivery at a place and to a person to be named within the warrant.[8] Thus, extradition treaty is not the only basis for extradition of a fugitive criminal.[9] Further, definition of the words "extradition offence" in section 2 (c) includes "(ii) in relation to a foreign State other than a treaty State......an offence which is specified by notification under the second Schedule": Thus the second Schedule enumerates offence in relation to foreign States other than treaty States or in relation to Commonwealth countries.[10]

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1973), Q. No. 11 (f); P.C.S. (1974), Q. No. 10(d); P.C.S. (1981), Q. No. 9 (b); P.C.S. (1982), Q. No. 6(a); C.S.E. (1988), Q. 7 (a) ; UPPCS (2004) Q. 6 ; UPPCS (2006) Q. 8(c).

[1] Edward Collins International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 216.

 See also for P.C.S. (1972) Q. No. 4 ; P.C.S. (1968) Q. No. 3 ; C.S.E. (1992) Q. 6(b).

[2] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, p. 696; See also Oppenheim's International Law, Ninth Edition, Vol. I, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Longman Group U. K. Ltd. and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, pp. 948-949.

[3] J. G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (1989) p. 352.

[4] Oppenheim's International Law, note 2, p. 950.

[5] (1993) 280 U.S. 276.

[6] Edn., 4, Ss. 116 (a) to (d), pp. 186 to 189.

It may, therefore, be concluded that although there is no universal rule of customary international law imposing a general duty of States in respect of extradition and generally extradition is granted on the basis of a treaty, it would be wrong to say that there can be no extradition apart from a treaty. As remarked by the Supreme Court of India, "Extradition with foreign States is, except in exceptional cases, governed by treaties or arrangements made." [11]

Purpose of Extradition.—The purpose of extradition is to prevent criminals who flee from a jurisdiction to escape from punishment for a criminal offence they have been accused or convicted of. The objective of extradition is to prevent crimes and punish the persons accused or convicted of crimes. If a person commits some crime in a country and to escape punishment flees from that country to another country, then through the process of extradition, such a person is brought to the jurisdiction of that country where he had committed the crime and is tried and punished for the crime. If on account of some technicalities of law or lack of jurisdiction, the criminal cannot be punished, then through the process of extradition he can be punished by being brought to the country where the committed the crime. In the country where he committed the crime, it would be convenient to adduce the evidence against the accused.

Thus, the object of the process of extradition is to prevent and reduce the crimes in the International field. Thus the role of extradition is to prevent crimes and punish criminals. It is the interest of all countries to prevent crimes because, the country in which a person of criminal character resides, it is in the interest of such a country to ensure extradition of such a person.

Generally, extradition depends on bilateral treaty and the principle of reciprocity. But in the absence of a bilateral interest if a country request another country where the accused or fugitive resides for the time being, to extradite the fugitive, it is in the interest of security and law and order of such country to extradite the accused. Such a step not only enhances international cooperation but is also in accordance with the purposes of the United Nations.

---

[7] Section 5, of the Extradition Act, 1962 (34 of 1962).

[8] Section 8, ibid.

[9] See also Section 31, ibid.

[10] The Second Schedule enumerates offences of the Indian Penal Code (45 of 1860) and other offences. Such as culpable homicide (Sections 299 to 304); Attempt to murder (Section 307); kidnapping abduction, slavery and forced labour (Ss. 360 to 374), rape and unnatural offences, theft, extortion, robbery and dacoity (Ss. 378 to 402) ; cheating (Ss. 415 to 420) and damaging or destroying an aircraft in the air or attempting or conspiring to do so.

[11] The State of Madras v. C. G. Menon, A.I.R. 1954 S.C. 517 at p. 518.

From practical point of view also, it is desirable to extradite the person accused or convicted of a criminal offence because the country in whose jurisdiction the crime was committed, all the possible evidence are present and it is always practicable to try and punish the accused as compared to the country where he has fled away.

In view of the increasing crimes in the international field in recent years, the importance and prevalence of the extradition has increased. In recent years, the provisions relating to extradition find mention in international treaties. The universal recognition of human rights has enhanced the prevalence and importance of extradition. International cooperation is most essential in cases of extradition because there is hardly a country which has extradition treaty with all the other countries of the world.

European Convention on Extradition (1957)

European Convention on Extradition was adopted at Paris on 13th December, 1957. Under Article 1 of the convention, the contracting parties have undertaken to surrender to each other, subject to the provisions laid down in the convention, all persons against whom the competent authorities of the requesting party are proceeding for an offence or who are wanted by the said authorities for the carrying out of a sentence or detention order. The convention also lays down extraditable offences (Article 2), the principle of non-extradition for political offences (Article 3); Principle of non-extradition for military offences (Article 4). Contracting parties, right to refuse extradition of its own nationals etc.

The European Convention on Extradition (1957) entered into force on 18th April, 1964.

It may be noted that the European Convention on Extradition was amended by Additional Protocol to the European Convention. The Additional Protocol was concluded on 15th October, 1975. It came into force on 20th August, 1979. The European Convention on Extradition was further amended by Second Additional Protocol to the European Convention which was concluded on 17th March, 1978 and entered into force on 5th June, 1983.

It is suggested that since for the last two to three decades, number of international crimes especially acts of terrorism have witnessed a phenomenal increase, an Universal Convention on the lines of above mentioned European Convention is needed to curb the menace of terrorism

Distinction between 'expulsion' (under Foreigners Act, 1946) and Extradition

In Hans Muller of Nuremburg v. Superintendent, Presidency Jail, Calcutta and others,[12] the Supreme Court clarified the distinction between 'expulsion' and 'extradition'. The Supreme Court observed that the Foreigners Act confers the power to expel foreigners from India. It vests the Central Government with absolute and unfettered discretion and, as there is no provision fettering this discretion in the Constitution, an unrestricted right to expel remains. The law of extradition is quite different. Because of treaty obligations it confers a right on certain countries (not all) to ask the persons who are alleged to have committed certain specified offences on the territories; or who have already been convicted of those offences by their courts, be handed over to them in custody for prosecution or punishment. But despite that the Government of India is not bound to comply with the request and has an absolute and unfettered discretion to refuse.[13] The Extradition Act is really a special branch of the law of criminal procedure. It deals with criminals and those accused of certain crimes. The Foreigners Act is not directly concerned with criminals or crime though the fact that a foreigner has committed offences or is suspected of that may be a good ground for regarding him as undesirable. Therefore, under the Extradition Act warrants or summons must be issued ; there must be magisterial enquiry and when there is an arrest it is penal in character and this is most important distinction of all when the person to be extradited leaves India he does not leave the country as a free man. The police in India hands him over to the police of the requisitioning State and he remains in custody throughout. In the case of expulsion, no idea of punishment is involved, at any rate, in theory, and if a man is prepared to leave voluntarily he can ordinarily go as and when he pleases. But the right is not his under the Indian Law, the matter is left to the unfettered discretion of the Union Government.[14] Finally, the Supreme Court held that the Foreigners Act is not governed by the provisions of the Extradition Act. The two are distinct and neither impinges on the other. Even if there is a requisition and a good case for extradition, Government is not bound to accede to the request. It is given an unfettered right to refuse for section 3 (1) of the Extradition Act says, "the Central Government may, if thinks fit." Therefore, if it chooses not to comply with the request, the person against whom the request is made cannot insist that it should. The right is not his; and the fact that a request has been made does not fetter the discretion of Government to choose the less cumbrous procedure to the Foreigners Act when a foreigner is concerned.[15]

---

[12] A.I.R. 1955 S.C. 367.

[13] A.I.R. 1955 S.C. 367 at p. 374.

In the present case, the petitioner, Hans Muller, who was not a citizen of India and was said to be a West German subject, was arrested by Calcutta Police on 18-9-1954 and was placed under preventive detention "with a view to making arrangement for his expulsion from India." On 9-10-1954, the West German Government wrote to the West Bengal Government saying that a warrant of arrest was issued against the petitioner in West Germany in connection with a number of frauds and that legal proceedings in connection with those warrants were still pending. The West German consul told the Government of West Bengal that his government would apply for extradition of the petitioner and requested that in the meantime the petitioner be detained up to the date of his extradition to Germany. The Government of West Bengal accepted the request. But the order to deport the petitioner could be passed by the Central Government only. No such order having been made by the Central Government up till the 20th of October, 1954, the petitioner applied to the High Court of Calcutta for a writ in the nature of habeas corpus, under Section 491, Cr. P.C. The High Court dismissed the petition on 10-12-1954. The petitioner thereupon preferred the present petition on the basis of the above observations (and on other grounds also) but the Supreme court dismissed the petition.

Essential conditions of granting extradition or restrictions on surrender*.—As pointed out earlier, under International Law extradition mostly depends on treaties among the States. However, the courts have also established certain principles and rules in regard to law of extradition. In other words, we may say that following are some restrictions on surrender of fugitive criminals or essential conditions for extradition :

(1) Non-extradition of Political Criminal.—It is a very important principle of International Law that extradition for political crimes is not allowed. "Most States refuse to commit themselves to extradite...any person charged with 'political crimes' that is to say crime committed for political purposes or crimes that are politically motivated. The difficulty of applying political exception is obviously a problem that regularly plagues the courts." [16] The practice of non-extradition for political crimes began with the French Revolution of 1789. Later on other States also subscribed to this view. In the present period, almost all the States subscribe to this view although many difficulties arise in the enforcement of this principle. The most difficult problem is of the definition of the term

---

[14] Hans Muller of Nuremburg v. Superintendent, Presidency Jail, Calcutta , AIR 1955 SC 367 at p. 375.

[15] Ibid, at pp. 375-376.

* See also for C.S.E. (1992) Q. 6(b) ; P.C.S. (1995) Q. 6(a).

 See also for P.C.S. (1970), Q. No. 2(b) ; P.C.S. (1982), Q. 6(a) ; P.C.S. (1984), Q. No. 4 ; C.S.E. (1993) Q. 7(b).

[16] Edward Collins International law in a Changing World (1969), p. 216. See also Sections 29 and 31 (a) of the Extradition Act, 1962 referred earlier.

'political crimes'.[17] "Although the principle is now widely accepted that political criminals should not be extradited, there is probably no rule of customary international law which prevents their extradition. However, serious difficulties exist concerning the concept of 'political crimes'." [18] Many attempts have been made to define the term 'political crime', but success has so far eluded.

"A crime is sometimes considered 'political' if committed from a political motive or if committed both from a political motive and for a political purpose or the term 'political crime' may be confined to certain offences against the State only, such as high treason, lese majeste and the like. So far all attempts to formulate a satisfactory and generally agreed definition of the term have failed." [19]

Further, "Since a political offence will usually be at the same time an ordinary crime such as murder, arson, theft and the like, the practical difficulty in any particular case is to determine whether the alleged political element is sufficient to give the ordinary crime a sufficient political colour to ensure to the perpetrator protection from extradition. This balance is, in the first place, to be struck by the State from which extradition is requested, in applying its laws to non-extradition of political offender." [20]

Reference may be made here to Re Castioni,[21] which is a leading case on non-extradition of political crimes. In this case the Swiss Government requested for the extradition of Castioni who was charged with murdering a member of the State Council of the Canton of Ticinio. Political dissatisfaction was prevailing in the said Canton for some time. An armed crowd including Castioni attacked the Municipal Palace and killed a member of the State Council. There was evidence that the shot was fired by Castioni. The Queen's Bench of England held that Castioni was guilty of a political crime and therefore he could not be extradited. Another important case on the point is Re Meunier.[22] In this case, the accused was an anarchist and was charged with causing two explosions in a Paris Cafe and two barracks. After committing the offence, he fled to England. France demanded his extradition. The accused contended that the nature of his crime was political and therefore he could not be extradited. The Court held that for an offence to be political, it is necessary that there should be two or more than two parties in the State, each wanting to establish its Government in the State. If an offence is committed with this objective, it will be called a political offence. In the present case, the offence committed was not a political offence.

Because of different political systems and ideologies, this rule is not likely to be forsaken.[23] Oppenheim has also pointed out, "Up to the present day all attempts to formulate a satisfactory conception of the term have failed, and the reason of the thing will probably, for ever exclude the possibility of finding a satisfactory definition." He further points out that with a view to deal with complex crimes without violating this principle, following three practical attempts have been made.

(i) The Attentat clause.—The so-called Belgian Attentat clause was enacted by Belgium in 1856 after the case of Jacquin in 1854. This case related to the attempt to murder the Emperor Nepolean III by Jacquin, a French manufacturer domiciled in Belgium, and a person named Celestin Jacquin who was a foreman in his factory by tryig to cause explosion on the railway line between Lilla and Calais. The extradition of the said two criminals was sought by France but the same was refused by the Belgian Court of Appeal which prohibited the extradition of political criminals. With a view to deal with such case the so-called Belgian Attentat clause was enacted. It provided that murder of the Head of a foreign Government, or of a member of his family, should not be considered a political crime. Britain and many other European States also adopted such attentat clause.

---

[17] Oppenheim, see supra note 2, at p. 707, He adds : ".........Whereas many writers consider a crime 'political' if committed from a political motive, others call 'political' any crime committed for a political purpose ; again others recognise such a crime only as 'political' as was committed both from a political motive and at the same time for a political purpose; and thirdly, some writers confine the term 'political crime' to certain offences against the State only, such as, high treason, lese majeste and the like."

[18] Oppenheim's International Law, note 2, p. 963.

[19] Ibid at p. 964.

[20] Ibid at pp. 964-965.

[21] (1891) 1 Q.B. 149.

[22] (1894) 2 Q.B. 415; For more recent case on extadition regarding the ground of 'political crimes' see Jimenez v. Aristeguieta, 311 F. 2d. 547 (1962); Sucha Singh's case, R. v. Governor of Brizton Prison, Ex parte Kolcynski, (1955) 1 Q. B. 540; R. v. Governor of Brizton Prison, Ex parte Shtraks, (1963) 1 Q.B. 55.

[23] Philip C. Jessup, "The present State of Transnational Law" in the Present State of International Law and other Essays (1973) p. 339 at p. 342.

(ii) The Russian Project of 1881.—In 1881, Emperor Alexander II was murdered. Influenced by the murder, in the same year (i.e., 1881) Russia invited other States to hold an international conference at Brussels to consider the proposal that murder or attempt to murder should not be considered as a political crime. But the Russian project failed to materialize because both Great Britain and France refused to participate in the proposed conference.

(iii) The Swiss Solution to the Problem in 1892.—In 1892, Switzerland enacted extradition law. Article 10 of the said law recognised the principle of non-extradition of political criminals. Article 10 also recognised that if the chief feature of the offence contained more aspect of an ordinary rather than a political crime, then political criminal would not be surrendered and decision as to whether such criminal could be extradited or not was left with the Bundesgericht, i.e.—the highest Swiss Judicial Court.

(2) Extradition is not allowed for military criminals also.

(3) Similarly, for religious crimes also persons are not extradited.

(4) *The Rule of Speciality.—An accused is extradited for a particular crime, and the country which gets back the criminal is entitled to prosecute that person only for the crime for which he was extradited. This is known as the rule of speciality. In U. S. v. Rauscher,[24] America got Rauscher extradited from Britain on the ground that he had fled to Britain after murdering a fellow servant in an American ship. In America, Rauscher was tried not for murder but for causing grievous hurt to a man named Janssen. The Supreme Court of the United States of America held that when a person is brought under the jurisdiction of the Court under the extradition treaty, he may be tried only for such offence for which his extradition was sought. The same law prevails in India.[25]

(5) Double criminality.—The crime for which extradition is claimed should be crime in both the countries (the country claiming the extradition and the country extraditing). This is called the rule of Double criminality.

(6) There should be sufficient evidence for crimes relating to extradition. In other words, the crime should be such that it should appear to be a crime prima facie.[26]

(7) For extradition it is also necessary that certain other prescribed formalities should be fulfilled.

(8) The conditions and the terms mentioned in the Extradition Treaty should be generally fulfilled. In this connection, a leading case is that of Savarkar (1911). Savarkar was an Indian revolutionary who was being brought to India

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1978) Q. 4(b).

[24] (1886) 119 U.S. 407.

 See also for P.C.S. (1971), Q. No. 10.

[25] See Section 31 (a) of the Extradition Act, 1962; contents of Section 31 (a) have been referred later on in this very Chapter under the heading "Restrictions on the Surrender of Fugitive Criminal."

 See also for I.A.S. (1978), Q. 4 (a).

[26] In the Tarashov Extradition case (1963), the accused was discharged by the court because no prima facie case was made out against him. The evidence adduced was inadequate to establish a prima facie case against the fugitive criminal. The Court observed that to constitute a prima facie case in extradition cases following requirements are essential : (a) the witness should be entitled to a reasonable degree of credit ; (b) the degree of proof should be higher than in ordinary criminal prosecutions ; and (c) the evidence must be incontrovertible leading to the probable and strong presumption of the offence against the accused. For the facts of this case see Appendix II; see also A.I.R. 1958 S.C. 98; (1962) 3 All E.R. at p. 455.

to be prosecuted on the ground of crimes which he was alleged to have committed. When the ship was in the port of Marcelese, Savarkar escaped, but later on he was apprehended by French police. But the Captain of the French ship returned Savarkar to the Captain of the British ship under the wrong impression that it was his duty to do so. Later on the Government of France requested the British Government to return Savarkar on the ground that the rules relating to his extradition were not strictly observed. This case was entrusted to the Permanent Court of Arbitration, Hague for its decision. The Court decided that International Law does not impose any obligation upon the State whereby on the above ground the criminal may be returned. That is to say, once a person is extradited, even though it was done in irregular way, the country receiving the fugitive or the criminal is not bound under international law to return the accused. This decision has been severely criticized by the jurists. In their view, it was not based on the sound principle of justice.

(9) When a person is charged with having been an accessory in a crime committed in a foreign State which seeks his extradition, it is not necessary that at the time of offence the said person must be present in the said foreign State. This was held in Rex v. Godfrey.[27] In this case Godfrey was a member of the firm which traded in England. The said firm obtained some goods in Switzerland on false assurances. At that time Godfrey was in England. On the request of Switzerland, the court ordered the extradition of Godfrey. The same view was taken by the Supreme Court of India in Mobarak Ali Ahmad v. State of Bombay.[28] In this case the Supreme Court held, "The fastening of criminal liability on a foreigner in respect of culpable acts or omissions in India which are judicially attributable to him notwithstanding that he is corporeally present outside India at that time, is not to give any extra-territorial operation to the law : for it is in respect of an offence whose locality is in India, that the liability is fastened on the person and punishment is awarded by the law, if his presence in India for the trial can be secured." In this case, Mobarak Ali Ahmad, who was undergoing trial for forgery and fraud in the Court of Sessions Judge at Bombay, fled to Pakistan and thereafter he went to England. The Government of India got him extradited under the Fugitive Offender's Act.[29] He was brought to Bombay to face the resumed Session trial. When he was in Bombay Jail a person filed a complaint against the accused for the offence of cheating. A warrant was issued by the Presidency Magistrate against the accused and he was brought before the Court to face trial. It was argued on behalf of the accused that he was a Pakistani national and was out of India during the period when the offence was alleged to have been committed. But this argument was rejected by the Supreme Court. The Court held that the Indian Courts would have jurisdiction over a case in which a person committed an offence although not being present in India at the time of the commission of the offence.[30]

---

27. (1923) 1 K.B. 24.
28. A.I.R. 1957 S.C. 857 at p. 868.
29. The Government of India v. Mobarak Ali Ahmad, (1952) 1 All E.R. 1060.
30. The Supreme Court observed : "...........once it (i.e., offence) is treated as committed within the State the facts that he is a foreigner corporeally present outside at the time of such commission is no objection to the exercise of municipal jurisdiction under the Municipal Law. This emphasises the principle that exercise of criminal jurisdiction depend on the locality of the offence and not on the nationality of the alleged offender (except in a few specified cases such as Ambassadors, Princes etc." (A.I.R. 1957 S.C. 857 at p. 869). Further, "We have, therefore, no doubt that on a reading of Sec. 2 of the Penal Code the Code does apply to a foreigner who has committed an offence within India notwithstanding that he was corporeally present outside." (Ibid, at p. 870]. The Court finally held : "...........even on the assumption that the appellant has ceased to be an Indian citizen and was a Pakistani national at the time of the commission of the offence, he must be held guilty and punished under the Indian Penal Code notwithstanding his not being corporeally present in India at the time." (Ibid. at p. 871).

(10) As pointed out earlier, extradition is generally a matter of bilateral treaty.* It has been held that there must be a 'formal treaty' not simply an agreement or notification. This was held by the First class Magistrate in new Delhi in the Tarashov Extradition case on 29-3-63.[31] The Court made this observation while interpreting Section 31 (c) of the Extradition Act, 1962. The Court discharged the accused on the ground no prima facie case was made out against the accused. The facts and decision in this case may be summarised as follows :

On 7th January, 1963, the Minister Counsellor of the Embassy of the U.S.S.R. in India made a requisition under section 4 of the Indian Extradition Act, 1962, requesting the Government of India to institute proceeding against V. S. Tarashov, a Soviet citizen who was alleged to have committed theft on high seas on 17-11-1962 on a board of a Soviet oil tanker "Tchernovci" in which he was employed as an Electrician and Mechanic. The fugitive criminal denied these allegations and stated that he had been arrested on 28th November 1962 on the complaint of the Soviet Vice-Consul in Calcutta implicating him with the said offence but the Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta had discharged him for want of evidence. He further contended that the Soviet Government had fabricated the said charge against him because he had sought political asylum from American Government. The Magistrate discharged the fugitive on the ground, inter alia, that the requirements of Section 31 (c) of the Act are not complied. Section 31 (c) of the Act required a formal treaty and not an agreement. The notification issued by the Government (extending the provisions to U.S.S.R.) could in no case be called a formal treaty.

(11) Generally States do not allow the extradition of their own citizens. In Regina v. Wilson,[32] it was observed that where the high contracting parties expressly provide that their own subject shall not be delivered up as in the case of treaty between England and Switzerland, the power to arrest does not exist. Thus what was observed by Cockburn, C.J., in that case was a "serious blot" on the British system of extradition and the Royal Commission on extradition of which he was the Chairman recommended in their report that "reciprocity in this matter should no longer be insisted upon whether the criminal be a British subject or not. If he has broken the laws of a foreign country his liability ought not to depend upon his nationality......The convenience of trying crimes in the country where they were committed is obvious. It is very much easier to transport the criminal to the place of offence than to carry all the witnesses and proofs to some other country where the trial is to be held." [33] Evidently, similar consideration led to the passing of the Extradition Act (1903) by the Indian Legislature providing for the surrender of criminals including Indian subjects for a variety of offences.[34] The Extradition Act, 1962 also provides for the surrender of criminals including Indian subjects.

Restrictions on Surrender under Indian Law.—Section 31 of the Extradition Act, 1962, provides certain restrictions on surrender of fugitive criminals. These restrictions are as follows :

(1) Offence of political character.—A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered or returned to a foreign State Commonwealth country if the offence in respect of which his surrender is sought is of a political character or if he proves to the satisfaction of the magistrate or court before whom he may be produced or of

---

* See also for P.C.S. (1976) Q. No. 5 ; For answer see also matter discussed under the heading "Is there a general duty in respect of Extradition ?"

[31] See I.J.I.L., Vol. 3 case No. 3 (July 1963), pp. 323-325 at p. 325.

 See also for P.C.S. (1972), Q. No. 4 (Problem).

[32] (1878) 3 Q.B.D. 42 : 37 L.T. 354.

[33] Wheaton, S. 120 (a), pp. 197, 198.

[34] Dr. Ram Babu Saxena v. The State, A.I.R. 1950 S.C. 155 at p. 157.

the Central Government that the requisition or warrant for his surrender has, in fact, been made with a view to try or punish him for an offence of a political character.[35]

(2) Prosecution for offence being barred by time.—A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered if prosecution for the offence in respect of which his surrender is sought is according to the law of that State or country barred by time.[36]

(3) Extradition treaty or provision by law of Foreign State that Fugitive Criminal shall not be tried or detained in that State for any offence committed prior to his surrender or return.—A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered or returned to a foreign State or Commonwealth country unless provision is made by the law of the foreign State or Commonwealth country or in the extradition arrangement with the Commonwealth country that the fugitive criminal shall not, until he has been restored or has had an opportunity of returning to India, be detained or tried in that State or country for any offence committed prior to his surrender or return other than the extradition offence proved by the facts of which his surrender or return is based.[37]

(4) If accused of some offence in India other than offence for which extradition is sought.—A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered or returned if he has been accused of some offence in India, not being the offence for which his surrender or return is sought or is undergoing sentence under any conviction in India until after he has been discharged, whether by acquittal or on expiration of his sentence or otherwise.[38]

(5) After expiration of 15 days after being committed to prison.—Lastly a fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered or returned until after the expiration of fifteen days from the date of his being committed to prison by the magistrate.[39]

Where prosecution on trial of person extradited is made for lesser offence under Section 365, I.P.C. although said offence was not mentioned in extradition decree, it was held that it was not illegal as extradition of accused was allowed for higher offence under Section 364-A, I.P.C. This was held by the Supreme Court in Suman Sood alias Kamal Jeet Kaur v. State of Rajasthan.[40]

Unfettered power or discretion of Central Government to discharge any fugitive criminal.—Despite the provisions of the Extradition Act, 1962, particularly section 3 and section 12,[41] The Central Government has unfettered powers or discretion to discharge any fugitive criminal. If it appears to the Central Government that by reason of the trivial nature of the case or by reason of the application for the surrender or return of a fugitive criminal not being made in good faith or in the interests of justice or for political reasons or otherwise it is unjust or inexpedient to surrender or return the fugitive criminal, it may, by order at any time stay any proceedings under this Act and direct any warrant issued or endorsed under this Act to be cancelled and the person for whose arrest the warrant has been issued or endorsed to be discharged.[42] It is further provided that notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in section 3 or section 12 the provisions of section 29 and 31 shall apply without any modification to every foreign State or Commonwealth country.[43]

---

[35] Section 31 (a) of the Extradition Act, 1962.

[36] Section 31 (b).

[37] Section 31 (c).

[38] Section 31 (d).

[39] Section 31 (e).

[40] AIR 2007 SC 2774.

[41] Section 3 provides that the Central Government may, by notified order, direct that the provisions of this Act other than Chapter III shall apply—(a) to such foreign State or part thereof or (b) to such Commonwealth country or part thereof to which Chapter III does not apply as may be specified in the order. Section 12 runs as follows : Chapter III shall apply only to any such Commonwealth country to which, by reason of an extradition arrangement entered into with that country it may seem expedient to the Central Government to apply the same. Further, every such application shall be by notified order, and the Central Government may, by the same or any subsequent notified order, direct that this Chapter and Chapters I, IV and V, shall in relation to any such Commonwealth country apply subject to such modifications, exceptions, conditions and qualifications as it may think fit to specify in the order for the purpose of implementing the arrangement.

Case relating to refusal to grant of extradition of two Burmese students

In November 1990, two Burmese students were persuaded to land at Calcutta airport. They had hijacked Thai International Airbus with 205 passengers and 16-member to highlight the cause of restoration of democracy in their country. Their six-point Charter of demands, written in blood, included restoration of democracy in Burma, ending military rule, release of all political prisoners and a direct dialogue with the Burmese Government. The Indian Government refused to hand them over to Burmese or Thai authorities. However, the Indian Government have charged them under Anti-Hijacking Act, 1982 and for criminal conspiracy.

Some Indian Cases on extradition

(1) Savarkar's case.—The facts and the decision of the Savarkar's case has been referred earlier while explaining the essential conditions of extradition.

(2) Ram Babu Saxena v. State[44].—This case deals with section 7 of Indian Extradition Act, 1903. Dr. Ram Babu Saxena was an employee under U. P. Civil Service and was deputed to the Tonk State. Tonk was an Indian State and it had an Extradition Treaty with the British Government according to which both States were bound to extradite certain persons who were accused of certain specified crimes. Dr. Ram Babu Saxena was later on living in the district of Nainital. It was contended that while serving in Tonk State, he committed crimes of Extortion under section 383 and cheating under section 420. Dr. Ram Babu Saxena argued in defence that British Government had an extradition treaty with the Tonk State and that treaty did not provide for crimes for which his extradition was being claimed. Hence he could not be extradited under section 7 of the Extradition Act, 1903. In this connection he made specific reference of section 18 of the Extradition Act, 1903, which provided that no extradition could be made against the provisions of the treaty. Since the treaty did not mention the specific crimes for which his extradition was sought, he contended that it will be beyond the jurisdiction of the court and whole proceedings were illegal. But the Supreme Court of India held that section 7 of Indian Extradition Act was rightly applied and he could be extradited. The Supreme Court held : "..............the Act does not derogate from any such treaty when it authorises the Indian Government to grant extradition for some additional offences, thereby enlarging, not curtailing, the power of the other party to claim surrender of criminals. Nor does the Act derogate in the true sense of the term from the position of an Indian subject under the treaty of 1869." [45] B. K. Mukherjee, J., observed : "When as a result of amalgamation or merger, a State loses its full and independent power of action over the subject-matter of a treaty previously concluded the treaty must necessarily lapse." [46] His Lordship concluded : "...........The Extradition Treaty between the Tonk State and the British Government in 1869 is not capable of being given effect to in the present day in view of the merger of the Tonk State in the United State of Rajasthan. As no treaty rights exist, Section 18 of Extradition Act has no application and as Section 7 of the Act has been complied with there is no ground upon which we can interfere." [47] Thus the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal.

(3) State of Madras v. C. G. Menon.[48]

---

[42] Section 29

[43] Section 32.

[44] A.I.R. 1950 S.C. 155.

[45] Ibid, at pp. 157-158.

[46] Ibid, at p. 163; see also Hyde on International Law, Vol. III, p. 1535.

[47] Ibid.

[48] A.I.R. 1954 S.C. 517.

N.B.—For the facts and decision of the case, please see Chapter on "Relationship between International Law and Municipal Law."

(4) Hans Muller of Nurenburg v. Supdt., Presidency Jail, Calcutta and others.[49] The facts and principles laid down in this case have been discussed in detail earlier in this Chapter under the heading "Distinction between "Expulsion" (under Foreigners Act, 1946) and "Extradition."

(5) Mobarak Ali Ahmad v. State of Bombay, 1957 [50].—The fact and principles laid down in this case have also been discussed earlier in this Chapter.

(6) The Tarasov Extradition case, 1963[51].—This case has been discussed earlier in this Chapter.

(7) Sucha Singh's case.—Sucha Singh was accused of murdering Pratap Singh Kairon, the former Chief Minister of Punjab and had fled away to Nepal and on the request of the Government of India, the Government of Nepal after starting proceedings against him in accordance with the law of Nepal, extradited him.

(8) Dharam Teja's case.—Dharam Teja, who was the Managing Director of Jayanti Shipping Corporation, committed embezzlement and bungling of crores of rupees and had fled away from India. He fled from one country to another to escape his arrest. When he was in Ivory Coast, the Government of India requested the Government of Ivory Coast to extradite Dharam Teja so that proceedings against him could be started in India. The Government of Ivory Coast refused to extradite Dharam Teja on the ground that there was no extradition treaty with India. Later on, when Dharam Teja was in London the Government of India came to know about his whereabouts and informed the British Government and requested it to apprehend Dharam Teja and to start proceedings of extradition against him. India has an Extradition Treaty with the Government of Britain under which both the countries are bound to extradite the accused of each other who run away after committing crimes in either country. Government of England accepted the request of India and proceedings were started against Dharam Teja in the court of law in England. The Court of law in England came to the conclusion that Dharam Teja could be extradited. Consequently, Dharam Teja was extradited to India. The Government of India started proceedings against him and Dharam Teja was convicted for having committed embezzlement and bungling of crores of rupees of Jayanti Shipping Corporation, while he was Managing Director of that Corporation.

(9) Naval Officer Extradition case (July, 1975).—Commander Elijah Ebrahim Jhirhad of Indian Navy was charged by the Government of India with misappropriating Rs. 13 lakhs of the Naval Prize Fund while he was functioning as the Judge Advocate-General of the Indian Navy in the early 1960. The matter was referred to the C.B.I. (i.e., Central Bureau of Investigation) in 1966. Jhirhad had the responsibility of administering Rs. 70 lakhs of the prize fund. An ex-sailor made a complaint that he had not received his share of the prize money. On enquiry the Naval Headquarters discovered that the fund was never subjected to audit and that Commander Jhirhad had destroyed all records. A charge-sheet was filed by C.B.I. against him in 1968. But Jhirhad could not be apprehended as he fled from the country along with his family. Since then the Indian authorities were trying to find out his whereabouts. The C.B.I. then got in touch with the Interpol which had arrested him in April 1972 in New York. Proceedings for his extradition were then launched but Commander Jhirhad went in appeal. In July 1975, the New York Judge passed the extradition orders after accepting the Indian Government pleas in this regard. Thus Commander Jhirhad has been extradited to India and will now face trial of the charge of misappropriation of Rs. 13 lakhs of the Naval Prize Fund.

(10) Narang Brothers Extradition Case (October 1976).—In October 1976, the Government of India successfully concluded extradition proceeding in London against Manohar Narang and his brother Om Prakash Narang who were wanted in India on charges

---

[49] A.I.R. 1955 S.C. 367.

[50] A.I.R. 1957 S.C. 867.

[51] Order of First Class Magistrate, (New Delhi) dated 29-3-1963.

of cheating, forgery and smuggling in connection with two stolen antique pillars known as Amin pillars in a village near Kurukshetra in Haryana. A London Magistrate held that there was a prima facie case for their trial and allowed the extradition application of the Government of India. Manoharlal Narang who was said to be financial adviser to the Liberian Embassy in Paris was arrested in May by the British Police for handling the stolen 2nd century B. C. Antique pillars valued at 250,000 pounds. The pillars were recovered from a local warehouse in London. The Magistrate rejected Manoharlal's plea for diplomatic immunity. On January 10, 1979, the Supreme Court of India dismissed an appeal filed by Narang brothers (Manu Narang and Omi Narang) questioning the legality of the warrants issued by a Delhi Court for their extradition from London in a case of breach of trust involving two antique pieces which were recovered from London. The Court also turned down a similar appeal by Ram Lal Narang, challenging the issue of process by a Delhi Magistrate requiring the three brothers to appear before him in the case which is pending for trial. The appeal filed by the Narang brothers was directed against the order of the Delhi High Court rejecting their applications for quashing the trial court orders. The Division Bench of the Supreme Court consisting of Mr. Justice N. L. Untwalia and Mr. Justice O. Chinnappa Reddy dismissed the two appeals and ruled that the investigating agency had not acted out of any malice nor did it commit any illegality in the investigations.[52]

S.A.A.R.C. Accord on Extradition

On 16th June, 1987, the Foreign Secretaries of South Asian Regional Countries entered into an agreement on extradition. The draft of the Agreement and recommendations were presented before the Standing Committee of Foreign Affairs Ministers. The Agreement provided for the extradition of persons accused of terrorist acts but not including acts of political nature. Later on a three-day Summit of South Asian Association of Regional Countries (SAARC), the Conference adopted a Convention on Terrorism on 4th November, 1987. The Convention was to be ratified within six months. The Convention provides for the extradition of person accused of terrorist acts. However, Article 11 of the Convention provides, that if the State concerned thinks that it is not proper and expedient to extradit the accused, there shall be no obligation to extradit. Similarly, there shall be no obligation to extradit if the matter is very ordinary and the request for extradition has not been made in good faith and is not in the interest of justice. But under the Convention it is the obligation of the member States to ensure the presence of the accused for prosecution under national laws. Under the Convention following six crimes shall not be considered as political crimes or crimes inspired by political motives :

(a) Crimes relating to aircraft hijacking under the Hague Convention of 16 December, 1970 on Hijacking ;

(b) Crimes relating to aircraft hijacking under the Montreal Convention of 23 September,1971 on Hijacking;

(c) Crimes under the Convention of 14 December, 1973 relating to Prevention and Punishment of crimes against Internationally Protected Persons;

(d) Crimes under any Convention of which SAARC States are parties and under which State parties are under obligation to prosecute or extradit the accused;

(e) Crimes relating to murder, assault ; making hostage etc. ; and

(f) Attempt to aid and advise the crimes etc., mentioned in (a) above.

The convention also provides that the Member States shall not consider political crimes the crimes concerning violence.

India—U.K. Pact on Extradition

In the first week of January, 1992 during his visit to India, British Home Secretary Kenneth Baker offered to sign an extradition treaty with India regarding extradition and confiscation of funds of terrorists and drug traffickers operating from Britain. This step is being taken to deter drug traffickings and terrorists in Punjab and Kashmir. The Treaty is subsequently signed. The treaty was ratified on 15th November, 1993. Earlier India had entered into in 1986 an extradition treaty with Canada. India is also making endeavours to enter into a similar treaty with the United States of America.

---

[52] The Times of India, 11 January, 1979.

Extradition Treaty between India and Canada.—Desiring to make more effective the cooperation of the two countries in the suppression of crime by making provision for the reciprocal extradition of offenders, and recognising that concrete steps are necessary to combat terrorism the Government of India and the Government of Canada signed an extradition treaty on the 6th of February, 1987. According to Article 1 of the treaty, each contracting state agrees to extradite to the other, subject to the conditions of this treaty any person who being accused or convicted of an extradition offence as described in Article 3, committed within the territory of one state, found in the territory of the other state, whether or not such offence was committed before or after the coming into force of this treaty.

According to Article 3 of the treaty, an extradition offence is committed when the conduct of the person whose extradition is sought constitutes an offence punishable by the laws of both contracting states by a term of imprisonment for a period of more than one year.

India, Hongkong Pact on Extradition.—Before Hongkong became a part of China, Hongkong and India entered into a treaty on extradition in the mididle of June 1997. Since China has announced that China will abide by international treaties signed during the British rule, it is hoped that China will abide by this treaty.

Indo-U.S. Treaty on Extradition.—India and America have been cooperating with each other for a long time for curbing extremism and terrorism. In several cases in past, America has cooperated with India in respect of extradition of criminal who after committing crime had fled away to that country. Recently America extradited Daya Singh Lahoria at the request of the Government of India. A couple of more extraditions are expected soon. On 25th June, 1997 India and America entered into a treaty on extradition. It is a modern treaty containing exhaustive provisions relating to new trends on extradition.

In accordance with Article 23 of the treaty, instruments of ratification were exchanged at New Delhi on 21st July, 1999. Thus the treaty came into force immediately because Article 23 provides that this treaty shall enter into force upon the exchanges of the instruments of ratification.

Article 1 of the treaty provides that the contracting states agree to extradite to each other, pursuant, to the provisions of this treaty, person who, by the authorities in the Requesting State are formally accused of, charged with or convicted of an extraditable offence, whether such offence was committed before or after the entry into force of the Treaty.

Article 2 of the Treaty states that an offence shall be an extraditable offence if it is punishable under the laws in both the contracting states by deprivation of liberty, including imprisonment, for a period of more than one year or by more severe penalty. Further, an offence shall also be an extraditable offence if it consists or an attempt or a conspiracy to commit, aiding, or abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of or being an accessory before or after the fact to, any offence described above.

Article 3 provides that extradition shall not be refused if on the ground that the person sought is a national of the requested state. But extradition shall not be granted for political offence (Article 4) and military offence (Article 5). Extradition shall also not be granted when the prosecution has become barred by lapse of time according to the laws of the Requesting time (Article 7).

In case of urgency, a contracting state may request the provisional arrest of the person sought pending presentation of the request for extradition. A request for provisional arrest may be transmitted through the diplomatic channel. The facilities of the International Criminal Police Organisation (Interpol) may be used to transmit such a request. (Article 12)

Article 17 of the Treaty incorporates the Rule of speciality. Article 17 provides :

1. A person extradited under this Treaty may not be detained, tried or punished in the Requesting State except for :—

(a) the offence for which extradition has been granted or a differently denominated offence based on the same facts on which extradition was granted provided such offence is extraditable or is a lesser included offence;

(b) an offence committed after the extradition of the person; or

(c) an offence for which the executive authority of Requested State consents to the person's detention, trial or punishment. For the purpose of this sub-paragraph :

(i) the Requested State may require the submission of the documents called for in Article 9; and

(ii) the person extradited may be detained by the Requesting State for 90 days or such longer period of time as the Requested State may authorize, while the request is being processed.

2. A person extradited under this treaty may not be extradited to a third state for an offence committed prior to his surrender unless the surrendering state consents.

3. Paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article shall not prevent the detention, trial or punishment of an extradited person, or the extradition of that person to a third state if;

(a) that person leaves the territory of the Requesting State after extradition and voluntarily returns to it; or

(b) that person does not leave the territory of the Requesting State within 15 days of the day on which the person is free to leave.

Last but not the least, Article 18 provides for 'Waiver of Extradition'. According to it if the person sought consents to surrender to the Requesting State, the Requested State may, subject to its laws, surrender the person as expeditiously as possible without further proceedings.

Extradition Treaty Between India and Germany.—With a view to combat crime, India and Germany signed an extradition treaty at Berlin on 27th June, 2001. The treaty will enable the two countries to extradite a person wanted in "extraditable offences." Under the treaty extraditable offences are the offences which are punishable under the laws of both the States and are punishable by a term of imprisonment of not less than one year. Extradition shall also be granted in respect of an attempt or conspiracy to commit, or aiding, abetting, inciting or participating as an accomplice in the commission of an extraditable offence.

Case of Extradition of Famous Music Director, Nadeem

Famous Music Director, Saifi Nadeem Akhtar, popularly known as 'Nadeem' is accused of in the murder of music baron Gulshan Kumar. Before the police in India could arrest him, he fled to England. The Government of India has sought his extradition. India and Britain had signed an extradition treaty in 1992. This treaty came into effect from 15th November, 1993 after having been ratified by the Parliaments of both countries. The Mumbai Police has tiled the chargesheet of the case in the British Crown Prosecution Office which would outline the details of the extradition case before the Bow Streets Court. Mere submission of chargesheet or arrest warrant is not sufficient. The Mumbai Police will have to provide sufficient corroborating evidence of Nadeem's involvement for extradition to take place that is to say, it will have to be established that Nadeem was prima facie involved in the murder of Gulshan Kumar. Taking advantage of the complex British process for extradition Nadeem is getting the decision in the case delayed. However it is clear that by refusing to go back to India voluntarily, Nadeem has probably lost the chance of returning to India. Even if he is successful in blocking the extradition, he may have to seek political asylum in Britain or shift to a third country.

Case of Extradition of Pinto

London based Brazilian business man A.E. Pinto is accused of having played the middleman between the Turkish firm Karsan and Indian agent Sumbasiva Rao in Urea

Scam. Pinto has been under arrest in London for more than a year pending his extradition as the Indian Government has sought his extradition. The CBI filed the charges against Pinto alleging that the National Fertilizers (NFL) Executive Director (Marketing) D. S. Danwar unauthorisedly signed the contract for the supply of urea with Karsan on behalf of NFL in July, 1995 and Tuncay Alankus was the signatory from the Karsan side. But the deal could not materialise and Karsan accused the NFL of failing to issue the "block find papers" . Subsequent to the fiasco of the first deal, another contract was signed between NFL and Karsan on October, 1995.

The entire amount of 38 million dollars was paid in advance but not a single grain of urea was received till the last date of fulfilling the contract immediately after the said expiry date, CBI registered the case and accused Pinto of having received 1.2 million dollars out of 38 million dollars remitted to Karsan. The CBI also claims to have recovered several incriminating documents from Pinto's residence in London during the raids conducted there. Besides Pinto, Karsan executives Tuncay Alankus and Cihan Karance and some former NFL officials are also facing prosecution.

The Bow Street Magistrate has already issued the order allowing the CBI plea for Pinto's extradition to India. Pinto's appeal against the said order of the Magistrate has also been rejected. Pinto has filed a revision petition against the order. According to legal experts his extradition is only a matter of time.

Extradition Treaty Between India and Russia

India and Russia also signed an extradition treaty. This treaty was approved and ratified by Russia on 15th April, 2000.

Extradition Treaty Between India and Spain

India and Spain have also signed an extradition treaty. It was signed in June, 2002.

Extradition Treaty Between India and France

India and France signed an extradition treaty on 24th January, 2003. Prior to the signing of the treaty France had apprehensions that the terrorists or criminals to be extradited to India might get death penalty. India removed such apprehensions by giving an undertaking that terrorists extradited to India would not be given death penalty. The treaty was signed by Deputy Prime Minister L.K. Advani on behalf of India and Dominique Perben, Minister for Justice of France, on behalf of France.

Extradition Treaty Between India and Bulgaria

India and Bulgaria signed an extradition treaty on 23rd October, 2002. This treaty aims to ensure that terrorists are not able to seek sanctuary abroad.

Thus India has so far signed extradition treaties with twenty-five countries.

Case Relating to Extradition of Quattroechi

Quattroechi, a man of Italian origin, is accused of Bofors' Commission Bribery case. Presently he is living in Malaysia. India made a formal request to Malaysia to extradite Quattroechi so that he could be tried in India. The lower Court of Malaysia rejected the request for extradition and set Quattroechi free. He had been on bail since his arrest in September 2000. India filed an appeal against this order in the High Court there. India sent an advocate to argue the case and sought the permission of Attorney-General there for the appearance of the advocate on behalf of India. But the High Court did not allow the Indian advocate to appear.

The problem of extradition of Quattroechi became difficult because India had no extradition treaty with Malaysia.

Extradition of Abu Salem.—Abu Salem was one of the most wanted accused persons in Mumbai Blasts of 1993. He was living in Portugal and the Government of India sought his extradition. After long drawn legal battle in Portugal, the Supreme Court of Portugal ruled in the last week of January, 2005 that Salem could be extradited to India for the trial in major offences. Thus Abu Salem was extradited to India and is facing trial in India. His wife, Monica Bedi, was also extradited to India and was facing trial. Subsequently, however, no charges were proved and she was released. Recently Abu Salem has been convicted and sentenced for life term. He could not be sentenced to death because of the terms of extradition between Portugal and India.

Case of Mallya's Extradition :

N.B.—For this please see Appendix II.

CHAPTER 23

ASYLUM*

Meaning and Definition.—By asylum we mean shelter and active protection extended to a political refugee from another State by a State which admits him on his request. Asylum involves following two elements—(1) a shelter which is more than a temporary refuge; and (2) a degree of active protection on the part of the authorities which have control over the territory of asylum.[1] The institute of International Law has defined asylum as "the protection which a State grants on its territory or in some of her place under the control of certain of its organs to a person who comes to seek it."

Right to Asylum.—According to Article 14 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights : "Every one has a right to seek and enjoy in other countries asylum from prosecution." It may however, be noted that the Declaration simply recognises the right of asylum, it does not grant right to receive asylum. "The so-called right of asylum is probably nothing but the competence of every State to allow a prosecuted alien to enter and to remain on, its territory under its protection. Such fugitive alien enjoys the hospitality of the State which grants him asylum ; but it might be necessary to place him under surviellance, or even to intern him at some place to make his entry subject to condition. For it is the duty of every State to prevent individuals living on its territory from endangering the safety of another State by organising hostile expeditions or by preparing common crimes against its Head, members of its Government or its property." [2]

In 1967, United Nations Declaration on Territorial Asylum was unanimously adopted by the General Assembly. Among its most important provisions, it called on Governments to refrain from measures such as rejection at the frontier of persons seeking asylum. Being a declaration, it lacked binding force, and it was considered necessary to strengthen the legal basis for granting asylum by means of a convention. With this aim in view the United Nations Conference of Plenipotentiaries on Territorial Asylum was held in Geneva from 10th January to 4th February, 1977. It recommended in its report that the General Assembly in 1977 consider reconvening a further session of the Conference at the appropriate time. The draft text, which was before the conference prepared by the legal experts also intended to reinforce to some extent Article 14 of the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights but makes no mention of any obligation by States to grant asylum.[3] Thus although every one has a right to seek asylum yet there is no corresponding duty of States to grant asylum. "The only international legal right involved is that of the State of refuge itself to grant asylum." [4]

Types of Asylum and distinction between Territorial and Extra-territorial Asylum or Diplomatic Asylum*.—Asylum may be classified into two categories (1) Territorial and (2) Extra-territorial. In the Asylum Case (Colombia v. Perus)[5] the International Court of Justice explained the distinction between territorial asylum and diplomatic asylum in the following words : "In the case of extradition (territorial-asylum), the refugee is within the territory of the State of refuge. A decision with regard to extradition implies only the normal exercise of territorial sovereignty. The refugee is outside the territory of the State where the offence was committed, and a decision to grant him asylum in no way derogates from the sovereignty of that State. In the case of diplomatic asylum the refugee is within the territory of the State where the offence was committed. A decision to grant diplomatic asylum involves a derogation from the sovereignty of that State. It withdraws the offender from the jurisdiction of the territorial State and constitutes an intervention in matters which are exclusively within the competence of that State. Such a derogation from territorial sovereignty cannot be recognised unless its legal basis is established in such particular case." "The differences between the principles applying to the two kinds of asylum flow from the fact that the power to grant territorial asylum is an incident of territorial sovereignty itself, whereas the granting of extra-territorial asylum is rather a derogation from the sovereignty of the territorial State in so far that State is required to acquiesce in fugitives from its authorities enjoying protection from apprehension." Further each State "has a plenary right to grant territorial asylum unless it has accepted some particular restriction in this regard, while the right to grant extra-territorial asylum is exceptional and must be established in each case." [6]

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1974), Q. No. 3 (e); I.A.S. (1971), Q. No. 11 (e); I.AS. (1969), Q. No. 3; P.C.S. (1970), Q. No. 2 (e).

[1] J. G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (1989) p. 358.

 See also for C.S.E. (1982), Q. 5 (b) ; C.S.E. (1984), Q. 5 (d).

[2] Oppenheim's International Law, Vol. 1, Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Ninth Edition Longman Group UK Ltd. and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, p. 903.

[3] U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIV, No. 3 (March, 1977), p. 81.

[4] Starke's International Law, Eleventh Edition (1994), Edited by I.A. Shearer, p. 324.

 C.S.E. (1993) Q. 6(c).

[5] I.C.J. Reports (1950), p. 266.

Territorial Asylum.—Territorial asylum is granted by a State in its own territory and is considered as an attribute of the territorial sovereignty of the State. On 28th March, 1945, a Convention on Territorial Asylum was adopted at Caracas. Article 1 of the said Convention provided, "Every State has right in the exercise of its sovereignty, to admit into its territory such persons as it deems advisable without, through the exercise of the right, giving rise to complaint by any other State." Besides this, Article 1 of the Draft Declaration of Asylum as adopted by the United Nations Human Rights Commission, provided : "Asylum granted by a State in the exercise of its sovereignty, to persons entitled to invoke Article 14 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, shall be respected by all other States." Article 3 of the said Draft Declaration further provided, "No one seeking or enjoying asylum in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, should except for overriding reason of the population, be subjected to measures such as rejection at the frontier, return or expulsion which would result in compelling him to return to or remain in a territory if there is well founded fear of prosecution endangering his life, physical integrity or liberty in that territory......". Articles 31, 32 and 33 of the Refugee Convention of 1951 have incorporated the above principle.

In its resolution of 14th December, 1967 the General Assembly of the United Nations recommended that in practice the States should do the following :—

(a) When a person requests for asylum, his request should not be rejected or if he enters the territory of such State, he should not be expelled but when a large number of people request for asylum, it may be rejected on the basis of the national security of its own people.

(b) If any State feels difficulty in granting asylum, it should consider the appropriate measures with the feeling of international unity through the medium of individual States or the United Nations.

(c) When a State grants asylum to the fugitives, other States should respect it.

A State is free to grant asylum to the people of other States but this freedom can be restricted or regulated through treaties.

Reference to be made here to the United Nations Conference of Plenipotentiaries on Territorial Asylum which was held at Geneva from 10th January to 4th February, 1977. The Conference, which was attended by 92 countries, held its session in accordance with General Assembly Resolution 3456 (XXX) of 9th December, 1975 for the purpose of considering and adopting a Convention on Territorial Asylum. However, it did not reach a consensus on the matter. The Conference recommended for holding one more session at the appropriate time. The conference was the culmination of more than five years of preparatory work. In April 1971, a group of independent legal experts meeting in Bellgio, Italy, under the auspices of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, in consultation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, began to draw up a draft convention on Territorial Asylum and concluded its work in Geneva in January of 1972.[7]

---

[6] Starke, see supra note 1, p. 358.

The International Protection of Refugees*.—The instruments for the international protection of refugees are the 1951 U. N. Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol. The Convention on the Status of Refugees, 1951 entered into force on April 22, 1954. So far the convention has been signed and ratified by 147 countries. It may be noted that India is not a party to this convention. Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees entered into force on October 4, 1967. So far 147 States have ratified this protocol. Besides these, there is U. N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) established on 1 January, 1961 to give legal protection to the refugees and to provide them material assistance. The convention is based on two principles—(i) non-discrimination, as far as possible between nationals and refugees; and (ii) no discrimination based on race, religion or country or origin amongst refugees. It may be noted here that Article 31 of the 1951 U.N. Refugee Convention exempts refugees directly from a country of prosecution from punishment on account of their illegal entry or presence provided they present themselves without delay to the authorities and show good cause for their illegal entry or presence. Further the contracting states parties shall not apply to the movements of such refugees restrictions other than those which are necessary and that any restrictions shall only be applied until their status is regularized or they obtain admission into another country. According to Article 2 of the Convention refugees should respect the laws and regulations of their host country and refrain from activities which are inconsistent with their refugees status. Reference may also be made to the principle of non-refoulement incorporated in the Convention. This principle is fundamental to the entire structure of international action in favour of refugees. The observance of this principle is closely related to the determination of refugee status. The corollary to the principle of non-refoulement is that the repatriation of refugees must be voluntary.

As of 11 June, 2013, the convention Ralating to Status of Refugees has been signed and ratified by 147 countries.

It may be noted that until 1967, the Convention applied to persons who had become refugees before January 1, 1951. Under its Protocol adopted in 1967 which came into force on October 4, 1967, new groups of refugees are afforded the same protection. The 1967 Protocol which has widened the scope defines a refugee as someone who is outside his or her former house owing to a well-founded fear of persecution "because of reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion". So far the Protocol has been signed and ratified by 147 countries as of 11 June, 2013.

In its note on International Protection of Refugees,[8] the U. N. High Commission on Refugees highlighted the problems faced by refugees. There are problems in regard to admission of refugees and to the standards of treatment accorded to them. States have a tendency to view asylum and the refugee concept in a restrictive manner and to resort to measures of "deterrence" including unjustified detention of refugees, sometimes under harsh conditions. In addition, there is intractable problem of violations of the physical safety of refugees through armed attacks on refugee camps and settlements, forced conscription, piracy attacks on the failure of passing ships to rescue asylum-seekers in distress on high seas.

A UNHCR Panel in Geneva on, 11 April, 1984 expressed concern about 'xenophobic attitudes' towards refugees and appealed to the public, the media and Governments to combat xenophobic trends and to treat refugees according to recognized humanitarian standards.[9] Last but not the least, since 1985, UNHCR has launched the U. N. Campaign to break down mounting barriers erected against the tide of refugees worldwide and to treat refugees as assets.

---

[7] See supra note 3.

* See also for C.S.E. (1991) Q. 7(a).

[8] See U. N. Doc. A/AC. 96/643, 9 August, 1984.

[9] U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXI No. 4 of 1984, p. 54.

The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) protects and supports refugees at the request of a government or U.N. and assists in their return or resettlement. The UNHCR was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for 1954 and 1981. This Agency is mandated to coordinate international action to protect refugees and resolve their problem worldwide, it strives to ensure that everyone can exercise the right to seek asylum and find refuge in another State with the option to return home voluntarily, integrate locally or to resettle in a third country. As of 2004, the agency has rendered help to an estimated 50 million peoples to restart their lives. UNHCR has a staff of about 5000 people in more than 120 countries to help 20 million people.

Rudd Lubbere became High Commissioner on January 1, 2001 replacing Sadako Oqata (1999—2000). But Rudd Lubbere was accused of sexual harassment. He had to resign from his office which was trying to shore up its image, following series of scandals. He had to resign two days after he had assured that he would complete his full term.

Example of Dalai Lama and his Tibetan Followers.—Being oppressed from the repressive policies of China, Dalai Lama and some of his followers fled away from Tibet and sought political refuge in India. India granted asylum to Dalai Lama and his followers. It was an indication of territorial sovereignty of India. China made a great hue and cry over it and alleged that India was interfering in the internal affairs of China. But as a matter of fact and in accordance with the principles of territorial asylum, India as a sovereign State, was within her right to grant asylum to Dalai Lama and his followers. "A State being at liberty to do whatever it chooses within its own territory, without reference to the wishes of other States, so long as its acts are not directly injurious to them, it has the right of receiving and giving hospitality of asylum to emigrants or refugees, whether or not the former have violated the laws of their country in leaving it and whether the latter are accused of political or of ordinary crimes."[10] Since then Dalai Lama has been living in India and this is one of the points of irritation between India and China.

Example of the Influx of Refugees from Bangladesh*.—The repressive policies and genocide committed by the military regime of General Yahya Khan forced millions of refugees to seek political refuge in India. India not only liberally granted political refuge to these oppressed people but also fed them and set the example of providing hospitality which is unprecedented in the annals of the world. It was in keeping with Articles 1 and 3 of the Draft Declaration on Asylum adopted by Human Rights Commission as referred earlier. Moreover, it was in accordance with Articles 31, 32 and 33 of the Refugee Convention of 1951. If India had not granted refuge to the said refugees, their return or expulsion would have resulted in compelling them "to return to or remain in a territory where there was well-founded fear of prosecution endangering their lives or physical integrity." Thus the action of India in granting political refuge to millions of Bangalee refugees from erstwhile East Pakistan (now Bangladesh) was not only commendable on moral grounds but also in keeping with the norms and principles of International Law. India's action was also in accordance with Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948. Article 14 (1) of the Declaration provides that everyone has the right to seek and enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution. Article 14 (2) further provides that this right may not be invoked in the case of prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations. Obviously in case influx of refugees from Bangladesh, Article 14 (2) does not apply. The influx of refugees from Bangladesh was due to political crimes and the refugees concerned were not guilty of violating the purposes and principles of the United Nations, rather, the Military Regime of Pakistan was guilty of violating the purposes and principles of United Nations.

Extra-territorial or Diplomatic Asylum.—Extra-territorial asylum is granted by the State outside its territory, e.g., its embassy or public vessels. Extra-territorial asylum may be classified and discussed under the following heads :—

---

[10] Hall, International Law, Eighth Edition, p. 749.

* See also for I.A.S. (1972), Q. No. 7.

 See also for P.C.S. (1975), Q. No. 2(d), P.C.S. (1977), Q. 5 ; UPPCS (2002) Q. 6(a) ; UPPCS (2003) Q. 8(c).

(a) Asylum in Foreign Embassies.—International Law does not recognise a general right of a head of mission to grant asylum in the premises of the legation for the obvious reason that such a step would prevent territorial law taking its own course and would involve a derogation from the sovereignty of that State where the legislation or mission is situated. In the Asylum case the International Court of Justice observed, "A decision to grant diplomatic asylum involves a derogation from the sovereignty of that State. It withdraws the offender from the jurisdiction of the territorial State and constitutes an intervention in matters which are exclusively with in the competence of that State. Such a derogation from territorial sovereignty cannot be recognised unless its legal basis is established in each particular case." The facts of the Asylum (Colombia v. Peru)[11] case are as follows :

A political leader named Victor Raul Haya Dela Torre was accused of having instigated a military rebellion. He was a Peruvian national and was granted asylum in the Colombian Embassy at Lima on 3 January 1949. The granting of the said asylum was a subject of a dispute between Peru and Colombia. Both the parties agreed to refer the case to the International Court of Justice. According to the Pan-American Havana Convention on Asylum (1928), subject to certain conditions, asylum could be granted in a foreign embassy to a political offender who was a national of the territorial State. The question in dispute was whether Colombia, as the State granting the asylum, was entitled unilaterally to "qualify" the offence committed by the refugee in a manner binding on the territorial State that is to decide whether it was a political offence or a common crime. The Court was also asked to decide whether the territorial State was bound to afford the necessary guarantee to enable the refugee to leave the country in safety. In its judgment of 20 November 1950, the Court answered both these questions in the negative, but at the same time specified that Peru had not proved that Haya de la Torre was a common criminal. Lastly, the Court found in favour of a counter claim submitted by Peru that Haya de la Torre had been granted asylum in violation of the Havana Convention. On the day on which the Court delivered this judgment, Colombia filed a request for interpretation, seeking a reply to the question whether the judgment implied an obligation to surrender the refugee to the Peruvian authorities. In a judgment delivered on 27 November, 1950, the Court declared the request inadmissible.

Reference may also be made here to Haya Dela Torre case.[12] This case, a request to the above case, was instituted by Colombia by means of a fresh application.

Immediately after the judgment of 20 November, 1950, Peru had called upon Colombia to surrender Mr. Haya Dela Torre. Colombia refused to do so, maintaining that neither the applicable legal provisions nor the Court's judgment placed it under an obligation to surrender the refugee to the Peruvian authorities. This view was confirmed by the Court in its judgment of 13 June 1951. The Court, added that asylum to Haya Dela Torre had been irregularly granted because three months had passed after the suppression of the military rebellion which clearly showed that the urgency prescribed by Havana Convention as a condition for the regularity of asylum ceased to exist. But since Haya Dela Torre was a political offender, the Court held that despite the fact that asylum had been irregularly granted, Colombia was not bound to surrender Haya Dela Torre. The International Court of Justice held : "to infer......an obligation to surrender a person to whom asylum has been irregularly granted would be to disregard both the rule of the extra legal factors involved in the development of asylum in Latin America and the spirit of the Havana Convention."

The Court further added that although the Havana Convention expressly prescribed the surrender of common criminals to the local authorities, no obligation of the kind existed in respect to political offenders while confirming that asylum had been irregularly granted

---

 P.C.S. (1983) Q. 10 (b) : C.S.E. (1988) Q. 7 (a); P.C.S. (1990) Q. 8(b) ; UPPCS (2001) Q. 7(a) ; IAS (2005) Q. 6 (a).

[11] I.G.J. Reports (1950), p. 266.

[12] I.C.J. Reports (1951), p. 71.

and that on this ground Peru was entitled to demand its termination, the Court declared that Colombia was not bound to surrender the refugee. These two conclusions were not contradictory because there were other ways in which the asylum could be terminated besides the surrender of the refugee.

Under international law, a general right of States to grant asylum in foreign legations is not conceded. Asylum may be granted in legation premises in the three exceptional cases—(i) Asylum may be granted, for a temporary period, to individuals who are physically in the danger from mob violence or in case of a fugitive who is in danger because of political corruption in the local State; (ii) Asylum may also be granted where there is a well-established long recognised and binding local custom; and (iii) Asylum may also be granted if there is a special treaty between the territorial State and the State of the legation concerned.[13]

Illustration

A national of country X on a visit to India was given asylum in his embassy by the ambassador of country Y in India. He was secretly sent away by plane to country Y.*

As noted above, international law does not recognise a general right of States to grant asylum in foreign legations. Asylum may, however, be given under exceptional circumstances. In the present, none of the exceptions mentioned above applies. Therefore the conduct of ambassador of country Y in secretly sending the national of country X to country Y is not proper because it involves derogation of the sovereignty of India. India can make a diplomatic protest. But no other remedy is available to India. Y is under no obligation to return the national of country X to India.

(b) Asylum in Consular Premises.—The general principles relating to legation premises are also applicable to the grant of asylum in Consular premises.

(c) Asylum in the Premises of International Institutions.—International law does not recognise any rule regarding the grant of asylum in the premises of International Institutions. Temporary asylum may, however, be granted in case of danger of imminent violence. There is no general right to International Institutions "to grant asylum or even refuse asylum in their premises to offenders as against the territorial State, and semble not even a right of protection on humanitarian grounds. It is difficult to conceive, however, that a right to grant temporary refuge in an extreme case of danger from mob rule would not be asserted or conceded."[14]

(d) Asylum in War Ships.—Some writers are of the view that the individuals, not being the members of the crew, who board the vessel to take refuge after committing a crime on shore, cannot be arrested by the local authorities and removed from the vessel in case the commander of the ship refuses to hand over the fugitive. On the other hand some other writers have expressed the view that such fugitives should be handed over to the local police. Even such writers, however, concede that asylum may be granted only on humanitarian grounds in case where there is extreme danger to the life of the individuals seeking asylum. Asylum may also be granted to political offenders. In this connection, Fenwick has pertinently remarked : "While asylum is no longer granted to ordinary criminals, it is still granted quite frequently to political refugees."[15] Reference may also be made here of a Convention adopted at the Sixth International Conference of American States held at Havana in 1928 which forbids the grant of asylum on war ships to persons accused of or condemned for crime. The Convention, however, lays down certain conditions under which asylum may be granted to political offenders.

(e) Asylum in Merchant Vessels.—Merchant vessels do not enjoy immunity from the local jurisdiction and consequently asylum cannot be granted to local offenders in merchant vessels.

---

[13] Starke, see supra note 1, at p. 361.

* C.S.E. (1988), Q. 7(b).

[14] Ibid, at p. 391.

[15] Charles G. Fenwick, International Law (Third Indian Reprint, 1971), p. 387.

*Asylum and Extradition are Mutually Exclusive or Asylum stops, as it were, where Extradition begins.—As noted earlier, asylum is the protection which a State grants in its territory or in some of her place under control of certain of its organs to a person who comes to seek it. On the other hand, extradition is the surrender or delivery of the fugitive criminal to the State on whose territory he is alleged to have committed a crime, by the State on whose territory the alleged criminal happens to be. The institution of asylum confers right upon the State to bring the person concerned within its jurisdiction. In case of territorial asylum, the person is in the territory of the territorial State and hence under its jurisdiction. By granting asylum, it grants protection to the person concerned in its territory. In case of diplomatic asylum, the person is not under the jurisdiction of the State granting asylum and by granting asylum protection is granted to the person concerned and he is brought under the jurisdiction of the granting State. It, therefore, involves derogation from the sovereignty of the territorial State or through the institution of asylum the person concerned is withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the territorial State.

In both types of asylum, however, the ultimate purpose is to accord protection to the refugee or person concerned and to bring him under the jurisdiction of the granting State. The institution of extradition does just the reverse. In case of extradition the fugitive criminal is in the territory and under the jurisdiction of the territorial State and either under an extradition treaty (or arrangement) or otherwise, it surrenders or returns the fugitive criminal to the State where he is alleged to have committed the crime. Thus the fugitive criminal which is under the jurisdiction of the territorial State is transferred to the jurisdiction of the State where he is alleged to have committed the crime. Thus asylum and extradition are mutually exclusive. Once the territorial State decides to extradite the fugitive criminal, the question of asylum does not at all arise, that is to say, asylum stops where extradition begins. On the other hand once the State concerned decides to grant asylum to a person the question of his extradition at least for the time being does not at all arise. But after a State has granted asylum to a refugee or fugitive criminal it may subsequently decide to extradite him at the request of the State where he is alleged to have committed the crime or to which State he belongs.

To conclude in the words of Starke, "The liberty of a State to accord asylum to a person overlaps to a certain extent which is its liberty to refuse extradition or rendition of him at the request of some other State, an overlapping best seen in the grant, commonly, of asylum to political offenders, who correspondingly are not as a rule extraditable. Asylum stops, as it were, where extradition or rendition[16] begins and this interdependence makes it convenient to consider the two subjects together."

 See also for I.A.S. (1963), Q. No. 12 (a); P.C.S. (1967), Q. No. 9; for elaboration of the answer : see also matter discussed earlier under the heading "territorial asylum"; C.S.E. (1988), Q. 7 (a); C.S.E. (1988), Q. 7 (d); C.S.E. (1992) Q.6)b) ; P.C.S. (1994) Q. (a) ; P.C.S. (1995) Q. 6(a).

[16] Rendition has been defined by Starke as a more generic term covering "instances where an offender may be returned to a State to be tried there, under adhoc Special arrangement in the absence of an extradition treaty, or even if there be such a treaty between the States concerned and irrespective of whether or not the alleged offence is an extraditable crime. A deportation or refusal of asylum may have the effect of a rendition although from the point of view of the deporting State or State of purported entry it is not of this mature stricto sensu."

CHAPTER 24

TREATMENT OF ALIENS*

Admission of Aliens—The reception or admission of aliens is a matter of discretion and every State is competent to exclude aliens from its territory. This discretion and competency flow from the territorial supremacy of every Sate over its territory.[1] The International Law does not impose any duty upon States to admit aliens[2]. "The absence of any duty at International Law to admit aliens is supported by an examination of State immigration laws, showing that scarcely any States freely admit aliens." [3] Similarly, in the absence of treaties providing the contrary, no State is under any obligation to refuse admission to aliens. On the contrary, as noted in earlier chapter, States are fully competent to grant asylum to the aliens in their territory. But no alien has right to receive asylum. It is the discretion of the State whether to grant or refuse the request of asylum. Although each State is fully competent and has discretion to exclude aliens, in practice States do not exercise this discretion to the fullest extent.[4] For example, States generally admit tourists, students, etc. A distinction is made between aliens who intend to visit the country for a temporary period and those who intend to settle down in the country. No alien is permitted to settle down in a country without its specific authorisation.

Position of Aliens after admission.—After being admitted into the territory of a State, the alien becomes subject to the laws of the State in the same way as citizens are. Since the alien is subject to laws of the admitting State, the "alien can only expect equality of treatment under the local law because he submits to local conditions with benefits and burdens and because to give the alien a special status would be contrary to the principles of territorial jurisdiction and equality." [5] The alien remains under the jurisdiction of the State in which he stays and is responsible to it for all the acts he commits on its territory. During his residence he owes allegiance to the State within the territory of which he resides.[6] He will also be responsible for illegal acts which he commits during the period when the territory concerned is temporarily occupied by the enemy.[7] The aliens who reside either permanently or for a long time may also be required to pay rates and taxes and may be compelled to serve in the local police and local fire-brigade for the purpose of maintaining public order and safety. But since the alien does not fall under the personal supremacy of the local State, he cannot be compelled to serve in its army, navy, or air force.

The standard of treatment of aliens, which is generally followed, is that they are to be treated in the same way as citizens are treated. There should be no discrimination between aliens and citizens. It does not, however, follow that if a State treats its own citizens badly, it can do the same with aliens. Therefore, there should be an international minimum standard. This view was supported by majority of States which participated in the Hague Codification Conference. Later on, this view was affirmed in the United Nations General Assembly Declaration on Permanent Sovereignty over Natural Resources

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1976), Q. No. 5 ; I.A.S. (1964), Q. No. 6; P.C.S. (1972), Q. No. 6 ; P.C.S. (1970), Q. No. 6 ; P.C.S. (1966), Q. No. 2 ; P.C.S. (1964), Q. No. 8 (a) and 9(e) : I.A.S. (1970), Q. No. 7 : P.C.S. (1987), Q. 3: C.S.E. (1991) Q. 6(a).

[1] L. Oppenheim, International Law, Vol. I, Eighth Edition, at pp. 675-676.

[2] See also Oppenheim's International Law, Ninth Edition, Vol. I., Edited by Sir Robert Jennings and Sir Arthur Watts, Longman Group UK Ltd. and Mrs. Tomoko Hudson, 1992, p. 897.

[3] J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (1989) p. 348.

[4] As remarked by Fenwick, "The right of total exclusion is, however, more theoretical than real". International Law (Third Indian Reprint, 1971), p. 319.

[5] Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law, Second Edition (1973) p. 509.

[6] Oppenheim, see supra note 1, at p. 679-680.

[7] See De Haber v. The Attorney-General for Natal, (1907) A.C. 326.

(1962).[8] It was also recommended by many tribunals and claims commissions. For example in the Neer Claims[9] the General Claims Commissions set up by America and Mexico observed : "......... the treatment of an alien, in order to constitute an international delinquency should amount to an outrage, to bad faith, to wilful neglect of duty, or to an insufficiency of governmental action so far short of international standards that every reasonable and impartial man would readily recognize its insufficiency."

As pointed out by author,[10] "It is universally agreed that the jurisdiction of States is limited to the extent that International Law protects aliens and alien property situated within their territory.[11] Whenever treatment of an alien constitutes a violation of international customary or treaty law, the State of which the injured alien is a national has a legal right to make a diplomatic protest against, and submit a claim for damages to, the State responsible for the wrong which in turn has legal duty to make reparation. International Law does not require a State to take up the claim of its national and it does not allow a State to take up the claim unless the injured alien is its national.[12] A State incurs international responsibility for an injury suffered by an alien only if some fault of commission or omission can be attributed to its own officials ; if, for example, State officials fail to exercise reasonable diligence to protect an alien from a harmful action by private persons or if they fail to take remedial steps after such an action, the State may be held responsible by the home State of the alien." [13] Further, "What are the international rights of aliens, the deprivation of which constitutes a delict for which the alien's home State has a right to demand reparation ? It is with regard to the content of these rights, not their existence or the processes by which they are protected, that international controversy has often erupted. It is agreed that each State may determine for itself whether or not to admit aliens into its territory and that once admitted, aliens must obey local laws. It is also agreed that certain rights and privileges that are possessed by nationals, such as, the franchise may be denied to aliens. But International Law requires that in matters of fundamental importance to the individual, such as the right to life and personal liberty—a State must treat aliens at least as well as it treats its own nationals. If a State imprisons its own nationals only after a jury trial, for example, it must accord aliens the same right.[14] But as pointed out earlier many States (mostly western States) contend and claim that International law requires that States treat aliens in accordance with an 'international standard' or an international minimum standard of justice, regardless of how they treat their own nationals.

Protective Jurisdiction of a State over Foreigners :

N.B. :—For a discussion of this please see Chapter on "State Jurisdiction".

'Exhaustion of Local Remedies' Rule*·—As noted above, whenever treatment of aliens constitutes violation of international customary or treaty law or otherwise damages or injury is caused to the person or property of the alien, the alien can approach his home State and the State of which the injured alien is a national has a legal right to make a diplomatic protest against or claim reparation, from the State responsible for the wrong or injury. But for a claim to be made at an international level it is a condition precedent that local remedies available to the alien in the territorial State must be exhausted first. This is popularly known as 'Exhaustion of Local Remedies' rule. Thus, "one of the anomalies in the law of international responsibility is the procedural requirement that before a State can espouse a claim at the international level for injury to her national all the remedies available according to the municipal law of the respondent State must have been exhausted."[15] "Domestic jurisdiction and non-exhaustion of local remedies have been two of the most frequently raised pleas in international litigation ; by means of the former, the respondent State attempts to impede consideration of a matter at international level on the ground that it falls essentially within its jurisdiction, by means of the latter, the respondent State objects to consideration of a matter at international level on the ground that local remedies have not been exhausted and international action is thereby only warranted after the State has had a chance to redress the alleged wrong within the frame-work of its own legal system."[16] Further, "although both pleas of domestic jurisdiction and exhaustion of local remedies are meant to safeguard State sovereignty, they differ from each other in that the former is a substantive bar precluding any action at international level, while the latter stresses the subsidiary character of international jurisdiction. The plea of domestic jurisdiction has been raised before judicial organs either as an automatic reservation to compulsory jurisdiction or as a preliminary objection of incompetence, both forms—particularly, the former—being open to criticism. But political organs have proved more suitable to deal with pleas of domestic jurisdiction, while objections of non exhaustion of local remedies have been more often lodged, with judicial (and arbitral) organs. In practice, paradoxically as it may at first seem, the local remedies rule, apparently the less ambitions of the two pleas, has proved to be a far more effective and successful device for rejecting international claims and safeguarding State sovereignty. By contrast States raising the objection of domestic jurisdiction have thereby failed so far to achieve the proposed goal and have not been able to its discussion at international level."[17]

---

[8] General Assembly Resolution 1803 (XVII), dated 14, December, 1962.

[9] (1926) R.I.A.A., IV, 60 ; emphasis supplied.

[10] Edward Collins, International Law in a Changing World (1969), p. 253.

[11] An alien is a person who is not a national of the State in which he is present, whether or not he is there permanently or temporarily. Alien property is the property in a State that is owned by non-nationals.

[12] ".........it is the bond between the State and individual which alone confers upon the State the right of diplomatic protection ...... " Panevezys— Soldertiskis Railway case (1939), Permanent Court of International Justice, Series A/B 76, p. 16.

[13] See also matter discussed under the heading 'State responsibility for the act of aliens' in the Chapter on 'State Responsibility'.

[14] Collins, see supra note 10 at p. 253.

* See also for I.A.S. (1977) Q. No. 10(b), P.C.S. (1987), Q. 3.

The application of the rule is subject to following conditions[18] :—

(1) The exhaustion of local remedies should involve using such local procedures as are available to protect interests which correspond as closely as may be and in practical terms with the interests involved in a subsequent international claim.

(2) The rule only applies when effective remedies are available in the national system.

(3) Remedy available will not be deemed to be effective if the local courts do not have jurisdiction in relation to the matter in issue in terms of local law.

(4) It is sometimes said that the rule does not apply when the issue arises from measures taken by the constitutional or legislative power or the highest executive organs. But this view is too dogmatic and the real test is whether or not there is responsible possibility of an effective remedy.

(5) Last but not the least, the rule applies only in connection with State responsibility for an unlawful act.

As pointed out by the Commission of Arbitration in Ambatielos Arbitration,[19] 'local remedies' available to the alien include "not only reference to the courts and tribunals, but also the use of the procedural facilities which municipal law makes available to litigants before such courts and tribunals. It is the whole system of legal protection, as provided by municipal law, which must have been put to the test........." The rule concerning the exhaustion of local remedies has also been recognised by the International Court of Justice in The Interhandel case.[20] The facts of this case are as follows :

---

[15] B.O. Iluyomade, "Dual Claims and the Local Remedies Rule in International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 16 (1976), p. 489.

[16] A.A. Cancado Trindate, "Domesic Jurisdiction and Exhaustion of Local Remedies : A. Comparative Analysis", I.J.I.L., Vol. 16 (1976), p. 187.

[17] Ibid, at p. 216.

[18] Brownlie, see supra note 5, at pp. 484-487.

[19] Int. L.R. 23 (1956) ; (1956), R.I.A. A. xii, 83 ; see also Finnish Ships Arbitration (1934), R.I.A.A. iii.

[20] I.O.J. Reports (1959), p. 6.

Under the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1917, America declared the assets of a Swiss company as enemy property and vested the shares. The majority of the shares were owned by Interhandel, another Swiss firm. In accordance with the procedure laid down by the Washington Accord of 1946 (Between France, the U.K. and the U.S. and on the other side Switzerland) the Swiss Authority of Review annulled an order provisionally blocking the assets of Interhandel in Switzerland. The Swiss Government claimed that America was bound by the said decision and consequently assets vested in the U.S. should be restored or the matter be referred to 'a conciliation procedure' as provided in the accord. But the U.S. Government contended that the majority of the shares were owned by Interhandel, another Swiss firm, and the decision of the Swiss Authority of Review did not apply to the property vested in the United States. In 1957 the Swiss Government filed an application in the International Court of Justice invoking the optional clause of the Statute of the Court. One of the preliminary objection raised by the U.S. against the admissibility of the application by the Court was that the local remedies available had not been exhausted.

The International Court of Justice upheld the objection raised by the U.S. and held : "This is one of the very cases which give rise to the application of the rule of exhaustion of local remedies."[21] As regards the rule that local remedies must be exhausted before international proceedings may be instituted, the Court observed that "it is a well-established rule of customary International law ; the rule has been generally observed in cases in which a State has adopted the cause of its national whose rights are claimed to have been disregarded in another State in violation of International law. Before resort may be had to an International Court in such a situation, it has been considered necessary that the State where the violation occurred should have an opportunity to redress it by its own means within the framework of its domestic legal system."[22] Applying the rule in the instant case the World Court observed : "The court has indicated in what conditions the Swiss Government basing itself on the idea that Interhandel's suit had been finally rejected in the United States Courts, considered itself entitled to institute proceedings by its application of 2nd October, 1957. However, the decision given by the Supreme Court (on 14th October, 1957)......... granted a writ of certiorari and readmitted Interhandel into the suit. The judgment of that court on 16th June, 1958, reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeals dismissing Interhandel's suit and remanded the case to the District Court. It was thenceforth open to Interhandel to avail itself again of the remedies available to it under the Trading with the Enemy Act, and to seek the restitution of its shares by proceedings in the United States Courts. Its suit is still pending in the United States Courts. The Court must have regard to the situation thus created.[23] The Court also made clear that the rule will apply only when private interest is involved, in case of public interest the rule will be inapplicable. Thus the rule of exhaustion of local remedies "serves some very useful purposes and has become generally accepted. The significant role it now plays in the determination of issues before the European Commission on Human Rights testifies to this".[24] Under Article 26 of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1950, the Commission may only deal with the matter after all domestic remedies have been exhausted, according to the generally recognised rules of International law.[25]

Reference may also be made here to the decision of the International Court of Justice dated 20th July, 1989 in case concerning Electronica Sicula S.P.A. (Elsi) (U.S. v. Italy)[26] which involved the question, inter alia, whether the rule of Exhaustion of local remedies was applicable to a claim under the treaty which does not mention the rule. The

---

[21] I.C.J. Reports (1959), at pp. 28-29.

[22] Ibid. at p. 27.

[23] Ibid. at pp. 26-27.

[24] B.O. Illuyomade, see supra note 15, at p. 498.

[25] See also Article 41(1) (c) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 ; Kevin Boyle and Hurst Hannum, "Individual Applications under the European Convention on Human Rights and the Concept of Administrative Practice : The Donnelly case", A.J.I.L., Vol. 68 (1974), p. 440 at pp. 447-451.

[26] Para 50 of Judgment dated 20 July, 1989.

Court was also requested to consider the allegation whether the objection that the local remedies had not been exhausted was barred by estoppel. The facts of case, in brief, were as follows :—

The United States of America transmitted to the International Court of Justice an Application instituting proceedings against the Republic of Italy in respect of a dispute arising out of the requisition by the Government of Italy of the plant and related assets of Raytheon-Elsi S.P.A., previously known as Electronica Sicula S.P.A. (Elsi), an Italian Company which was stated to have been 100 per cent owned by two United States Corporations. The Government of the U.S. also requested the Court, pursuant to Article 26 of the Statute of the Court, that the dispute be resolved by a Chamber of the Court. The Government of Italy also accepted this proposal. It was argued on behalf of the U.S. that the Government of Italy has violated the treaty of Friendship Commerce and Navigation (F.C.N. Treaty) between the U.S. and Italy and hence Italy is responsible to pay compensation to the U.S. The Government of Italy took the defence, inter alia that the Application filed on 6 February, 1987 by the U.S. Government is inadmissible because local remedies have not been exhausted and requested the Court to dismiss the claim.

It was argued on behalf of the U.S. Government that the rule of exhaustion of local remedies could not apply to a case brought under XXVI of F.C.N. Treaty. It was pointed out that the said Article is categorical in its terms, and unqualified by any reference to the local remedies rule ; and it seemed right therefore, to conclude that the parties to the F.C.N. Treaty, had they intended the jurisdiction conferred upon the Court to be qualified by the local bodies rule in cases of diplomatic protection, would have used express words to that effect ; as was done in an Economic Co-operation Agreement between Italy and the U.S. of America also concluded in 1948. The Chamber of the World Court held :

"The Chamber has no doubt that the parties to a treaty can therein either agree that local remedies rule shall not apply to claims based on alleged breaches of that treaty ; or confirm that it shall apply. Yet the Chamber finds itself unable to accept that an important principle of customary international law, should be held to have been tacitly dispensed with, in the absence of any words making clear an intention to do so. This part of the United States response to the Italian objection must therefore be rejected."

The U.S. further agreed that the local remedies rule would not apply in any event to the part of the U.S. claim which requested a declaratory judgment finding that the F.C.N. Treaty had been violated. The Chamber of the World Court held :

"The argument of the United States is that such a judgment would declare that the United States own rights under the F.C.N. Treaty had been infringed ; and that such a direct injury the local remedies rule, which is a rule of customary international law developed in the context of the espousal by a State of the claim of one of its nationals, would not apply. The Chamber, however, has not found it possible in the present case to find a dispute over the alleged violation of F.C.N. Treaty resulting in direct injury to the United States, that is both distinct from and independent of, the dispute over the alleged violation in respect of Raytheon and Machlett. The case arises from a dispute which the parties did not 'satisfactorily adjust by diplomacy' ; and that dispute was described in the 1974 United States claim made at the diplomatic level as a 'claim of the Government of the United States of America on behalf of Raytheon Company and Machlett Laboratories, Incorporated."[27]

The Chamber of the World Court also referred the international case[28] and observed :

"In the present case, likewise, the Chamber has no doubt that the matter which colours and pervades the United States claim as a whole, is the alleged damage to Raytheon and Machlett, said to have resulted from the actions of the Respondent.

---

[27] Para 51.

[28] I.C.I., Reports (1959) p. 28.

Accordingly the Chamber rejects the argument in the present case there is a part of the Applicant's claim which can be severed so as to render the local remedies rule inapplicable to that part."[29]

After having decided that "the local remedies rule does apply in this case", the Court proceeded to answer the question whether local remedies were or were not exhausted by Raytheon and Machlett. After going through the facts and circumstances of the case the Chamber held :

It is never easy to decide, in a case where there has in fact been much resort to the municipal Courts, whether local remedies have truly been 'exhausted'. But in this case Italy has not been able to satisfy the Chamber that there clearly remained some remedy which Raytheon and Machlett, independently of Elsi, and of Elsi's trustee in bankruptcy, ought to have pursued and exhausted."[30]

However, the Chamber of the Court finally held that Italy "has not violated the F.C.N. Treaty in the manner asserted by the Applicant", and hence "the Chamber rejects also the claim for reparation made in the submission of the Applicant."[31]

Expropriation of property of Aliens.—This has been discussed earlier under the heading 'Expropriation of Foreign Property' in chapter entitled "State Responsibility".

Protection of Human Rights to Aliens.—This has been discussed in Chapter on "Human Rights".[32]

Departure of Aliens from the Foreign Country.—As pointed out by Oppenheim, "Since a State holds only territorial and not personal supremacy over an alien within its boundaries, it can never, in any circumstance, prevent him from leaving its territory, provided he has fulfilled his local obligations, such as, payment of rates and taxes, fines, private debts and the like."[33] This right of alien has been recognised under Article 13(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, which provides that every one has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country. Article 12 of the International covenants on Civil and Political Rights also asserts this right.

Expulsion of Aliens.—Like the power to refuse admission, State can expel aliens as and when it desires. This is regarded as an incident of State territorial sovereignty. But this right must not be abused by proceeding in an arbitrary manner. "The power to expel and the manner of expulsion are, however, two distinct matters. Expulsion (or reconduction) must be effected in a reasonable manner and without unnecessary injury to the alien affected ...... Detention prior to expulsion should be avoided unless the alien concerned refuse to leave the State or is likely to evade the authorities. Also an alien should not be deported to a country or territory where his person or freedom would be threatened on account of his race, religion, nationality, or political views. Nor should he be exposed to unnecessary indignity."[34] Further, "......... it cannot be denied that, especially in the case of expulsion of an alien who has been residing within the expelling State for some length of time, and has established a business there, the home State of the expelled individual is, by its right of protection over citizens abroad justified in making diplomatic representations to the expelling State, and asking for reasons for the expulsion."[35] Moreover, expulsion must always be based on 'just causes'.[36] The law relating to protection of aliens from expulsion finally culminated in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966. Article 13 of the covenant provides : "An alien lawfully in the territory of a State Party to the present covenant may be expelled therefrom only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with law and shall, except where compelling reasons of national security otherwise require, be allowed to submit the reasons against his expulsion and to have his case reviewed by, and be represented for the purpose before the competent authority or a person or persons especially designated by the competent authority".

---

[29] Note 26, Para 52 of the Judgment.

[30] Para 63 of the Judgment.

[31] Para 136.

[32] See Chapter on "Human Rights".

[33] See supra note 1, at p. 690.

[34] Starke, see supra note 3 at pp. 350-351.

[35] Oppenheim, see supra note 1, at p. 692.

[36] See ibid, at p. 693.

Mass expulsion of aliens.—According to Starke, "International law does not prohibit the expulsion en masse of aliens, although this is resorted to usually by way of reprisals. It may, however, be treated as an unfriendly act and certainly would represent a breach of human rights."[37] The general proposition that International law does not prohibit the expulsion of aliens does not appear to be correct in view of the recent developments in the field of human rights and elsewhere. Article 1 of the European Convention on Human Rights provides :·"The high contracting parties shall secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in section 1 of this Covention". As aptly remarked by Fawcett, "This marks the great departure taken by the Convention from traditional forms of International protection of individuals, for it dispenses with nationality as a condition of protection."[38] Article 1 of the American Convention on Human Rights prohibits discrimination on the ground of national or social origin. Article 22(6) of the American Convention permits expulsion of aliens only pursuant to a decision reached in accordance with law. Article 22(8) is almost similar to Article 13 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966, referred earlier. The most important provision, for the purpose of present discussion, is enshrined in Article 22(9) which says : "The collective expulsion of aliens is prohibited".

In view of these developments, it would be wrong to say that International law does not prohibit the expulsion en masse of aliens. The correct statement of law would rather be that expulsion en masse of aliens is not justified.[39] In exceptional cases, it may be justified provided it is not contrary to international customary and treaty law (including the law of the United Nations) and norms and principles developed in the field of human rights. Moreover in the exercise of this right, there must be no discrimination against the citizens of a particular foreign State as such.[40]

Human Rights

N.B.—In view of the growing significance of human rights, it is proposed to further develop and elaborate the subject of Human Rights. It is therefore shifted from here to a separate i.e. Part VII of the book where a detailed discussion of the subject has been made. Please, therefore, see it in Part VII, i.e. after Part VI entitled "The Law of Neutrality".

---

[37] Starke, see supra note 3, at p. 351.

[38] Fawcet, The Application of the European Convention on Human Rights (1969), p. 18.

[39] For example—Mass expulsion of Ugandan Asians has generally been regarded as violation of law. For details see Appendix III.

[40] See ibid : see also Charles G. Fenwick, International Law (Third Indian Reprint, 1971), p. 321.

CHAPTER 25

INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW AND THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT

There is controversy regarding the question as to whether there exists International Criminal Law or not. While on the one hand, it is argued that there is a small body of penal rules which can be said to be constituting International criminal Law and that "International Law has reached a stage of development when contrive of criminal international law has emerged distinctly"[1] on the other hand, it is asserted that international criminal law in the material sense of the term does not exist.[2] According to Prof. Schwarzenberger[3] six meanings can be given to the term International criminal Law—(a) in the sense of territorial scope of municipal criminal law—it covers those cases when criminal jurisdiction is exercised by a state either within its own territory or in places assimilated in it; (b) in the sense of internationally prescribed municipal criminal law—this is based on treaties and international customary law and covers cases such as piracy and slave trading ; (c) in the sense of internationally authorised municipal criminal law—it is an extension of the earlier category and covers cases such as piracy Jure Gentium and war crimes ; (d) in the sense of municipal criminal law common to civilized nations—it covers cases such as forgery of foreign currency; (e) in the sense of international co-operation in the administration of justice ; and (f) in the material sense of the term. The categories (a) to (e) can not be classified as 'international criminal law' in the real sense of the term.

The primary object of criminal law is to preserve and maintain public order. Crime has been defined as an offence against the society or community. According to Salmond, "A crime then is an act deemed by law to be harmful to society in general, even though its immediate victim is an individual"[4] the purpose or end of punishment "is the protection of the society or else that punishment is looked as an end in itself......... the aim of protecting the society is sought to be achieved by deterrence, prevention and reformation." [5] Thus broadly speaking, a crime is prohibited by law or the omission to do an act commanded by law and the remedy for which is sanction or punishment by the state. The function of criminal law is, therefore, to protect fundamental social interests of the community. What is true of municipal criminal law should also hold good about the International criminal law. The function of international criminal law should be to preserve the public order of the world and to punish the conduct which attempts to disrupt such public order or which is intolerable to the community of nations. According to Prof. Quincy Wright, "A crime against international law is an act committed with intent to violate a fundamental interest protected by international law or with knowledge that the act will probably violate such an interest, and which may not be adequately punished by the exercise of the normal jurisdiction of any State." [6]

International criminal law in the material sense of the term can exist only when some pre-conditions are satisfied namely, (a) some external authority to enforce sanctions of international criminal law; (b) a code of criminal law, (c) an international criminal court; and (d) State as well as individuals should be amenable to international criminal responsibility.[7] In the absence of requisites such as these, Prof. Schwarzenberger has remarked that unless there is the transformation of "the present system of world power politics in disguise[8] into at least a world federation,[9] it is futile to conceive the idea of international criminal law. Before coming to a conclusion, let us first examine each of the above mentioned pre-conditions for the existence of international criminal law and also see how far international law has progressed towards the attainment of these goals.

---

[1] D.N. Saraf, "Theory and Reality of International Quasi—Criminal Law", in New Horizons of International Law, and Developing Countries, (1983), p. 87 at p. 101.

[2] S.K. Agarwala, "The Concept of International Criminal Law", p. 71 at p. 76.

[3] G.Schwarzenberger, The Problem of International Criminal Law, p. 263; See also note 2, at pp. 74-76.

[4] Salmond on Jurisprudence, Twelfth Edition by P.J. Fitzerald (1966) p. 92.

[5] Ibid, at p. 351.

[6] "The Law of Nuremberg Trial", A.J.I.L., Vol. 41 (1947) p. 55 at p. 56.

[7] See Prof. S.K. Agrawala, note 2, at p. 78.

As regards the first pre-condition i.e. some external authority to enforce sanctions, it must be noted that international law operates in a decentralized system and sovereign equality of all states is the well established rule of international law. In view of this, it is neither relevant nor proper to compare sanctions operating in municipal law with those that operate in international law. It has been aptly pointed out, "International order, far from perfect though it has, its own sanctions seldom imposed by force or command but as it were, natural sanctions slow to mature and gradual in effect but made compelling by the growing interdependence of the world." Further, in fact, "there exist among states rules imposing obligations upon them." [10] Moreover, "The sanctions to enforce such norms need not necessarily be confined to deprivations of personal liberty or imposition of fine, these may include other measures such as deprivation of privileges of the group life, expulsion or suspension from membership of the group, reprisals etc. In all cases, however, it is essential to establish that the act complained of is universally condemned and payment of damages would not constitute adequate remedy for the wrong done.[11] Further the practice of states shows that there are certain acts against the community of nations which are universally condemned and if such acts are committed by individuals they are liable to be visited upon by the sanctions of criminal law. International Law has now reached a stage wherein international crime can be clearly distinguished from international delinquency.[12]

In this connection, reference may be made to some important International Treaties entered into after the establishment of the U.N. It may be noted here that one of the first tasks performed by the General Assembly in 1946 was to adopt the principles of Nuremberg charter and Tribunal thereby enlarging the jurisdiction of belligerent states in future wars to crimes against peace and crimes against humanity. Later on in 1947 the General Assembly requested the International Law Commission to "draft a code of offences against Peace and Security of Mankind". Unfortunately the task entrusted to the Commission is not yet complete. The work is going on at snail speed and the comments of the states are still being received.

In 1950, the General Assembly asked, the International Law Commission to take account of observations made by delegations on the formulations of Nuremberg principles while preparing a draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind. The commission submitted final draft of code in 1954. In 1974 when the draft definition of aggression was submitted before the General Assembly, the Secretary General of the U.N. proposed resuming consideration of the draft code of offences against the peace and security of mankind as well as the issue of the establishment of an international criminal court. In 1977, the International Law Commission suggested that the 1954 draft be reconsidered. In 1980, seven nations asked for the item of "Draft Code of Offences against Peace and Security of Mankind to be included in the agenda of the General Assembly." It may be noted here that Eric Suy, U.N. legal advisor pointed out that following legal documents should be regarded as connected with the code. International convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, 1966 ; the convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity, 1968, convention on the Prevention and Punishment of crime against Internationally Protected Persons, including Diplomatic Agents, 1973, Definition of Aggression; Declaration on the Granting of Independence to colonial countries and peoples; and Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation Among States in accordance with the charter of the U.N.

---

[8] G. Schwarzenberger, The Frontiers of International Law, p. 209.

[9] J.E.S. Fawcett, The Law of Nations (1961) p. 18.

[10] H.L.A. Hart, The Concept of Law (1961) p. 226 ; See also Rahmatullah Khan, "International Law—Old and New", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975) p. 371 at p. 372.

[11] D.N. Saraf, note 1, at p. 90.

[12] Ibid.

Next important landmark is the Genocide Convention, 1948. It was adopted by Resolution 260 (III of the United Nations General Assembly) on 9 December, 1948. It entered into force on 15 June, 2000. So far 130 States have ratified the convention. Article I of the Convention, declares 'Genocide' as 'a crime under international law'. Article IV provides that persons committing Genocide shall be punished whether they are constitutionally responsible rulers, public officials or private individuals. Article VI provides that they shall be tried by a competent tribunal of the state in the territory of which the act was committed or by an international penal tribunal as may have jurisdiction with respect to those contracting parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction. Though nearly four decades have passed since then such an international penal tribunal has remained a dream to be realized. The Convention on Narcotic Drugs, 1961 and its Amending Protocol of 1972 impose obligations upon states. Article 14 of the convention provides that if a party fails to carry out the provisions of the convention, the International Narcotics Control Board may call for explanations and if the explanation is unsatisfactory, the Board may call the attention of other competent U.N. organs and may even recommend a stoppage of drug imports or exports or both to and from the country or territory in default.

The next conventions that deserves mention are the 1970 Hague Convention for the Seizure of Air Craft and 1971 Montreal Convention on the same subject. Under these conventions, states have undertaken to provide deterrent punishment to hijackers. Under these conventions, State Parties may have jurisdiction over hijackers in some or other way and these features of jurisdiction have made the offence of hijacking "very near to piracy under international customary law."[13] Reference may also be made to the International Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the crime of Apartheid, 1973 which came into force on 18 July, 1976. As of January 2014, 107 countries have signed and ratified this convention. Article I of the convention declares apartheid as a crime against humanity, violating principles of international law and constituting a serious threat to international peace and security. Article V provides that persons charged with apartheid may be tried by a competent tribunal of any State Party to the convention which may acquire jurisdiction over the person of the accused or by an international penal tribunal having jurisdiction with respect to those State Parties which shall have accepted its jurisdiction. Thus 1973 convention on Apartheid is "nearest to universalising the offence."[14] Yet another significant achievement made is the adoption of the definition of 'Aggression'[15] after 51 years of work by jurists and political experts.

A brief reference may also be made here to the 1973 Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Crimes Against Internationally Protected Persons including Diplomatic Agents[16] which under Article 2 declares certain acts enumerated in the same article as crimes. Article 7 of the convention provides that the state party in whose territory the alleged offender is present shall, if it does not extradit him, submit, without an exception whatsoever and without delay, the case to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution, through proceedings in accordance with the laws of that state. A similar provision has been made in the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages, 1979.[17] It came into force on 3 June, 1983 as per condition of the convention, 22 country deposited instrument of ratification. As of December 2014, 174 countries had become parties to the convention.

A perusal of the above conventions makes it clear that serious attempts have been made to evolve a body of International criminal law. Provisions for the establishment of international penal tribunal have also been made in several conventions. Though sanctions in some or the other form exist, there is no code of international criminal law addressed directly to the subjects and objects of international law. The failure to adopt the "Code of offences Against the Peace and Security of Mankind" is a sad commentary of the efforts made in this connection. Although the normative bases of international criminal law have already been established, it would not be correct to say that there exists a body of international criminal law. The utmost that can be said is that it is in the offing. The need is to make sincere efforts in this direction. If and when evolved, both the state and the individuals should be amenable to international criminal responsibility. As regards the establishment of an international penal tribunal, though efforts have been made for more than 50 years, success has so far eluded. It has been aptly remarked, "If the essence of international criminal law lies in the existence of an international judicial authority with power to enforce mandatory rules of social conduct such a law does not exist."[18] It may be noted here that the Seventeen-member Committee established by the Seventh Session of the General Assembly to consider the draft statute of an International Criminal Court pointed out that some members of the Committee felt that at the present time "the substantive law to be applied by the court was not sufficiently mature to make the creation of an international criminal jurisdiction practicable" one of the main hurdles in the establishment of an international penal tribunal is the concept of national sovereignty.[19]

---

[13] Shami Shubber, "Aircraft Hijacking under the Hague Convention, 1970—A New Regime", I.C.L.Q., Vol. 22 (1973) p. 687 at p. 725.

[14] S.K. Agrawala, note 2, at p. 80.

[15] For the definition of 'Aggression' see chapter on "The Security Council".

[16] See Annen to Res. 3166 (XXVIII).

[17] See Article 8 of the Convention ; See U.N. Doc. A/34/819.

Proposals for the Establishment of an International Criminal Court.—Proposals for the establishment of an international criminal court have been under consideration for more than 50 years. The Advisory Committee of Jurists which was given the task of preparing plans for the establishment of Permanent Court of International Justice also had before it a draft relating to the constitution of a High Court which could take cognizance of "crime committed against international good order and Universal law of nations." The Advisory Committee of Jurists met at the Hague in June, 1920 and drew up a Draft scheme for the Institution of the Permanent Court of Justice. The final draft of the Committee also included the recommendation that a High Court of International Justice be established and be given the jurisdiction to try offences against "international public order" or against "Universal law of nations" which might be referred to it by the Council or Assembly of the League of Nations. But this recommendation was rejected by the Assembly of the League of Nations on the ground that for the trial of criminal cases a special chamber of the Permanent Court of International Justice would be more practicable.

Alongwith the convention for the prevention and punishment of Terrorism, the League of Nations, drafted, in 1937, a Convention for the Establishment of an International Criminal Court. The proposed court was to consist of five judges and five deputies belonging to different nations to be elected by the Permanent Court of International Justice. The League of Nations requested the members to adopt the convention for the creation of International Court on 16 November, 1937. Although it was signed by Belgium, Bulgaria, Spain, France, Greece, the Netherlands, Romania, Czechoslovakia, Turkey and Yugoslavia, the convention never came into force as there were no ratifications. Though the said attempt proved to be a failure, this experience should be used in devising the modes of approach to the present solution of the issue. It should likewise be noted that this issue is a part of larger problem that of the evolution and development of international criminal law."[20]

After the establishment of the U.N., proposals for the establishment of an international criminal court were once again considered and the matter was further pursued. In 1948, the General Assembly requested the International Law Commission to study the desirability of establishing an international criminal court to try persons charged with genocide and other crimes. It was pointed out that jurisdiction over such crimes would be conferred by international conventions. In its Fifth Session, the General Assembly established a Committee (called the Geneva Committee) on International Criminal Jurisdiction. It submitted a draft statute of an International Criminal Court in the seventh session but instead of taking any decision on it, the General Assembly established a new Committee, called Seventeen-member Committee which submitted a revised draft statute of an International Criminal Court to the Ninth Session of the General Assembly. Though a large amount of work towards drafting the statute of the Court has been done by both the said committees, its consideration has been postponed several times by General Assembly pending the adoption of the definition of Aggression and the finalisation of the Draft Code of Offences against Peace and Security of Mankind. Thus the draft statute has neither been recommended to, nor accepted by any state.

---

[18] D.N. Saraf, note 1, at p. 89.

[19] See also Proposal for the Establishment of an International Criminal Court in chapter on "Aircraft Hijacking".

[20] I. Blishchenko and N. Zhdanov, Terrorism and International Law (Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1984) pp. 254-255.

A number of problems such as the competence of the court, attribution of jurisdiction, the law of the court and access to the court arise in connection with the establishment of international criminal jurisdiction. Yet another problem is that of the way the Court is to be established. The Seventeen-Member Committee discussed four methods—(a) By Amendment of the charter of the U.N.; (b) by Multilateral convention ; (c) by General Assembly Resolution ; and (d) by a General Assembly Resolution to be followed by Convention. Most of the members of the committee favoured the establishment of the court by a multilateral convention and this seems to be the best of the said four methods.[21]

Apart from the U.N., the issue of the establishment of an International Criminal Court has attracted the attention of other institutions and persons. In this connection, reference may be made to the two conferences on international criminal law held in Racine, Wisconsin, U.S.A. in 1971-72 and in Bellagio, Italy in 1972 under the auspices of the International Foundation for the Establishment of an International Criminal Court. The Third International conference on International Criminal Law and fourth conference for the establishment of an International Criminal Court under the auspices of the Foundation were held at Dacca (Bangladesh) and at San Juan (Pureto Rico) in December, 1974 and January 1976 respectively. Besides this, representatives of 30 countries attended an international conference of experts on international criminal law and jurisdiction and major violations of international law in May 26-31, 1977 in Boston (U.S.A.). Last but not the least, a draft International Criminal Code prepared by eminent lawyer, Cherif Bassiouni, Secretary-General of the International Association of Penal Law was discussed at the International Institute of Higher Studies in Criminal Sciences. Despite all these efforts "the establishment of an International Criminal Court and a system of international criminal jurisdiction is still an object of scientific investigation and discussion."[22]

U.N. Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice

Realization has dawned on the international community that new breeds of criminality, including sophisticated computer crime, terrorism, illicit drug-trafficking, money laundering and violent street crime, are creating a pervasive feeling of insecurity throughout the world. Indeed growing crime rates threaten to become a Universal phenomenon comparable to ecological disaster. As many as 114 State Ministers met at Versailles (France) in November 1991 and voiced these concerns and considered the creation of an effective U.N. crime prevention and criminal justice programme. These concerns were affirmed by General Assembly of the U.N. on 18th December, 1991. The General Assembly unanimously called for the creation of a new commission—Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice as a functional body of the Economic and Social Council.[23] The General Assembly dissolved the existing Committee on Crime Prevention and Control and decided that its funds would be made available for the new Commission.

---

[21] Blishchenko and N. Zhdanov, Terrorism and International Law (Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1984) at p. 261.

[22] Ibid., at p. 276.

[23] See Resolution 46/152.

The General Assembly also approved a Statement of Principles and Programme of Action of the U.N. Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme devoted to providing States with practical assistance, such as data collection, information and training to help prevent crime within and among States. According to the new Statement of Principles, it is the belief of the Member States that : justice based on the rule of law is the pillar on which civilized society rests; lowering the world crime rate is related to the improvement of social conditions of the population; rising crime is impairing the process of development; and the growing internationalization of crime must generate new and commensurate responses.[24]

As pointed out by the then Secretary-General of the U.N., Perez de Cuellar, in a message to the Versailles Summit, nowhere was the transnationalism of crime more evident than in the problem of illicit drug trafficking and drug abuse. It has been estimated that 40 million peoples throughout the world consume illicit drugs. There is hardly a nation, a social group, an age group which has been spared.[25] According to the Director-General, Margaret J. Austee to the Third Committee (Social, Humanitarian and Cultural), the new Commission will consider establishing a foundation for crime prevention and formulating an international convention on crime prevention and criminal justice.

The inaugural session of the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice—the newest functional body of the Economic and Social Council—was held at Vienna from 21st to 30th April, 1992. It approved an omnibus draft resolution which could serve as a blueprint for the future activities of the U.N. Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme. It also accepted the recommendation of the Ministerial Meeting on the creation of an Effective U.N. Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Programme held at Versailles (France) from 21st to 23rd November, 1991 and decided to consult Member States on the desirability of a convention on crime prevention and criminal justice. A review of the U.N. activities in the field of crime prevention and criminal justice revealed that crime was increasing at a global rate of 5 per cent, far greater than the rise in population growth. Speaking before the Commission on 21st April, 1992, Director-General of U.N. Office at Vienna, Giorgio Gia Comella; although U.N. cannot be a "world policeman", it could help mitigate conflicts and protect victims, particularly by providing technical assistance.

Priority areas of the Commission will include : national and transnational crime ; organized crime ; economic crime including money laundering. The role of criminal law in the protection of the environment; crime prevention in urban areas; and juvenile and violent criminality.[26] It may also be noted that the Ninth U.N. Congress on the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders was held in 1995.

World Conference on Organized Crime

In its second session held at Vienna from 13 to 23 April, 1993, the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice (now a 40-member body) accepted an offer by Italy to host a world conference on organized crime in the second half of 1994. It also welcomed the convening of an international conference on money laundering, also to be hosted in Italy.

Attended by the representatives of 142 nations, the world conference on organized Transnational Crime was held at Naples (Italy) from 21 to 23 November, 1994. The conference discussed in detail the new style criminal organizations of the 1990s or 'crime multinational' as termed by U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros Ghali. It focussed attention on the rapid growth, increasing financial sophistication and predominantly international character of present day crime syndicates. Estimated to bring in as much as $750 billion annually, the major transnational crime groupings are disrupting economic development in key countries and the entire regions, and often contend with Governments for political power.

---

[24] U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXIX, No. 1 (March 1992) p. 87.

[25] U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXIX, No. 1 (March 1992) p. 87.

[26] U.N. Chronicle Vol. XXIX, No. 3 (September 1992) p. 73.

The Naples Conference adopted the Naples Political and Global Action Plan and thus a step towards realizing the idea of a legally binding international convention on transnational crime. At the close of the conference, Italy announced plans to fund an international centre for training law enforcement personnel to combat transnational crime.

The conference endorsed : greater use of bilateral and multinational agreements on extradition and exchange of witnesses and evidence ; personnel exchanges between national enforcement agencies ; and international aid to criminal justice systems in developing countries. Further, the Naples Declaration said that states should consider : making money laundering a crime ; requiring greater transparency of banks and other financial enterprises; and establishing laws providing for the seizure of organized crime assets.[27]

Convention Against Transnational Organized Crimes.—On November 15, 2000, the U.N. General Assembly adopted the convention. It entered into force on 29 September, 2003. U.N. convention Against Transnational Crimes, 2000 has been ratified by 185 countries as of January 2015. Reference may be made to the Protocol to Prevent and Punish Trafficking of Persons Especially Women which entered into force on 25th December, 2003. As of December 2014, the Protocol has 166 parties. Besides this, Protocol against Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air entered into force on 28th January, 2004. As of November 2014, 166 countries had become parties. Moreover, Protocol against Illicit Manufacturing and Trafficking in firearms their parts, components and ammunition entered into force on 3 July, 2005. As of March, 2014, 109 countries had become parties to the Convention.

Three Protocols to the above Convention were also adopted :

I. Protocol against Illicit Manufacturing and Trafficking in Fire-arms, their Parts, Components and Ammunition.

II. Protocol to present, suppress and punish trafficking of persons, especially women and children.

III. Protocol against Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air, 2000.

Adoption of the Statute of International Criminal Court

The General Assembly, in its resolution 44/39 of 4 December, 1989, requested the International Law Commission to address the question of establishing an International Criminal Court. Through its resolution 45/41 of 28 November, 1990 and 45/54 of 9 December, 1991 the Assembly invited the Commission to consider further and analyse the issues concerning the question of an international criminal jurisdiction, including the question of establishing an International Criminal Court. Further, in resolutions 47/33 of 25 November, 1992 and 48/31 of 9 December, 1993, the General Assembly requested the Commission to elaborate the draft statute for such a court as a matter of priority.

The International Law Commission considered the question of establishing an International Criminal Court from its forty second session to its forty sixth session in 1994. At the latter session, the commission completed a draft statute for an International Criminal Court, which was submitted with General Assembly.

The General Assembly on its part, passed resolution 51/207 on 17th December, 1996 through which it decided to hold a diplomatic conference of plenipotentiaries in 1998 with a view to finalizing and adopting a conventions on the establishment of an International Criminal Court. In its resolution 52/160 of 15th December, 1997, the General Assembly accepted the offer of Italy to act as host to the conference and decided to hold the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court in Rome from 15 June to 17 July, 1998. On 17 July, 1998, the conference adopted the statute known as the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. The Rome Statute for International Criminal Court entered into force on 1st July, 2002. On that date ten nations ratified the Statute thus making a total of 66 States Parties to the Treaty. Article 126 of the Rome statute required the ratification of 60 nations for the statute to come into force. As of 6 January, 2015, 123 countries had become parties to the Rome Statute. However, a number of states including China, India, Russia and the U.S. are critical of the Court and have not joined. Besides the Preamble, there are 128 Articles in the statute which are divided into following 13 parts :

---

[27] U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXXII, No. 1 (March 1995), p. 89.

(i) Establishment of the Court;
(ii) Jurisdiction, Admissibility and Applicable Law;
(iii) General Principles of Criminal Law;
(iv) Composition and Administration of the Court;
(v) Investigation and Prosecution;
(vi) The Trial;
(vii) The Penalties;
(viii) Appeal and Revision;
(ix) International Cooperation and Judicial Assistance;
(x) Enforcement;
(xi) Assembly of States Parties;
(xii) Financing; and
(xiii) Final clause.

The Rome Conference or the U.N. Diplomatic Conference of plenipotentiaries on the establishment of International Criminal Court was attended by 162 countries. Besides adopting the statute the Conference, through a resolution in its Part F (of Annex. I) established the preparatory commission for the International Criminal Court to prepare proposals for practical arrangements for the establishment and coming into operation of the Court.[28]

According to Article 126 of the statute, the statute shall enter into force on the first day of the month after the 60th day following the date of deposit of the 60th instrument of ratification acceptance, approval or accession with the Secretary General of the United Nations. For each State ratifying, accepting, approving or acceding to the statute after the deposit of the 60th instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession, the statute shall enter into force on the first day of the month after the 60th day following the deposit by such state of its instrument of ratification acceptance, approval or accession.

International Criminal Court

The main features of International Criminal Court to be established according to the above-mentioned Rome Statute are as follows :—

Establishment of the Court.—Article 1 of the Statute which establishes the International Criminal Court provides that it shall be a permanent institution and shall have power to exercise jurisdiction over persons for the most serious crimes of international concern, as referred to in this statute and shall be complimentary to national criminal jurisdiction. It is further provided that the court shall be brought into relationship with the U.N. through an agreement to be approved by the Assembly of State Parties to this and thereafter concluded by the President of the Court on its behalf.[29] The seat of the Court shall be established at the Hague in the Netherlands.[30] As of November 2019, 123 countries had become parties to the Statute of the Court.

Jurisdiction.—The jurisdiction of the Court shall be limited to the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole. The Court has jurisdiction in accordance with this statute with respect to the following crimes :

(a) The crime of genocide;
(b) Crimes against humanity;
(c) War crimes;
(d) The crime of aggression.[31]

---

[28] See Part F Annex I of U.N. Doc. A/Conf./83/10, 17 July, 1998.

[29] Article 2 of the Statute.

[30] Article 3.

[31] Article 5.

The Court has jurisdiction only with respect to crimes committed after the entry into force of the statute.[32] A state which becomes a party to the statute thereby accepts the jurisdiction of the Court with respect of the crimes referred to in Article 5.[33] However, the Court shall have no jurisdiction over any person who was under the age of 18 at the time of the alleged commission of a crime.[34] The statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or Parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under the statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence. Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person.[35]

International Criminal Court can generally exercise jurisdiction only in cases where the accused is a national of the State Party, the alleged crime took place on the territory of the State Party, or a situation is referred to the Court by the United Nations Security Council.

American Request for exemption from Jurisdiction of International Criminal Court for its personnel of Armed Forces allegedly guilty of War Crimes in Iraq.—America requested for exemption from the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court in respect of members of its armed forces in Iraq allegedly guilty of war crimes. But this request has been rejected.

According to both the Clinton administration and the Bush administration, the International Criminal Court (ICC) is a seriously flawed institution and, as such, the United States of America should not join it. In their view, it was regretful that the Rome statute establishing the ICC broke with the long-standing legally precedent by asserting jurisdiction over nationals and military personnel from States that are not party to the treaty. This was the reason that forced the U.S. to take unusual steps to protect its people from the I.C.C.

Applicable Law.—According to Article 21 of the statute :

(1) The Court shall apply :

- (a) In the first place, this statute elements of crime and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence.
- (b) In the second place, where appropriate, applicable treaties and the principles and rules of international law, including the established principles of international law, including the established principles of the international law of armed conflict.
- (c) Failing that, general principles of law derived by Court from national laws of legal systems of the world including, as appropriate the national laws of States that would normally exercise jurisdiction over the crime, provided that those principles are not inconsistent with the statute and with international law and internationally recognized norms and standards.

(2) The Court may apply principles and rules of law as interpreted in its pervious decisions.

(3) The application and interpretation of law pursuant to this Article must be consistent with internationally recognized human rights, and be without any adverse distinction founded on grounds such as gender as defined in Article 7, paragraph 3, age,

---

[32] Article 11.

[33] Article 12.

[34] Article 26.

[35] Article 27.

race, colour, language, religion, or belief, political or other opinion, national, ethnic or social origin, wealth, birth or other status.

General Principles of Criminal Law

(1) Nullum crimen sine lege.—A person shall not be criminally responsible under this statute unless the conduct in question constitutes, at the time it takes place, a crime within the jurisdiction of the court. The definition of a crime shall be strictly construed and shall not be extended by analogy. In case of ambiguity, the definition shall be interpreted in favour of the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted.[36]

(2) Nulla Poena Sine lege.—A person convicted by the court may be punished, only in accordance with this statute.[37]

(3) Non-retroactively ratione personal.—No personal shall be criminally responsible under this statute for conduct prior to the entry into force of the statute. In the event of a change in the law applicable to a given case prior to final judgement, the law more favourable to the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted shall apply.[38]

(4) Individual Criminal responsibility.—Article 25 of the statute which deals with individual criminal responsibility provides the following :

(1) The Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to this statute.

(2) A person who commits a crime within the jurisdiction of the court shall be individually responsible and liable for punishment in accordance with this statute.

(3) In accordance with this statute, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court if that person:

- (a) Commits such a crime; whether as an individual, jointly with another or through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible;
- (b) Orders, solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;
- (c) For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission, including providing the means for its commission;
- (d) In any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose;
- (e) In respect of the crime of genocide, directly and publicly incites others to commit genocide.

(4) No provision in this statute relating to individual responsibility shall affect the responsibility of states under international law.

Composition.—According to Article 34 of the statute, the Court shall be composed of following organs :

(a) The Presidency;
(b) An Appeal Division, a Trial Division and a Pre-Trial Division;
(c) The Office of the Prosecutor; and
(d) The Registry.

There shall be 18 Judges of the Court, to be chosen from among persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective States for appointment to the highest judicial offices nominations of candidates for election to the court may be made by any State Party to the statute every candidate for election to the Court shall (i) have established competence in Criminal Law and Procedure, and the necessary relevant experience, whether as a Judge, prosecutor, advocate or in other similar capacity, in criminal proceedings; or (ii) have established competence in relevant areas of international law such as international humanitarian law and the law of human rights extensive experience in a professional legal capacity which is of relevance to the judicial work of the Court. Further, every candidate for election to the Court shall have an excellent knowledge of and be fluent in at least one of the working languages of the court (i.e. Arabic, Chinese, English, French, Russian and Spanish). No two judges may be nationals of the same State. The Judges shall hold office for a term of nine years. But at the first selection, one third of the Judges elected shall be selected by lot to serve for a term of three years; one third of the judges shall be elected by lot to serve for a term of six years; and the remainder shall serve for a term of nine years.[39]

---

[36] Article 22.

[37] Article 23.

[38] Article 24.

Place of Trial.—Unless otherwise decided the place of the trial shall be the seat of the Court.[40]

Penalties.—Article 77 of the statute provides the following :

(1) Subject to Article 110 (which deals with review by the Court concerning reduction of sentence), the court may impose one of the following penalties on a person convicted of a crime under Article 5 of the Statute :

 (a) Imprisonment for a specified number of years, which may not exceed a maximum of 30 years; or

 (b) A term of life imprisonment when justified by the extreme gravity of the crime and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

(2) In addition to imprisonment the court may order :

 (a) A fine under the criteria provided for in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence;

 (b) A forfeiture of proceeds, property and assets derived directly or indirectly from that crime, without prejudice to the rights of bona fide third parties.

Appeal and Revision.—A decision under Article 74 may be appealed in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.[41] Appeal against other decisions may also be made in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.[42] The convicted person or, after death, spouses, children, parents or one person alive at the time of accuser's death who has been given express written instructions from the accused to bring such a claim, or the Prosecutor on the person's behalf, may apply to the Appeal's Chamber to revise the final judgement of conviction or sentence on the grounds specified in the Statute.[43]

Compensation to an arrested or convicted person.—Anyone who has been the victim of unlawful arrest or detention shall have an enforceable right to compensation.[44]

General obligation to cooperate.—States Parties shall in accordance with the provisions of the statute, cooperate with the court in its investigation and prosecution of crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court.[45]

Enforcement.—A sentence of imprisonment shall be served in a State designated by the Court from a list of States which have indicated to the Court their willingness to accept sentenced persons.[46]

---

[39] Article 36.
[40] Article 62.
[41] Article 81.
[42] Article 82.
[43] Article 84.
[44] Article 85.
[45] Article 86.
[46] Article 103 (1) (a).

Assembly of State Parties

The Rome Statute also establishes an Assembly of States Parties. Each State Party shall have one representative in the Assembly who may be accompanied by alternative and advisers. Other states which have signed the statute in or the Final Act may be observers in the Assembly.[47]

The Assembly shall :

(a) consider and adopt, as appropriate, recommendations of the Preparatory Commission;

(b) provide management oversight to the Presidency, the Persecutor and the Registrar regarding the administration of the Court;

(c) Consider the reports and activities of the Bureau established under paragraph 3 and take appropriate action in regard thereto;

(d) Consider and decide the budget of the court;

(e) Decide whether to alter, in accordance with Article 36, the number of judges;

(f) To consider pursuant to Article 87, paragraphs 5 and 7, any question relating to non-cooperation;

(g) Perform any other function consistent with this statute or the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.[48] The Assembly shall have a Bureau consisting of a President, two Vice-Presidents and 18 members elected by the Assembly for three year term.[49]

The Assembly may establish such subsidiary bodies as may be necessary, including an independent oversight mechanism for inspection, evaluation and investigation of the court, in order to enhance its efficiency and economy.[50] Each State Party shall have one vote. Every effort shall be made to reach decisions by consensus in the Assembly and in the Bureau. If consensus cannot be reached, except as otherwise provided in the statute :

(a) Decisions on matters of substance must be approved by a two-thirds majority of those present and voting provided that an absolute majority of States Parties constitutes the quorum for voting;

(b) Decisions on matters of procedure shall be taken by a simple majority of States Parties present and voting.[51]

The Assembly shall adopt its own rules of procedure.[52]

Settlement of Disputes.—Any dispute concerning the judicial functions of the Court shall be settled by the decision of the Court.[53] Any other dispute between two or more States Parties relating to the interpretation or application of the statute which is not settled through negotiations within three months of their commencement shall be referred to the Assembly of States Parties. The Assembly may itself seek to settle the dispute or make recommendations on further means of settlement of the dispute, including referral to the International Court of Justice in conformity with the statute of the Court.[54]

Reservations.—A unique feature of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court is that it does not provide for any reservations.[55]

Review of the Statute.—Seven years after the entry into force of this statute the Secretary-General of the United Nations shall convene a Review Conference to consider any amendments to this statute. Such review may include, but is not limited to, the list of crimes contained in Article 5. The Conference shall be open to those participating States Parties and on the same conditions.[56] Besides this, at any time thereafter at the request of a State Party and for the purposes set forth above, the Secretary General of the United Nations, upon approval by a majority of States Parties, convene a Review Conference.

---

[47] Article 112(1).
[48] Article 112 (2).
[49] Article 112 (3).
[50] Article 112 (4).
[51] Article 112 (7).
[52] Article 112 (9).
[53] Article 119 (1).
[54] Article 119 (2).
[55] Article 120.

Withdrawal.—Last but not the least a State Party may, by written notification addressed to the Secretary-General of the United Nations withdraw from this Statute. The withdrawal shall take effect one year after the date of the receipt of notification, unless the notification specifies a later date.[57]

Conclusion.—The adoption of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court is a great achievement. There are, however, certain glaring shortcomings. For example, the crimes of hijacking and terrorism which pose a great menace to the international community, especially to the innocent men, women and children, have not been included in the list of crimes over which the International Criminal Court shall have jurisdiction. Similarly, the enforcement mechanism devised is far from satisfactory. The statute shows that states are yet not prepared to establish a strong Court having compulsory jurisdiction over international crimes. The Statute represents the maximum agreement which could be reached in the present circumstances. A welcome features of the Statute is the provision of review of the Statute seven years after the entry into force of this Statute. Let us hope that when a Review Conference is held the present shortcomings will be removed. A good and auspicious beginning has been made with the adoption of the Statute. It is rightly said that well begun is half done, so be it.

Entry into Force of Amendments to the Regulations of the International Criminal Court.—On 18 December, 2007 amendments to the Regulations of the International Criminal Court adopted by the Judges on 14 June and 14 November, 2007, during their eighth and ninth plenary sessions, entered into force pursuant to Article 52 of the Rome Statute, the amendments of the Regulations of the Court will be circulated to States Parties for comments. If, within six months from circulation there are no objections from a majority of States Parties, amendments shall remain in force.

Latest position of the cases before the Court.—So far, the Court has opened investigation situations Northern Uganda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Central African Republic and the Darfur. The Court has indicted fourteen people, seven of whom remain fugitives, two have died/or believed to have died, four are in custody and one is apparently voluntarily before the Court. International Criminal Court's first trial, of Congolese militia leader Thomas Lubanga, began on 26 January, 2009. On 24 November, 2009, the second trial started against Congolese militia leader Gumain Katanga and Mathier Ngudjolo Chui.

Mr. Lubanga and Mr. Katanga were convicted and sentenced to 14 and 12 years imprisonment.

The Bemba Trial in the Central African Republic situation is concluded. Mr. Bemba was convicted on two counts of crimes against humanity and three counts of war crimes. This marked the first time the ICC convicted someone of sexual violence as they added rape to his conviction.

Trials in Ntagnda case (PR. Congo), the Bemba et al. Goude trial in Cote-dilvoria situation are on going. The Benda trial in the situation of Darfur, Sudan, was scheduled to begin in 2014 but the start date was vacated. Charges against Dominic on given in Uganda situation and Ahmed-al-Faq in the Mali situation have been confirmed, both are awaiting their trials.

---

[56] Article 123 (1).

[57] Article 127 (1).

U.N. War Crimes Commission to Investigate war crimes in former Yugoslavia

On 6th October, 1992, the Security Council of the U.N. through a resolution authorised Secretary General, Boutros Boutros Ghali to establish U.N. War Crimes Commission to investigate war crimes committed in former Yugoslavia. Though the scope of this Commission is very limited it is very significant landmark in the history of the United Nations. It is not a permanent Commission yet it is significant because it will definitely establish an important precedent.

The Security Council, on 6th October, 1992, asked States, relevant U.N. bodies and other organizations to provide within 30 days any substantial information concerning violations of humanitarian law. It may be noted here that two months before, on 13th August, 1992, in resolution No. 771, the Council had asked States and international organizations for such information on the former Yugoslavia.

On 6th October, 1992, the Council took the decision for the establishment of War Crimes Commission as it had been alarmed by reports of mass killings and "ethnic cleansing" in former Yugoslavia.[58] The Commission reported that it had several thousand pages of documentation, as well as video information on allegations of grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and violations of international humanitarian law and was preparing a database on all reported crimes.

Establishment of an International Tribunal for Prosecution of Violators of International Humanitarian Law in former Yugoslavia.— Investigation of war crimes by U.N. War Crimes Commission would have been futile if the persons guilty of war crimes and violation of humanitarian law were not prosecuted and punished. Consequently as the natural next step, the Security Council, on 22nd February, 1993, decided[59] that an international tribunal "shall be established for the prosecution of persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991." It will be reckoned as a great landmark in the history of the U.N. because it is for the first time that U.N. has established an International Criminal Court with jurisdiction to prosecute crimes committed during armed conflict. The above-mentioned resolution was unanimously passed by the Security Council. The Council asked the U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros Ghali to make specific proposals within 60 days for the organization and operation of such tribunal.[60]

On 3rd May, 1993, the Secretary-General reported[61] that the tribunal would operate as a subsidiary organ of the Security Council performing its functions, independently of political considerations and would "not be subject to authority and control" of the Council with regard to the performance of its judicial functions. Its life span would be "linked to the restoration and maintenance of international peace and security" in the former Yugoslavia.

The tribunal would consist of Trial Chambers, an Appeals Chamber, the Prosecutor and a Registry, servicing both Chambers and the Prosecutor. With regard to competence, the Tribunal will apply those rules of international humanitarian law which are "beyond any doubt part of customary law", such as international conventions relating to the protection of war victims, respective laws and customs of war on land and prevention of the crime of genocide. The tribunal will also deal with "crimes against humanity—first recognized in the Charter and judgment of the Nuremberg Tribunal—which include "inhuman acts of a very serious nature" committed as part of a "widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds". In the case of the former Yugoslavia, such inhuman acts took the form of so-called "ethnic cleansing" and widespread and systematic rape and other forms of sexual assault, including enforced prostitution.[62]

---

[58] See U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXX, No. 1 (March, 1993) p. 7.

[59] See Resolution 808 (1993).

[60] See U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXX, No. 2 (June, 1993) p. 5.

[61] Vide document (S/25704).

[62] See U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXX, No. 3 (September, 1993) p. 13.

On 25th May, 1993, the Security Council decided to establish an International Tribunal for the purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991.[63] The Council unanimously endorsed a 34-article draft statute of the tribunal annexed to the Secretary-General's report (S/25704). Under its statute, the Tribunal is to deal with "crimes against humanity", such as murder, extermination, enslavement, imprisonment, torture, rape, persecution on political, racial and religious grounds and other inhuman acts. Also acting upon an order of a Government or a superior would not relieve the perpetrator of criminal responsibility and should not be a defence. Obedience to superior orders could, however, be considered a mitigating factor should the Tribunal determine that justice so requires.

The Secretary-General was asked to made practical arrangements for effective functioning of the Tribunal, which would be located at the Hague.

It may also be noted here that on 28th May, 1993, too two items on the tribunal's financing and on election of its Judges were added to the agenda of the General Assembly's forty-seventh session.

On 17th November, 1993, the 11 member International Tribunal for Crimes in the former Yugoslavia was inaugurated at the Peace Palace in the Hague, Netherlands. The two-week first session of the Tribunal was held from 17th to 30th November, 1993. Judge Antonio Cassese of Italy was elected President of the Tribunal. During its two week session, the Tribunal also considered proposed rules of procedure and evidence. Earlier, Roman Escvar Salom of Venezuela was appointed Tribunal Prosecutor by the Security Council vide its resolution 877 (1993) of 21st October, 1993.

The first extraditions of suspected was criminals from former Yugoslavia were made on 12th February, 1995. A Bosnian Serb General and Colonel spent their first day in Dutch Jail on 13th February, 1995 after NATO, acting on the request of U.N. War Crimes Tribunal for former Yugoslavia, flew them out of Sarjeevo on 12th February, 1995. They had been detained two weeks ago by Muslim led government and accused them of committing war crimes on the other hand the Serbs were annoyed and pointed out that their names were not among the 52 indicted by the Tribunal. Prosecutors could not decide within weeks whether to indict or release General Djordje Djukic and Colonel Aleksa Krasmanovic.

Establishment of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.—Expressing its grave concern at the reports indicating that genocide and other systematic widespread and flagrant violations of international humanitarian law have been committed in Rwanda and determined to put an end to such crimes and take effective measures to bring to justice who are responsible for them, the Security Council on November 8, 1994, decided to establish an International Tribunal for Rwanda for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other such violations of International humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and neighbouring states between 1st January, 1994 and 31st December, 1994 and to adopt the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda. The Security Council established the Statute under Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter.

After the establishment of the International Tribunal for Prosecution of Violators of International Humanitarian Law in former Yugoslavia, it is the second tribunal of its kind and will not only contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace but will also prove to be a deterrent and an eye-opener for others.

On November 8, 1994, the Security Council decided to adopt the Statute of the International Tribunal for Rwanda. Prior to this the Security Council had received the request of the Government of Rwanda to establish the said Tribunal for the sole purpose of prosecuting persons responsible for genocide and other serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of neighboring States between January 1, 1994 and December 31, 1994. The Security Council established the Statute acting under Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter. The Tribunal delivered its first judgement in September 1998. It found Jean Paul Akayesu, the former Mayor of Taba, guilty of genocide and crime against humanity the Tribunal also found Jean Kambananada, former Prime Minister of Rwanda, guilty of genocide and crimes against humanity and sentenced him to life imprisonment.

---

[63] See Resolution 827 (1993).

United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime.—This convention was adopted by the United Nations in November, 2000.[64] U.N. Convention Against Transnational Crimes, 2000 has 185 countries as of January 2015. The purpose of this convention is to promote cooperation to prevent and combat transnational organized crime more effectively.[65] Defining the term "organized criminal group", Article 2(a) of the Convention states that it shall mean conduct constituting an offence punishable by a maximum deprivation of liberty of at least four years or a more serious penalty. As regards scope of application, Article 3 of the Convention provides the following :

> "1. This Convention shall apply, except as otherwise stated herein, to the prevention, investigation and prosecution of :
>
> (a) The offences established in accordance with Articles 5, 6, 8 and 23 of this Convention; and
>
> (b) Serious crimes as defined in Article 2 of this Convention where offence is transnational in nature and involves an organized criminal group.
>
> 2. For the purpose of paragraph 1 of this article, an offence is transnational in nature if—
>
> (a) it is committed in more than one State ;
>
> (b) it is committed in one State but a substantial part of its preparation, planning, direction or control takes place in another state ;
>
> (c) it is committed in one State but involves an organized criminal group that engages in criminal activities in more than one State;
>
> (d) it is committed in one State but has substantial effects in another State."

Articles 5, 6, 8 and 23 referred to above deal with criminalization of participation in an organized crime, criminalization of laundering of proceeds of crime, criminalization of corruption and criminalization of obstruction of justice respectively.

It is also provided in the Convention that States Parties shall cooperate closely with one another, consistent with respective domestic legal and administrative systems, to enhance the effectiveness of law enforcement action to combat the offences covered by this Convention.[66]

The Convention provides for the establishment of a conference of the Parties to the Convention to improve the capacity of States Parties to combat transnational organized crime and to promote and review the implementation of the Convention.[67] As regards the Secretariat, it is provided that the Secretary-General of the United Nations shall provide the necessary Secretariat services to the conference of the Parties to the Convention.[68]

The Convention shall be open to all States for signature from 12 to 15 December, 2000 in Palermo, Italy, and thereafter at United Nations Head quarters in New York until 12 December, 2002.[69] The Convention shall enter into force on the ninetieth day after the date of deposit of the fortieth instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession.[70]

---

[64] See U.N.G.A. Doc. A/55/383.

[65] Article 1 of the Convention.

[66] Article 27.

[67] Article 32.

[68] Article 33.

[69] Article 36.

On November 15, 2000, the Convention was adopted by the U.N. General Assembly. The Convention entered into force on 29th September, 2003. To supplement the convention two protocols—(1) Protocol to Prevent Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children; (2) Protocol Against Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air also tackle specific areas of transnational organized crimes that are of particular concern to U.N. member states. So far 176 countries have became parties to the Convention. India had signed and ratified this Convention in 5 May, 2011.

Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking Persons, Especially Women and Children.—The above-mentioned convention against Transnational Organized Crime (2000) in its Article 37 provided that this Convention may be supplemented by one or more protocols. In order to become a party to a protocol, a State or a regional economic integration organization must be a party to this Convention. A State Party is not bound by a protocol unless it becomes a party to the protocol in accordance with the provisions thereof. Further, any protocol to the Convention shall be interpreted together with this Convention, taking into account the purpose of the protocol.

The purposes of the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children are—

(a) to prevent and combat trafficking in persons, paying particular attention to women and children ;

(b) to protect and assist the victims of such trafficking with full respect for their human rights ; and

(c) to promote cooperation among State Parties in order to meet those objectives.[71]

As regards the scope of application, the Protocol shall apply, except as otherwise stated herein, to the prevention and prosecution of offences established in accordance with Article 5 of this Protocol, where those offences are transnational in nature and involve an organized criminal group as well as to the protection of victims of such offences.[72]

The Protocol remained open all States for signatures from 12 to 15 December, 2000 in Palermo, Italy, and thereafter at United Nations Head quarters in New York until 12 December, 2002. The Protocol is subject to ratification, acceptance or approval which shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations.[73] The Protocol shall enter into force on the ninetieth day after the date of deposit of the fortieth instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession but it shall not enter into force before the entry into force of the Convention.[74]

The Protocol become effective on 25 December, 2003. So far 173 countries have become parties to this Protocol.

Protocol Against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air.—Relation of this Protocol with the U.N. Convention against Transnational organised Crime, its entry into force, binding effect on State Parties and interpretation are similar to that of the above Protocol i.e. Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children.

The purpose of the Protocol Against Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air is to prevent and combat the smuggling of migrants, as well as to promote co-operation among States Parties to that end, while protecting the rights of smuggled migrants.[75]

---

[70] Article 38.
[71] Article 2.
[72] Article 4.
[73] Article 16.
[74] Article 17.
[75] Article 2 of the Protocol.

As regards scope of application of the Protocol, it is provided that the Protocol shall apply, except otherwise stated in the Protocol, to the prevention, investigation and prosecution of the offences established in accordance with Article 6 of this Protocol, where the offences are transnational in nature and involve an organized criminal group, as well to the protection of the rights of the persons who have been the object of offences.[76]

As with the above earlier Protocol, this Protocol also was opened to all States for signature from 12 to 15 December, 2000 in Palermo, Italy, and thereafter at the United Nations Head quarters in New York until 12 December, 2002.[77] This Protocol shall enter into force on the ninetieth day after the date of deposit of the fortieth instrument of ratification, acceptance, approval or accession except that it shall not enter into force before the entry into force of the U.N. Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime.[78]

It entered into force on 28th January, 2004. It had 166 countries as of December 2014.

Reference may also be made here, as noted above, Protocol against Illicit Manufacturing and Trafficking in Fire-arms, their parts, components and ammunition. This protocol entered into force on 3rd July, 2005. As of May, 2019, it has been ratified by 117 countries (including 116 States and the European Union)

---

[76] Article 4.
[77] Article 21.
[78] Article 22.

CHAPTER 26

INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CO-OPERATION AND THE EVOLUTION OF A NEW INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC ORDER

Introduction.—"Since war begins in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defence of peace must be constructed." [1] Order and peace require a certain degree of economic and social stability. "Economic and social inequalities are in part responsible for the failure to preserve peace and that economic and social factors are interwoven in the whole fabric of international relationships................."[2] Thus, to ensure world peace it is necessary to solve the economic and social problems of the world. It is well known that poverty breeds insecurity. It also breeds envy and provokes tensions. A combination of these elemental urges can jeopardise the efforts to maintain international peace and security.[3] Many of the tensions in the world are the outcome of fundamental economic maladjustments and conditions of economic disequalibrium. The ever-widening gap between the few developed countries and the numerous developing countries constitutes a major source of tension and insecurity. The present distribution of economic power in the world is imbalanced and unjust. More than two-thirds of the world's trade takes place among the developed countries themselves. Moreover, three-fourths of the world's income is generated in the developed countries.[4] The developing countries, therefore, want to change the traditional structure of international economic order. In July, 1964 the Secretary-General of the United Nations declared "a change of political dimension in the awareness of the need for a more organised international co-operation in the economic and financial field." [5] This awareness finds itself manifested in putting forward the concepts of 'economic decolonization', 'New International Economic Order' 'Collective economic security', 'Economic Rights and Duties, 'Collective developing world', 'self-reliance', etc. "The world has no choice but to move towards greater and greater global co-operation in economic, financial and technological spheres, simultaneously with the co-operation in the political field." [6]

U. N. Charter Provisions*.—The framers of the U. N. Charter were quite aware of the significance of the economic and social questions and recognised the importance of economic and social stability. The preamble of the Charter expresses the resolve 'to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom' and 'to employ international machinery for the promotion of the economic and social advancement of all peoples.' After having made this resolve, the Charter enlists the achievement of 'International co-operation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural or humanitarian character'[7] as one of the purposes of the U. N. It is also provided that the General Assembly shall initiate studies and make recommendations for the purpose of promoting international co-operation in the economic field.[8] The framers of the U. N. Charter attached so much importance to the International Economic and Social Co-operation that a Chapter (Chapter IX comprising of Articles 55 to 60) is exclusively devoted for this purpose. The most important Articles for the purpose of present

---

1. Preamble of the United Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO).
2. Stepren S. Godspeed, "The Nature and Function of International Organisation" (Second Edition, New York, Oxford University Press, 1967), p. 395.
3. K. B. Lall, "Economic Inequality and International Law", I.J.I.L., Vol. 14 (1974), p. 6 at p. 11.
4. P. Chandrasekhar Rao, "Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 351 at 352.
5. United Nations Press Release S.G./I.S.M./110, July 16, 1964, p. 2.
6. S. L. N. Sinha, "Three Decades of International Monetary Co-operation", India Quarterly, Vol. XXXII (1976), p. 121 at p. 139.

* See also for I.A.S. (1979) Q. No. 9(a).

7. Article 13.
8. Article 13 (1) (b).

discussion are Article 55 and 56. Article 55 provides : "With a view to the creation of conditions of stability and well being which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, the United Nations shall promote : (a) higher standard of living, full employment, and conditions of economic and social progress and development ; (b) solution of international economic, social, health and related problems..........." Under Article 56, all the members have pledged to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the organisation for the achievement of the purpose set forth in Article 55. It may be noted that recommendations under Articles 55 and 56, are not binding as such but the word "pledge" in Article 56 implies that the members are under obligation to co-operate for attainment of the purposes set forth in Article 55.[9] Article 56 thus constitutes a legal obligation upon members in respect of International Economic Co-operation. The objectives mentioned above for the attainment of the International Economic Co-operation are sought to be achieved through a structure provided by the Charter. This comprises mainly of the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, various subordinate Commissions and Committees, the Secretariat and the specialised Agencies. The Charter provides that responsibility for the discharge of functions of the Organisation relating to Inernational Economic and Social Co-operations (mentioned in Chapter IX) shall be vested in the General Assembly and under the authority of the General Assembly in the Economic and Social Council.[10]

Evolution of a New International Economic Order*

Background to the proposed New International Economic Order[11].— The ever-widening gap between the rich and poor nations, prevalent injustice and inequality among the nations in the field of economic matters and the persistent denial of rightful place to the Third World in the world economic order are some of the main reasons impelling the developing countries to make all out efforts to transform the existing world economic order which was devised and developed at a time when many of the developing countries did not even exist as independent States. The concept of new International Economic Order was envisaged by the developing countries when they realised that they had acquired a new bargaining strength which could enable them to force decisions so as to make some changes in their favour in the existing world economic order.

"The present world economic order is supposed to be guided by the operation of free market forces propelled by free competition and enterprise, and based on free movement of goods and services, including technology. In the field of trade, it has been governed by the so-called General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) principle of non-discrimination and free trade of fixed parties and dollar standard till recently. In practice, however, these principles have not been applied, in an untrammelled or consistent manner, but have been guided and manipulated in many respects. To take only a few examples, the industrialised countries have consistently tried to insulate their agriculture from competition, by seeking an exception of agriculture from the basic GATT rules in order to erect protectionist walls to shelter their agriculture. Under the name of free enterprise, transnational corporations, based in industrialized countries, control the production and trade of vital raw materials of the developing countries and other products through their cartel activities, tied purchasing, licensing devices, intra-corporate transfer pricing, arbitrary restrictions on exports by their subsidiaries in developing countries, etc. These selective departures have been made from the GATT principle of non-discrimination in order to promote intra-growth of groups of developed countries as in the case of European Economic Community (EEC), European Free Trade Association (EFTA) etc., and for forging neocolonialist links with groups of developing countries, as in the case of various exclusive trade arrangements between industrialized and developing counties. And the principles governing the international monetary system were unilaterally abrogated, once it was realized that fixed parties and dollar standard had served their historic purpose of triggering unprecedented growth and prosperity in the western world."[12]

---

[9] M. Goodrich and Edward Hombro, Charter of the U. N. (New York, N. Y. 1969), p. 381.

[10] Article 60 of the U. N. Charter.

* IAS (2008) Q. 5 (c).

[11] For background see also Chapter on "GATT" and "UNCTAD", in Part III of the book; See also "The IMF" and "The World Bank" discussed in chapter on "The Specialized Agencies."

Recently America has made initiatives to widen the scope of the GATT, The U. S. has been pushing for liberalised trade environment under GATT for services like banking and travel. But this idea has been opposed by India, Brazil and some other developing countries. The GATT was designed to deal with only trade in merchandise. On September 20,1986, at Punta Del Este (Uruguay), a global accord was made by the 92-nation GATT ministerial conference. India later on had conceded that she was not against discussing services so long as they were not placed under GATT. Thus India succeeded in keeping the negotiations on services outside the framework of GATT.

The hike in oil prices further caused unprecedented strain upon the economic of the non-oil exporting countries. In the beginning even the developed countries were adversely affected by it but "thanks to their economic and technological capabilities, most of these surpluses were recycled to the developed countries. It took the developed market only one year to restore the over all equilibrium of their balance of payments.[13] On the other hand, the developing countries who were already immersed in a crisis of survival "were confronted with unprecedented balance of payment deficits, due to the increase in the prices of oil, food, fertilizers and other manufactured imports from developed counries. Their balance of payment deficits reached a figure of $ 28 billion in 1974 and rose to $ 35 billion in 1975."[14] Even after a decade there has been no improvement in the situation. According to the Geneva based GATT annual report on international trade, world trade based on the GATT system was being threatened with losing confidence in the system itself. It may be noted that while the value and volume of world trade increased modestly by 1 per cent respectively over 1984, developing countries primary commodities other than crude oil earned 9.5 per cent less in dollar prices for their exports in 1985. The Group of 77 developing countries have therefore rightly criticized very sharply the industrialized countries advice to the developing countries to introduce internal economic reforms.

The emergence of large number of States since 1960 changed the structure of International community and this was bound to have its impact on the economic sphere also. "The accelerated emergence of new nations since 1960 and their enormous increase in political power has led to what has sometimes been called a 'revolution of rising expectations.' The developing nations now clamour for greater participation in world trade rather than the traditional handouts of financial aid and technical assistance.........."[15] It is in the context of these developments that the objective of the establishment of a New International Economic Order has acquired a special significance. The most significant achivements so far in this direction are the adoption of the Declaration on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order, Programme of Action and the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States.

(A) U. N. Declaration On The Establishment of A New International Economic Order

In order to solve problems posed by economic inequality prevalent in the world, the developing countries have given the call to establish a New International Economic Order. The demand for the establishment of a New International Economic Order was officially voiced for the first time at the UNCTAD-III Conference in Santiago (Chile) in 1972, by the developing countries. The developing countries demanded, inter alia, easier access to the markets of industrialized countries, for producer cartels of the developing countries, to enforce higher export prices, for limitation of the use of synthetics, for an integrated raw materials programme and for linking the developing countries export prices to their import prices. It was at the instance of the developing countries that the Sixth Special Session of the U. N. General Assembly was convened. The Sixth Special Session was devoted entirely to the consideration of matters relating to International Economic Co-operation. The most significant achievement of the Sixth Special Session was the U. N. Declaration on the Establishment of the New International Economic Order. This declaration was adoped without vote at the Plenary Meeting No. 2229 of the Sixth Special Session of the U. N. General Assembly on May 1, 1974.[16] Through this Declaration the Members of the U. N. have proclaimed their "United determination to work urgently for The Establishment of a New International Economic Order based on equity, sovereign equality, interdependence, common interest and co-operation among all States, irrespective of their economic and social system which shall correct inequalities and redress existing injustices, make it possible to eliminate the widening gap between the developed and the developing countries and ensure steadily accelerating economic and social development in peace and justice for present and future generations."

---

[12] M. Dubey, "Problems of Establishing a New International Economic Order", India Quarterly, Vol. XXXII, No. 3 (July—September, 1976), p. 269 at pp. 269-70.

[13] Ibid, at p. 271.

[14] Ibid.

[15] Robin C. A. White, "A New International Economic Order" I.C.L.O. Vol. 24 July 1975, p. 524 at p. 531.

The U. N. Declaration on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order[17] noted that the developing countries, which constitute 70 per cent of the world population, account for only 30 per cent of the world's income. It has proved impossible to achieve an even and balanced development of the international community under the existing international economic order. The gap between the developing and developed countries continues in a system which was established at a time when most of the developing countries did not even exist as independent States and which perpetuates inequality. Further, the present international economic order is in direct conflict with current developments in international political and economic relations. Since 1976, the world economy has experienced a series of grave crises which have had severe repercussions, especially on the developing countries because of their generally greater vulnerability to external economic impulses. The developing world has become a powerful factor that makes its influence felt in all fields of international activity. These irreversible changes in the relationship of forces in the world necessitate the active, full and equal participation of the developing countries in the formulation and application of all decisions that concern the international community. All these changes have thrust into prominence the reality of interdependence of all the members of the world community. Current events have brought into sharp focus the realization that the interests of the developed countries and the interest of the developing countries can no longer be isolated from each other, that there is closer inter-relationship between the prosperity of the developed countries, and the growth and development of the developing countries, and that the prosperity of the international community as a whole depends upon the prosperity of its constituent parts. International Co-operation for development is the shared goal and common duty of all countries. Thus the political, economic and social well-being of present and future generation depends more than ever on co-operation between all members of International Community on the basis of sovereign equality and the removal of the disequilibrium that exists between them.

The declaration also mentioned the principles on which the new International Economic Order should be founded. The principles mentioned are : (a) Sovereign equality of States, self-determination of all peoples inadmissibility of the acquisition of territories by force, territorial integrity and non-interference in the internal affairs of other States; (b) Broadest co-operation of all the member-States of the international community, based on equity, whereby the prevailing disparities in the world may be banished and prosperity secured for all; (c) Full and effective participation on the basis of equality of all countries in the solving of world economic problems in the common interest of all countries, bearing in mind the necessity to ensure the accelerated development of all the developing countries, while devoting particular attention to the adoption of special measures in favour of the least-developed, land-locked and island-developing countries as well as those developing countries most seriously affected by economic crisis and natural calamities, without losing rights of other developing countries; (d) Every country has the right to adopt the economic and social system that it deems to be the most appropriate for its own development and not to be subjected to discrimination of any kind as a result; (e) Full permanent sovereignty of every State over its natural resources and all economic activities. In order to safeguard these resources, each State is entitled to exercise effective control over them and their exploitation which means suitable for its own situation, including the right to nationalization or transfer of ownership to its nations this right being an expression of full permanent sovereignty of the State. No State may be subjected to economic, political, or any other type of correction to prevent the free and full exercise of this inalienable right; (f) All States, territories and peoples under foreign occupation alien and colonial domination or apartheid have the right to restitution and full compensation for the exploitation and depletion of, and damages to the natural and other resources of those States, territories and peoples; (g) Regulation and supervision of the activities of transnational corporations by taking measures in the interest of the national economies of the countries where such transnational corporation operate on the basis of the full sovereignty of those countries; (h) Right of the developing countries and the peoples of territories under colonial and racial domination and foreign occupation to achieve their liberation and to regain effective control over their natural resources and economic activities; (i) Extending of assistance to developing countries, peoples and territories under colonial and alien domination, foreign occupation, racial discrimination or apartheid or which are subject to economic, political or any other type of measures to coerce them in order to obtain from the subordination of the exercise of their sovereign rights and to secure from them advantages of any kind, and to neo-colonialism in all its forms and which have established or are endeavouring to establish effective control over their natural resources and economic activities that have been or are still under foreign control; (j) Just and equitable relationship between the prices of raw materials, primary products, manufactured and semi-manufactured goods exported by developing countries and the prices of raw materials, primary commodities manufactures, capital goods and equipment imported by them with the aim of bringing about sustained improvement in their unsatisfactory terms of trade and expansion of the world economy; (k) Extension of active assistance to developing countries by the whole international community, free of any political or military conditions; (1) Ensuring that one of the main aims of the reformed international, monetary system shall be the promotion of the development of the developing countries and the adequate flow of real resources to them; (m) Improving the competitiveness of natural materials facing competition from synthetic substitutes; (n) Preferential and non-reciprocal treatment of developing countries whenever feasible, in all fields of international economic co-operation wherever feasible ; (o) Securing favourable conditions for the transfer of financial resources to developing countries; (p) To give to the developing countries access to the achievements of modern science and technology, to promote the transfer of technology and the creation of indigenous technology for the benefit of the developing counries in forms and in accordance with procedures which are suited to their economics; (q) Necessity for all States to put an end to the waste of natural resources including food products; (r) The need for developing countries to concentrate all their resources for the cause of development; (s) Strengthening—through individual and collective action—of mutual economic, trade, financial and technical co-operation among the developing countries mainly on a preferential basis; and (t) Facilitating the role which producers' associations may play within the framework of international co-operation, and in pursuance of their aims, inter alia, assisting in promotion of sustained growth of world economy and accelerating development of developing countries.

---

[16] For the text of the Resolution see Foreign Affairs Reports, Vol. XXIII, No. 6 (June 1974), pp. 119-22; U. N. Press Release GA/5022, May 2, 1974.

[17] Hereinafter referred as "the Declaration."

The Declaration further provided that U. N. as a universal Organisation should be capable of dealing with problems of international economic co-operation in a comprehensive manner and ensuring equally the interest of all countries. It must have an even greater role in the establishment of a new international economic order. Finally, the members of the U. N. expressed the hope that the Declaration shall be one of the most important basis of economic relations between all peoples and nations.

(B) Programme of Action on the establishment of A New International Economic Order

The Sixth Special Session of the General Assembly also adopted a resolution entitled, "Programme of Action on the Establishment of New International Economic Order.[18] The strategies to establish the new economic order were mentioned in detail in the Action Programme. A special programme was provided to mitigate the difficulties of the developing countries most seriously affected by the sharp hike in the prices of oil and other essential commodities. As regards raw materials, the action programme suggested 'recovery, exploitation, development, marketing and distribution of natural resources' which belonged to them and for facilitating the functioning of producers, associations, it advocated 'joint marketing arrangements, 'orderly commodity trading', etc., with a view to ensure increase of the share of developing countries in world trade, it suggested measures, such as, equitous pricing policies, expeditious commodity agreements, greater use of natural resources in preference to synthetic materials and compensatory financing scheme. The Action Programme made recommendation for the improvement of food and nutrition situation in the poor countries, promotion of equitable participation of developing countries in world shipping, etc. Finally, it envisaged the strengthening of the role of the U. N. system in the field of international economic co-operation.[19]

(C) The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties

Background.—The credit for initiating the discussion and elaborating the economic rights and duties of States goes to the UNCTAD. At the third session of the UNCTAD held at Santiago (Chile) in April, 1972, President of Mexico put forward the following proposal : "We must strengthen the precarious legal foundations of the international economy. A just order and a stable world will not be possible until we create obligations and rights which protect the weaker States. Let us take economic co-operation out of the realm of goodwill and put it into the realm of the law.[20] On 18th May, 1972, a resolution[21] was adopted by the UNCTAD whereby it decided to prepare the text of a draft Charter of Economic Rights and Duties and for this purpose of a working group comprising of governmental representatives of 31 member States was formed. The membership of this group was subsequently enlarged to 41 by the General Assembly through a resolution[22] dated 19th December, 1972. The developed and the developing countries were given equal representation in the working group. The group was expected to complete the work in 1973 in two sessions. Due to the complex nature of the work, it could not be completed in 1973 and the Group held four Sessions in between February, 1973 and June, 1974. Mr. Jorge Castaneda acted as the Chairman of the Working Group. Even the Fourth Session failed to adopt to generally agreed text. The developed countries wanted the Working Group to continue its efforts so as to narrow down the areas of disagreement and to produce a generally acceptable text. But this proposal was rejected by the Second Committee of the General Assembly.[23] The developed countries realized that if the discussion were prolonged further, they might widen the areas of disagreement instead of narrowing them. They, therefore, decided to present the text before the Special Session of the General Assembly. Thus the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties was finally adopted by the General Assembly on 12th December, 1974. More than two-thirds of the Charter received general support and only six countries voted against the Charter as a whole. The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties[24] was adopted by a roll-call vote of 120 in favour to 6 against with 10 abstentions. Belgium, Denmark, The Federal Republic of Germany, Luxemburg, the U. K. and the U. S. voted against the Charter. Austria, Canada, France,

---

[18] G. A. Resolution 3202 (S-VI), 16th May, 1974.

[19] See Rahmatullah Khan, "The Struggle for World Resources", Foreign Affairs Reports, Vol. XXIV, No. 7 (July, 1975), p. 101 at pp. 112-113; see also Ibid, "International Law—Old and New", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 371 at pp. 378-79.

[20] A/PV 2315, p. 67.

[21] Resolution 35 (III).

[22] Resolution 3037 (XXVII) of 19th December, 1972.

[23] A/C/L. 1419.

[24] Hereinafter referred as "the Economic Charter."

Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan the Netherlands, Norway and Spain abstained from voting. Australia, Finland, Greece, Iceland, Portugal, New Zealand, Sweden, China and the Socialist countries were among the developed countries who voted in favour of the Economic Charter as a whole.

Since the developed countries' suggestion to prolong the discussion so as to narrow down the areas of disagreement was not accepted by the developing countries and they hastened to adcpt the Charter despite opposition of the developed countries in respect of some of the important provisions of the Charter, some developed countries, particularly the U. S. apparently felt "oppressed" by the "tyranny of the majority". But this was countered by the Mexican representative in the following words : 'There was not tyranny of the majority for all were patiently heard. Furthermore, it should be expressly said that majority tyranny if indeed it exists, is a bad thing, but minority is even worse, and is what existed during the early years of the organisation when others were the tyrants governing of the destiny of the United Nations.[25]

However, the developed countries who voted against the Charter argued that although they were small in number, they occupied a significant place in the field of International Economic Relations and as such their views could not be ignored. In other words, they meant that so far as International Economic relations were concerned, they were essential states and unless their support was extended, the Charter could not achieve its objective.[26] To some extent atleast it cannot be denied that the Economic Charter can have universal application only after it is supported by a few most developed countries including the U. S. However, it may be observed that public opinion being the ultimate and greatest sanction behind International Law, and for that matter behind any law, in the course of time the said developed countries may also be compelled to accept the majority view and support the Charter. Thus the Economic Charter represents a significant stage in the development of International Economic Law despite the fact that some 'essential states' or the States which really matter in the field of International Economic relations, have not supported it. It is bound to have the desired impact on the International Economic Co-operation.

Structure of Economic Charter.—The preamble of the Resolution which adopted the Economic Charter stressed the fact that "the Charter shall constitute an effective instrument towards the establishment of a new system of International Economic Relations based on equity, sovereign equality and interdependence of the interests of developed and developing countries." [27] The Economic Charter comprises of 34 Articles and a preamble.[28] The preamble declared that the fundamenal purpose of this Charter is to promote the establishment of the new international economic order, based on equity, sovereign equality, interdependence, common interest and co-operation among all States, irrespective of their economic and social systems. The preamble also emphasised the need to establish and maintain a just and equitable economic and social order through :— (a) the achievement of more rational and equitable international economic relations and the encouragement of structural changes in the world economy; (b) the creation of conditions which permit the further expansion of trade and intensification of economic co-operation among all nations; (c) the strengthening of economic independence of developing countries; and (d) the establishment and promotion of international economic relations taking into account the agreed difference in development of the developing countries and their specific needs.[29]

---

[25] A/PV. 2315.

[26] As pointed out by Prof. Leo Gross : "A treaty, though formulating principles intended for universal application, will not achieve this objective unless it is supported by the Essential States. Essential States, in this context, refers to States without whose consent and acceptance the Treaty is not likely to achieve its intended purpose. Thus a convention along the lines of the principle adopted by the 1964 UNCTAD conference, even if accepted by the very large number of States, will not be productive unless it is also accepted by the very small number of economically developed countries. Law and politics can never be completely divorced." Sources of "Universal International Law", in Asian States and the Development of Universal International Law, edited by R. P. Anand, (1972), p. 189 at p. 196.

[27] See Resolution 3081 (XXIX), dated 12th December, 1974.

[28] For text of the Economic Charter; see U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XII, No. 1 (January 1975), pp. 108-18.

The Charter is divided into four Chapters, namely, Fundamentals of International Economic Relations, Economic Rights and Duties, Common Responsibility Towards the International Community and Final Provisions.

Fundamental Principles.—Chapter I provides that the economic as well as political and other relations among States shall be governed inter alia by the following principles :

(a) Sovereign, territorial integrity and political independence of States; (b) Sovereign equality of all States; (c) Non-aggression; (d) Non-intervention; (e) Mutual and equal benefit; (f) Peaceful Co-existence; (g) Equal rights and self-determination of people; (h) Peaceful settlement of disputes; (i) Remedying of injustices which have brought about by force and which deprive a nation of natural means necessary for its normal development; (j) Fulfilment in good faith of international obligation; (k) Respect for human-rights and fundamental freedoms; (l) No attempt to seek hegemony and spheres of influence; (m) Promotion of International Social Justice; (n) International co-operation for development; (o) Free access to and from sea by land-locked countries within the framework of the above principles.

"By and Large, the general principles are derived directly or indirectly from the Charter of the United Nations (e.g., Articles 1 and 2)";[30] However, there was great controversy regarding principles (f) i.e., peaceful co-existence and (i) i.e., remedying of injustices which have been brought about by force and which deprive a nation of the natural means necessary for its normal development and some developed countries voted against it. Yet another principle which aroused controversy was the principle (o) i.e., relating to free access to and from the sea by the land-locked countries. Some countries including India had reservations to this principle. India and some seven other nations abstained from voting on this point. These countries were of the view that land-locked countries can be utilized by certain big powers for subversion of free nations. They recommended that access to and from sea should be a matter for bilateral negotiations and settlement. As pointed out by an author,[31] the land-locked countries numbering about 30 "have a legitimate concern to secure access to and from the sea, such access cannot obviously be an absolute one. Since such access involves transit over the territory of another sovereign State, the equally legitimate rights and interests of that State shall have to be fully respected. Consequently, the question of access must necessarily be regulated by mutual discussion and agreement between the land-locked and the transit States directly concerned and cannot be brought within the straight-jacket of a simple formulation as has been attempted in sub-paragraph (o). Besides, the question of access was also before the United Nations Conference of the Law of the Sea. It was in view of these considerations that certain developing countries including India abstained from the voting on sub-paragraph (o). Nepal and some other land-locked countries sought to interpret this paragraph as giving the whole hog and implying the right of free access to and from the sea of the land-locked countries,[32] an assertion which seems to go beyond even actual provisions of the Economic Charter. Besides, the so-called free access is subject to the other principles established in Chapter I such as, for instance, the principle of respect for the sovereignty of States and fulfilment in good faith of international obligations including those assumed in bilateral agreement between the land-locked and transit countries concerned. India's observations[33] in the General Assembly that, 'In our understanding the present Charter does not elevate access to and from the sea of land-locked countries to the level of a right under International Law, nor could it effect any way the present legal position on the subject' reflect on the correct legal position in the matter deserve a mention here." Some developed countries including the U. S., U. K. and France put forward a proposal that the principles enshrined in Chapter I should be treated as "directory instead of mandatory" but the same was rejected.

---

[29] For text of the Economic Charter; see U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XII, No. 1 (January 1975), at p. 109.

[30] P. Chandrasekhara Rao, "Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States", I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 351 at p. 356.

[31] Ibid, at pp. 357-58.

[32] A/PV 3216, 27-30; Emphasis supplied.

[33] A/PV 2316, 3-5.

Economic Rights and Duties of States

Due to the paucity of the space it will not be possible to discuss critically all the Economic Rights and Duties of the States. However, an endeavour will be made to discuss briefly the more important Rights and Duties of the States incorporated in the Economic Charter. Chapter II which describes the Economic Rights and Duties of States forms "the essence of the Economic Charter." It may be noted here that there was general agreement in respect of a number of Rights and Duties mentioned in Chapter II and they were, therefore, unanimously adopted. Such rights and duties are contained in Articles 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 17, 18, 21, 22, 25 and 27. There was, however disagreement in respect of more important rights and duties contained in other Articles. Some of the more important rights and duties are being discussed below :

(1) Permanent Sovereignty over Wealth and Natural Resources.—Article 2, para 1 of the Economic Charter provides that every State shall "freely exercise full permanent sovereignty including possession, use and disposal, over all its wealth, natural resources and economic activities." There was no dispute in respect of the principle of full permanent sovereignty of natural resources but the developed countries objected to the words "wealth" and "economic activities." They contended that if a State transferred a portion of its wealth in some foreign country, the above principle could be interpreted to mean that the State would still retain full permanent sovereignty over such wealth. On this ground nine developed countries including U. S., U. K., Canada, France, Japan, the Federal Republic of Germany voted against this principle.[34]

(2) Foreign Investment.—The Economic Charter provided that each State has the right to regulate and exercise authority over foreign investment within its national jurisdiction in accordance with its laws and regulations and in conformity with its national objectives and priorities. No State shall be compelled to grant preferential treatment to foreign investment.[35] Obviously this principle was against the interest of the developed countries. Ten developed countries therefore, voted against this principle.[36] While the developing countries wanted full control over foreign investment, the developed countries in view of their interests emphasised the "International obligations" of States in respect of foreign investment.[37]

(3) Transnational Corporations.—Multinational Corporations have emerged as dominant factors on the International Economic scene during the last quarter of a century. "The main object of any Multinational Corporation anywhere is to maximise its profits and any impediment that comes in its way of maximising profit, is resented and for this purpose sometimes interference is resorted to. Political interference has been widely reported in other countries........."[38] In the view of an Indian economist, Mr. V. K. Narasimhan, "The very fact that a Multinational Corporation has enormous resources creates suspicion. Some of the revelations about the big Multinational Companies have shown how they tried to influence foreign government. These have created a certain climate of antagonism to the MNCs." [39]

According to Prof. Vernon, "Multinational enterprise is a parent company that controls a large cluster, appears to have access to common pool of human and financial resources and seen responsive to elements of common strategy.[40] This concept of MNC's was accepted by the group of Eminent Persons appointed by the Secretary-General in pursuance of a resolution of the Economic and Social Council to consider the role of MNC" and their impact on development and international relations.[41] Mr. L.K. Jha of India acted as the Chairman of the Group. On the basis of the recommendations of the Group, the U. N. has recently set up two bodies in this connection and has renamed 'multinationals' as 'transnationals.'

---

[34] A/C 2/SR, 1648 : pp. 38-39; see also A/PV, 2315, 56.

[35] Article 2 (a).

[36] A/C 2/SR 1648, pp. 39-40.

[37] See A/PV, 2315, 56 and A/C 2/SR 1649, p. 21.

[38] V. Gauri Shanker, "The Performance of Transnational Corporations in India" India Quarterly, Vol. XXXIII, No. 2 (April—June, 1977), p. 180 at p. 187.

[39] "Whither Multinations ?" Span Vol. XVIII, No. 6 (June 1977), p. 29.

[40] Raymond Vernon, Sovereignty at Bay, (New York, 1971), p. 4.

Despite the widespread apprehensions and suspicions about the role of the Transnationals and their real objectives allegedly neo colonialism, they "are economic phenomenon of the twentieth century which no one-can wish away except at the cost of remaining on a Robinson Crusoe's Island in an ocean of prosperity." [42]

"Obviously, one would not want multinations to control one's scarce mineral resources. At the same time, their technology in such things as offshore drilling, as well as in some of the derivative of oil is something which one would not wish to deny oneself. One solution which in fact is already in operation would be to set up a contractual relationship with them paying for their services on an agreed basis and allowing them the requisite measure of technical control, but not proprietary control.[43]

It is in this context that the developing States want to exercise full control over transnational corporations. That is why, they were keen to include it as a right in the Economic Charter. Economic Charter, therefore, recognises under Article 2 (b) that each State has the right : "to regulate and supervise the activites of transnational corporations within its national jurisdiction and take measures to ensure that such activities comply with its laws, rules and regulations and conform with its economic and social policies. Transnational Corporations shall not intervene in the internal affairs of a host State. Every State should, with full regard to its sovereign rights, cooperate with other States in the exercise of the right set forth in this sub-paragraph." Since most of the Transnational Corporations originate in the developed countries, this above right of the States conflicts directly with their interests. They, therefore, wanted adequate protection of the interests of Transnational Corporations. They were of the view that the transnational corporations should atleast have the same obligations and rights which any other foreign person enjoys in the host State. Since this was not conceded by the developing countries, U. S., U. K., Federal Republic of Germany and Japan voted against Article 2 (b).[44] But "An essential ingredient in the view International Economic Order, therefore is a set of policies to curb the monopolistic practices of the transnational corporations, especially in trade. Policies for the elimination of cartels and of exclusive dealing arrangements would have to be adopted and greater flexibility introduced in territorial markets and produce allocation arrangements." [45]

(4) Nationalisation and Expropriation of Foreign Property.—On this subject, there are a number of resolutions passed by the General Assembly wherein the developing countries have asserted their rights. The Economic Charter simply reaffirms their position on this subject. The Economic Charter recognises the right of every State "to nationalise, expropriate or transfer ownership of foreign property in which case

---

41. See also, "Summary of the Hearings before the Group of Eminent Persons to Study the Impact of Multinational Corporations on Development and on International Relations" ST/ESA/15, 1974—a Secretariat study which served as a background paper for the Group; see also A. Jaya Govinda, "Report of the Group of Eminent Persons on Multinational Corporations : An Analysis", I.J.I.L., Vol. 4 (Oct.—Dec., 1975), p. 521.
42. V. Gauri Shanker, "The Performance of Transnational Corporations in India", India Quarterly, Vol. XXXIII (1977), p. 181 at p. 192.
43. L. K. Jha, "Multinations As a Source of Technology—For Developing Countries "India Quarterly, Vol. XXXIII (1970), p. 49 at pp. 54-55; See also Mrs. S. K. Verma, "Taxation of Multinational Corporations" I.J.I.L., Vol. 16 (1976), p. 93; V. Gauri Shanker, "Taxation of Foreign Companies—An Indian Perspective with Reference to Code of conduct for Transnational Corporations", I.J.I.L., Vol. 17 (1977), p. 21 ; R. S. Bhatt, "Problems of Transnational Corporation", I. Q., Vol. XXXIV (1978), p. 1 at pp. 15-16. Mrs. S. K. Verma, "Taxation of Multinational Corporations", I.J.I.L. Vol. 16 (1976) p. 93.
44. See A/C 2/SR 1648, pp. 40-41.
45. Janina Gomes, "UNCTAD-IV—And the New International Economic Order", Foreign Affairs Reports, Vol. XXV, No. 8 (August, 1976), p. 110 at p. 127.

appropriate compensation should be paid by the state adopting such measures, taking into account its relevant laws and regulation and all circumstances, that the State considers pertinent. In any case where the question of compensation gives rise to a controversy, it shall be settled under the domestic law of the nationalizing State and by its tribunals, unless it is freely and mutually agreed by all States concerned, that other peaceful means be sought on the basis of the sovereign equality of States and in accordance with the principle of free choice of means." [46]

This right generated a lot of controversy. It is significant to note that the developed countries did not dispute the right of States to nationalize or expropriate foreign property. Their main contention was that prompt, adequate and effective compensation or just compensation should be paid and in this respect they emphasised that State should fulfil in good faith their international obligations.[47] On the other hand, the developing countries accepted the principle of "appropriate compensation" but reserved to themselves the right to determine it, "taking into account its relevant laws and regulations and all relevant circumstances that the State considers pertinent" and in case of any controversy "to settle under the domestic law of the nationalizing State and by its tribunals." In view of this disagreement between the developing and the developed countries as many as 16 developed countries voted against Article 2 (c)." [48]

(5) Organisation of Primary Commodity Procedures.—Article 5 of the Economic Charter recognises the right of all States to associate in organisations of primary commodity producers in order to develop their national economic resources to achieve stable financing for their development, and in pursuance of their aims assisting in the promotion of sustained growth of the world economy in particular accelerating the development of developing countries. Corresponding all States have the duty to respect that right by refraining from applying economic and political measures that would limit it. The developed countries voted against this Article.[49] The developed countries were of the view that the commodity problems are the concern of the exporters and importers and should therefore, be planned and executed by them.[50] Since the developing countries possess most of the materials of the world and the developed countries import these raw materials and by the application of advanced technology finished goods are exported to developing countries there being no rational proportion between the price of the raw materials and the finished goods, organizations of primary commodity producers are expected to go a long way to protect their interest and to ensure stable financing for their development. It has been rightly observed : "There is clearly concern among the developed nations who import considerable quantities of raw materials that the success of the oil exporters will cause a succession of increases and cartels among producers of raw materials with its consequent problems of recycling the capital used to finance the purchases into the very economic form which it came so that economic collapse is avoided. But it is dificult to see the grounds upon which it can be argued that there is no right to associate. The economic repercussions are great but that alone cannot justify the denial of the right." [51]

(6) Transfer of Technology.—Article 13, para one of the Economic Charter recognises the right of every State to benefit from the advances and developments in science and technology for the acceleration of its economic and social development. It further provides that all States "should" promote international scientific and technological co-operation and the transfer of technology, with proper regard for all legitimate interest inter alia the rights and duties of holders, suppliers and recipients of technology." In particular, all States should facilitate the access of developing countries to the achievements of modern science and technology, the transfer of technology and the creation of indigenous technology for the benefit of the developing countries in forms and in accordance with procedures which are suited to their economies and their needs.[52] Accordingly, developed countries should co-operate with the developing countries in the establishment, strengthening and development of their scientific and technological infra structures and their scientific research and technological activities so as to expand and transform the economies of the developing countries.[53] Finally, all States should co-operate in exploring with a view to evolving, further internationally accepted guidelines or regulations for the transfer of technology taking fully into account the interest of developing countries.[54] The right relating to transfer of technology contained in Article 13 was unanimously adopted. This was probably due to the fact that this right has been expressed in general terms and in permissive language. Instead of the word 'shall', the world 'should' has been used.

---

[46] Article 2 (e).

[47] See A/C 2/SR 1938 pp. 5-6; A/C 2/L 1404.

[48] A/C, 2/SR 1648, p. 41; See also matter discussed in this connection under chapter on "State Responsibility."

[49] A/C 2/L 1406.

[50] For British and Canadian Views See A/C. 2/SR, 1650, p. 17 and A/C 2/SR 1649, p. 1 respectively.

[51] Robin C.A. White, "A New International Economic Order", I.C.L.Q., Vol. 24 (July, 1975), p. 542 at p. 549.

As pointed out in the preamble to the Programme of Action adopted in Vienna in 1979 by the U. N. Conference on the Science and Technology for Development, developed countries dominate the field of science and technology to the extent that around 95 per cent of research and development is executed by them, while developing countries which all represent 70 per cent of the global population have only 5 per cent of the world's research and development capacity. It may also be noted here that most of the technology is owned by multi-national corporations. The developing countries represented by the Group of 77 insist on the adoption of an international code relating to transfer of technology universally applicable. The resolution of the General Assembly which proclaimed the International Development strategy for the Third U. N. Development Decade also called upon States to finalise at an early date the adoption of an international code. Though such a code will have certain advantages, it is not "the complete answer to all the scientific needs of the L.D.C....mere import of technology does not ensure development."[55]

(7) Promotion, Expansion and Liberalization of World Trade.—The duty of each State for promotion expansion and liberalization of world trade finds mention in Article 14 which was also unanimously adopted. Article 14 provides that every State has the duty to co-operate in promoting a steady and increasing expansion and liberalization of world trade and an improvement in the welfare and living standard of all peoples, in particular of those developing countries. Accordingly, all States should co-operate inter alia, towards the progressive dismantling of obstacles to trade and the improvement of the international framework for the conduct of world trade and to these ends, co-ordinated efforts shall be made to solve in an equitable way the trade problems of all countries taking into account the specific trade problems of the developing countries.

(8) Utilization of Resources Freed by Effective Disarmament Measures.—The Economic Charter recognises the duty of all States "to promote the achievement of general and complete disarmament under effective international control and utilize the resources freed by effective disarmament measures for the economic and social development of countries, allocating a substantial portion of such resources as additional means for the development needs of developing countries." [56] This principle may be traced back to the General Assembly Resolution 3176 (XXVIII) wherein it was approved by consensus. The developed countries including the U. S., the U. K., France and Federal Republic of Germany wanted this Article to be omitted but their proposal was rejected.[57] The developed countries neither appreciated the link between disarmament and development nor were they prepared to accept any such obligation.

---

[52] Article 13, para 2.

[53] Article 13, para 3.

[54] Ibid., para 4.

[55] S. K. Agrawala, "Transfer of Technology to LDC's : Implications of the Proposed Code", I.J.I.L., Vol. 23 (1983) p. 246 at p. 263.

[56] Article 15.

[57] A/C 2/SR 1648, pp. 7-8.

(9) Elimination of Colonialism, Apartheid, Racial Discrimination, Neo-colonialism and Restitution and Full Compensation for Exploitation of the Natural and Other Resources of the Territory affected.—Article 16 of Part I of the Charter provides that it is the right and duty of all States, individually and collectively, to eliminate colonialism, apartheid, racial discrimination, neo-colonialism and all forms of foreign aggression, occupation and domination and the economic and social consequences thereof as a prerequisite for development. States which practise such coercive policies are economically responsible to the countries, territories and peoples affected for the "restitution and full compensation for the exploitation and depletion of and damages to, the natural and all other resources of those countries, territories and peoples. It is the duty of all States to extend assistance to them. Further, no State has the right to promote or encourage investments that may constitute an obstacle to the liberation of a territory occupied by force." [58] The concept of payment of compensation to the colonial people, victims of racial discrimination and those affected by foreign aggression was strongly opposed by imperialist powers like U. K. and France. "It is only natural and logical that the developing countries are pressing for the former colonial powers to return their plundered riches to their rightful owners the peoples of Asia, Africa and Latin America. Essentially, this is a matter of imperialism making historical repression for its oppression, exploitation and robbery of the peoples of the former colonies and semi-colonies. The economic declaration of the recent Non-aligned Summit explicitly and very justly states that peoples, countries and territories subjected in the past to colonial exploitation and plunder are entitled to reparation and full restitution for this exploitation and depletion of their natural resources." [59]

(10) Extension of Tariff Preferences.—Article 18 provides that the developed countries should extend, improve and enlarge the system of generalized non-reciprocal and non-discriminatory tariff preferences to the developing countries consistent with the relevant agreed conclusions and decisions as adopted on this subject, in the framework of the competent international organizations. Article 19 further provides that with a view to accelerating the economic growth of developing countries and bridging the economic gap between developed and developing countries, developed countries should grant generalized preferential, non-reciprocal and non-discriminatory treatment to developing countries in those fields of international economic co-operation where it may be feasible. These two Articles were also opposed by developed countries including the U.S., U. K and France.

(11) Most-Favoured-Nation Treatment.—The Economic Charter provides that all States have the duty to co-exist in tolerance and live together in peace, irrespective of difference in political, economic, social and cultural systems, and to facilitate trade between States having different economic and social systems. International trade should be conducted without prejudice to generalized non-discriminatory and non-reciprocal preferences in favour of developing countries on the basis of mutual advantage, equitable benefits and the exchange of "most favoured-nation treatment." [60] As many as 14 developed countries cast their votes against this principle.[61] Among the socialist countries, China and Albania also voted against this principle.

(12) Indexation of Prices.—The Economic Charter recognises the duty of all States "to co-operate in achieving adjustments in the prices of exports of developing countries in relation to prices of their imports so as to promote just and equitable terms of trade for them, in a manner which is remunerative for produces and equitable for producers and consumers." [62] This provision is very important for the developing countries because one of the main reasons for the existing economic inequality is the wide gap between the prices of exports and imports of goods. According to the studies made by the U. N., export of basic commodities of developing countries accounted for more than 75% of their total export in 1970. There has been no relation between the price of exports and those of imports while the prices of goods exported by developing countries have been constantly rising, the prices of goods imported by them have not risen significantly. For example, cost of cereals increased by 150 per cent and that of meat rose by 350 per cent. Similarly, the price of wheat doubled from July 1972 to July 1973, then again nearly doubled during the second half of 1973. The prices of fertilizers also doubled between June 1972 and September, 1973. The developed countries have made a great hue and cry over price hike in oil by Arab countries. But if one looks at the statistics and arguments of such countries, hike in prices of oil will not appear to be as un-reasonable as is made out.

---

[58] Article 16, para 2.

[59] A Vladmiroy, "On fair and Democratic Principles", New Times, Vol. 42 (October, 1976), p. 18 at p. 19.

[60] Article 26.

[61] A/C 2/SR, 1648, pp. 57-58.

[62] Article 28.

It is in this context that the developing countries included the principle of indexation of prices in the Charter. But the response of the developed countries was most discouraging and they greeted these proposals "with howls of anguish." While some developed countries proposed the deletion[63] of Article some others considered that such a principle was not desirable or feasible.[64]

Common Responsibilities towards the International Community.—Chapter III deals with the common responsibilities of States towards international community in respect of sea-bed and ocean floor and Environment. Chapter III comprises of only two articles—Articles 29 and 30.

Final Provisions.—Chapter IV entitled "Final Provisions" comprises of four articles—Articles 31 to 34. Article 31 emphasizes the inter-dependence of developed and developing countries for balanced expansion of the world economy. Article 32 deals with the prohibition of coercion in relation among states. Article 33 deals with inter-relationship between the Charter of the U. N. and the Economic Charter. Finally Article 34 provided for the review of Economic Charter in the XXX session of the General Assembly and thereafter on the agenda of every fifth session.

Significance of the Declaration on the establishment of a New International Economic Order, Programme of Action and the Economic Charter.*—Since the resolutions and declarations of the General Assembly are said to be generally of the recommendatory nature, it is pertinent to consider the significance of the Declaration, Programme of Action and Economic Charter which aim to establish a new international economic order. Strictly speaking a General Assembly resolution is only of recommendatory character and does not create binding obligations. But a resolution of the Assembly unanimously adopted or a resolution adopted unanimously interpreting the U. N. Charter may create legal implications. Similarly, if on a subject numerous resolutions are adopted unanimously or by overwhelming majorities, then all these resolutions taken together may create legal implications provided, of course, it is to attain the purposes of the U. N. and is not expressly prohibited under the Charter.[65] A resolution unanimously adopted or passed by a overwhelming majority declaring customary rules of international law or enunciating new rules of international law may have legal implications. It is also generally recognised that the resolutions of the General Assembly help in the evolution of general international law. It is in this context that the documents relating to the establishment of a new international economic order have to be studied.

It has been rightly pointed out, "In a strict legal sense, therefore, the Charter is a declaration of the General Assembly and will have the force which such declarations have. But it is a declaration of special significance. The value of the declaration has to be assessed in the context of the fact that 120 States supported its adoption.........Of course it has to be remembered that amongst the States which have voted against or abstained are most of the most developed States of the world to whom many of the obligations under the Charter have been addressed, and many of the amendments, though defeated, came from the very same countries.[66] Further, "Let it be said that the Charter is not based on complete mutuality and has not enunciated the existing rules of international law on economic relations. It aims at removing the imbalances in world economy, at bridging the gap between the developed and developing countries, and has accordingly laid down norms which could achieve the purpose. Naturally, some involve progressive development on the subject." [67]

---

[63] A/C 2/L, 1413.

[64] A/C, 2/SR 1649 p. 19.

* See also for C.S.E. (1983) Q. No. 6.

[65] J.A.C. Gutteridge, The U. N. in a Changing World (1969), p. 8.

As pointed out by another author,[68] "It is the assertion of political power by the developing nations that makes the Declaration, Programme of Action and Charter so important. Quite clearly the documents are not perfect and have met severe criticism from the highly industrialized nations, but they do present a comprehensive series of norm-creating statements on a new international law of co-operation in the sphere of economic rights and duties." Further, "The main criticism that can be levelled against the documents is that in some respects they appear to be based upon the first approach rather than the second. Nevertheless they will provide primary evidence and guidance for all nations of international legal norms governing international economic relations. It is not an overstatement to say that a new era in the international law of economic co-operation has arrived.[69] In the words of another eminent author,[70] "The Economic Charter represents the first systematic effort ever made to embody in a single and comprehensive document various economic rights and duties of States which have been explicitly or implicitly referred to in several multilateral treaties and resolutions of the United Nations and other related international organizations, and to build guidelines for future action in this field. It was never intended to be a complete instrument, but only a basic legal Code on economic principles.........Generally speaking, the General Assembly resolutions are only of a recommendatory nature. But they may by general agreement reflect the developments of general international law. The Economic Charter is something more than a mere programme of action such as the International Development strategy for the Second Development Decade or the one adopted at the Sixth Special Session of the General Assembly. Nor is it a convention or a treaty in a Technical sense. It lies somewhere in beween a mere programme and a treaty. The Economic Charter looks forward in the direction of laying the foundations for the evolution of a just and equitable economic law.[71]

Thus the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and the resolutions of the General Assembly relating to the establishment of a new international economic order "represent the radicalization of international relations and constitute the normative bases of the new international law that has come into being.[72] It is significant to note here that a number of rights and duties incorporated in the Economic Charter have been adopted unanimously. Many of the principles are such as have been explicitly or implicitly referred in a number of resolutions passed earlier by the General Assembly. Even in respect of the principles which have generated controversy between the developed and the developing countries, the controversy resolves not on the general principles but in respect of their implementation and specific obligation upon the developed countries. It would not be an overstatement to say that atleast in respect of the principles which have been adopted unanimously, the Economic Charter may be said to have created, to say the least, legal implication. Even if it is conceded that these documents have yet not established a new international economic order it cannot but be admitted that the Economic Charter has brought about a significant change in respect of the normative bases of international economic relations among nations and will hasten the establishment of a new international economic order.

---

[66] S. K. Agarwala. "The Emerging International Economic Order, I.C.I.L., Vol. 17 (1977), p. 261 at p. 273.

[67] Ibid, at p. 274.

[68] Robin C. A. White, "A New International Economic Order", I.C.L.O., Vol. 24 (July 1975) p. 542, at p. 552; emphasis supplied.

[69] Ibid; emphasis added.

[70] P. Chandrasekhara Rao, "Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States." I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 351 at pp. 369-70, emphasis supplied.

[71] Speaking on the significance of the Economic Charter, the Australian representative said "The Charter might have a significant effection on the development of international economic law; while it could not itself create law, it might influence the opinio juris and decisions by States on what their practice should be in the light of international law", A/C 2/SR 1650, p. 6.

[72] Rahmatullah Khan, International law—Old and New," I.J.I.L., Vol. 15 (1975), p. 371 at p. 379.

Eleventh Special Session of the General Assembly on new International Economic Order.—The eleventh Special Session of the General Assembly was held from 25th August to 15th September, 1980. The Assembly took note with satisfaction of the consensus reached on the text of the International Development Strategy for the Third United Nations Development Decade which was to come into effect and to be implemented from Ist January, 1981. During deliberations on the strategy, agreement was reached on a target level of 0.7 per cent of the gross national product of developed countries as official development assistance to developing countries. It was agreed that, that target should be achieved by 1985, but not later than the second half of the Decade, and that a target of 1 per cent should be reached as soon as possible thereafter. It was proposed that the first review and appraisal of progress made in implementation the strategy should be undertaken by the Assembly in 1984. However, the Special Session did not adopt the strategy. It was decided that the document would be considered by the thirty-fifth regular Assembly Session. Finally, the General Assembly on 5 December, 1980, proclaimed the Third United Nations Development Decade. It also approved the International Development Strategy emphasizing the most important objectives that should be pursued by Member States in implementing the goals of the Decade, starting 1 January, 1981. As regards action on New Economic Order, the General Assembly adopted a resolution (35/57) on the new International Economic Order and the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties by 134 to 1 votes with 12 abstentions.

Implications of the New International Economic Order.—The New International Economic order called by the U. N. General Assembly in 1947 would have following certain essential characteristics :

(1) It would support the development effort of poor countries in all areas by changing unfair and inadequate rules and regulation that now exist. Such changes would be particularly important in trade and monetary affairs where developing countries say that existing rules and regulations either actively discriminate against them or do so by not making allowance for their weakness.

(2) It would increase the share of developing countries in world industrial and agricultural production, including food, as well as in such areas as trade, transport and communications.

(3) It would change the patterns of trade, technology, flow, transport and communications from a primarily North-South orientation to one of more equal interchanges, one-sided dependence would be replaced by genuine interdependence.

(4) It would require States to behave according to an agreed Code in international economic relations. The norms of such behaviour have been set out in the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States, a seminal documents of the North South encounter. The aim of the charter is to ensure that small countries are not bullied out of their natural resources and that in decisions affecting them their views are considered.[73]

Conclusion.—The present structure of international economic relations does not accord with the key interests of most of the developing States. That is why the reconstruction of international economic intercourse on democratic lines and the establishment of a system of equal and mutually advantageous international economic co-operation is today among the problems in the focus of world attention. The existing system of international economic relations, in its character, may be said to be a transitional one.

In view of the wide gap between the views of the developed and the developing countries and even "confrontation" in respect of important matters, it has been pointed out that the respects for establishing a new international economic order do not appear to be particularly promising. In any case, it seems unlikely that a new world economic order will be brought about as a matter of conscious, well-planned and systematic global policy.[74] Although there are formidable difficulties in the establishment of a new International Economic Order, it would be wrong to say that nothing has so far been achieved in this connection. The Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States and the Declaration and Programme of Action on the Establishment of a New International Economic Order are the important documents which have been adopted by the General Assembly as a result of this struggle. These documents constitute the normative bases of the new international law that has come into being.

---

[73] U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XIX No. 9 (1982) pp. 37-38.

The present existing system of international economic relations being only a transitional one in character, the documents cited and discussed above may be reckoned as the first important stage in the establishment of a new international economic order. A number of principles incorporated in these documents have been adopted unanimously and to that extent they create legal implications. It is also significant to note that the realization that the West's writ cannot run any more on the Third World has dawned upon the developed countries, and therefore, slowly but steadily the developed countries are trying to accommodate the interests of developing countries. For example, in the Geneva Conference sponsored by the UNCTAD, the developed countries on April, 1977, agreed to establish a "Common Fund" to maintain commodity price stabilization. It may, however, be added that the concept as proposed by the developing countries who wanted a common fund to finance buffer stocks of 10 commodities to keep prices of 10% above are below a target price, was greatly diluted because the industrialized nations made it clear that the "Common Fund" must not interfere with the working of world markets and should not have control over commodity arrangements, which should be entered into between producer and consumer nations independently of the Fund. London Summit of 7 industrialized held in May, 1977, confirmed and further advanced the concept "Common Fund." However, the talks between the developed and the developing countries were completely deadlocked at the Paris Summit held in June, 1977, and no significant advancement could be made.[75]

The Cancun Summit (23-24) October, 1981).—The proposal for such a summit was put forward by Brandt Commission in 1980. This summit assumed significance in the context of the rigid attitude adopted by Mr. Ronald Reagan towards the developing countries since he assumed the office of the United States of America. Mr. Reagan was not in favour of North-South dialogue and wanted his allies to do the same. The Cancun Summit which was attended by 22 States 8 developed and 14 developing including India, brought about a change in the attitude of the U. S. The only significant achievement of this summit was that the doors for North-South dialogues would not be closed and that they would be held in future also on economic matter.

UNCTAD VII.—The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development held its seventh session from 6th July to 31st September, 1987 in Geneva. In the Conference certain procedures were agreed which, it may be hoped, may ease developing countries' burden of debts. A consensus was arrived at that talks should continue on this matter and that there should be division of responsibilities. It is a great achievement of the conference that on 14 July, 1987, Soviet Union announced that in order to bring about stability in the prices of commodities, it has decided to become a member of the 'Commodities Fund'. After joining of Soviet Union, the Fund has now 45 members and 84% of 47 crores of investment has been reached. Thus only 2% more investment is required for entry into force of the Fund. It is rightly hoped that soon this requirement will also be fulfilled. UNCTAD VII gave emphasis mainly on the point that an environment may be created by multilateral corporation so that international trade may be developed and promoted.

Brady Plan.—The problem of the constant increase of debts of developing countries has assumed serious magnitude. According to an estimate of the World Bank, by the end of year 1988, total amount of the debts of the third world has reached 1.3

---

[74] India Quarterly, Vol. XXXII, No. 3 (1976) pp. 287-88.

[75] See S. D. Muni, "The Paris Dialogue on International Economic Cooperation : The North's Strategy and the outcome" Foreign Affairs Reports, Vol. XXXV No. 10 (October 1977), p. 205 at pp. 210-11.

billion. This amount is 50 per cent of the national production of these countries. The U. S. Treasury Secretary, Mr. Nicholas Brady proposed a scheme to reduce the debts of most-debted countries. According to this scheme, the debt of 17 most debted nations would be reduced by 20% and the payment of their debts would also be reduced proportionately with a view to achieve this, there is a scheme for the contribution of 12 billion by the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. But this scheme is subject to the increase in contribution quotas of members and also to make more funds available to Commercial Banks. While a controversy has started among the developed countries in this respect, this has not been completely welcomed by the developing countries.

Paris Summit Conference of 7 Developed Countries.—Seven developed countries—Britain, Italy, France, West-Germany, Canada, Japan and America held a summit conference in Paris on 16th July, 1989. In this conference they pledged to help the developing countries by opening and widenning the world trade system. It is to be seen how they fulfil their pledge and whether this renders help to developing countries in real terms.

Ninth Replenishment of I.D.A.—Talks for ninth replenishment of International Development Association (I.D.A.), an affiliate of the World Bank, began in February 1989. Both the Group of 24 developing countries and the development committee of the World Bank had in their mid-term meetings in April 1989, underlined the need for an early finalisation of the ninth I.D.A. replenishment to enable recipient countries to gain and maintain their development momentum and make progress in poverty alleviation. The Group of 24 had suggested that I.D.A. donor countries take into account the gains that had been made as a result of I.D.A. assisted operations which should be sustained and maintained. The World Bank's latest report acknowledges that despite impressive progress in such areas as food self-sufficiency, health and institutional capacity to manage disaster relief, the overall picture is not encouraging for over half of the developing countries' poor—nearly 500 million people—who are overwhelmingly concentrated in Asia.

UNCTAD VIII.—The Eighth Session of UNCTAD took place in February 1992, at Cartagena. More than 40 least developed countries sought the cancellation of all bilateral official debts and urgent measures for reduction of Least Developed Countries (L.D.Cs.) debt stock and debt serving burdens including those due to multilateral financial institutions and commercial debts. Mr. P. Chidambram, Union Minister of Commerce who attended UNCTAD session on behalf of India, said of the five areas under negotiations, one area where UNCTAD might make a move was the convening of an international commodities conference.

The UNCTAD VIII was held at Cartagena de Indias, Colombia from 8th to 25th February, 1992. In its final document, approved by consensus, UNCTAD VIII stressed that, without economic progress, there could be neither peace nor security. The document included : a concise political declaration entitled, "The Spirit of Cartagena" ; a programme document—"A New Partnership For Development : The Cartagena Commitment"; a note on a proposed world commodity conference and a message to the U.N. Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED). The Conference, in its Cartagena Commitment, stated that the international community faced an unprecedented conjunction of challenges and opportunities, responses to which would shape the outcome of efforts to build a "healthy, secure and equitable world economy."

The Conference decided by consensus that UNCTAD Secretary-General should hold consultations on a world conference on commodities. Subject to a positive outcome of such consultations and the deliberations in the Standing Committee on Commodities, the Trade and Development Board—UNCTAD's executive body—should "decide on an invitation to the General Assembly of the U. N. to convene a world conference on commodities under UNCTAD auspices".[76]

UNCTAD-IX.—UNCTAD-IX was held in Midrand (South Africa) from 27 April to 11 May, 1996.

---

[76] U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXIX No. 2 (June, 1992) pp. 67-69.

UNCTAD-X.—UNCTAD-X was held in Bangkok (Thailand) from 12 February to 19 February, 2000.

UNCTAD-XI.—UNCTAD-XI was held in Sao Paulo (Brazil) from 13 June to 18 June, 2004.

UNCTAD-XII.—UNCTAD-XII was held in Accra (Ghana) from 21 April to 25 April, 2008. It adopted wide ranging conclusions. Against the background of surging food prices and global economic uncertainties, UNCTAD-XII ended with the adoption of comprehensive conclusions aimed at reinforcing international efforts to extend gains from globalisations to the million being left behind.

UNCTAD Secretary-General Supachai Panitchpakdi hailed the Accra Accord and its accompanying political declaration for embodying the shared commitment of the developing and developed world to work toward making globalisation a powerful means to achieve poverty eradication Dr. Supachai also referred to a new mood of "development solidarity" around the objective of narrowing gaps between the countries and achieving the Millennium Development goals, which include halving extreme poverty by 2015.

In concluding declaration on 25 April, 2008, Ministers pledged to resist Protectionism, Boost Lagging Poverty Reduction strategy as UNCTAD ended in Ghanna.

UNCTAD-XIII.—UNCTAD-XIII was held at Doha (Qatar) from 21 to 26 April, 2012. Currently UNCTAD-XIII has 194 Members.

One of the main achievements of UNCTAD has been to conceive and implement the Generalised System of Preferences (G.S.P.). It was argued in UNCTAD that in order to promote exports of manufactured goods from developing countries it would be necessary to offer special tariff concessions to such exports. According to this argument, the developed countries formulated the GSP scheme under which manufacture exports and agricultural goods from developing countries either duty-free or at reduced rates in the developed countries. Since imports of such items from other developed countries are subject to normal rates of duties, imports of the items from developing countries would enjoy a competitive advantage.

It may be noted here that currently UNCTAD has 193 member states. Its Headquarters is at Geneva. In the 1970s and 1980s UNCTAD was closely associated with the idea of New International Economic Order (NIEO). As compared to this, the theme has changed and the emphasis shifted to globalisation and sharing the advantages thereof with the developing countries. That is why, UNCTAD-XII concluded by pledging to work toward making globalisation a powerful means to achieve poverty eradication.

UNCTAD-XIV.—UNCTAD-XIV was held in Kenya from 17 to 22 July, 2016. The theme of the Conference was "From decision to action : Moving towards an inclusive and equitable global economic environment for trade and development".

G-20 Leaders Meet (July, 2017).—G-20 Leaders Meet was held in Hamburg (Germany) in the second week of July 2017. The divide between the United States of America and the rest of world on the Paris Agreement on climate change was further formalised on 11 July, 2017 with the G-20 declaration in Hamburg taking note of the American intent to withdraw from the deal. It may be noted that in Paris, America had announced its withdrawal from the Paris Agreement on climate change.

While leaders of 19 countries of G-20 including India, called the deal on Paris Agreement on climate change "irreversible", the United States of America alone stood by itself. However, America managed to get its position on fossil fuels inserted in the joint statement through a formulation promising more efforts for "clean and efficient" use without any commitment to its end.

On 11th July, 2017, American President Donald Trump promised $ 639 million in aid to feed people left starving because of drought and conflict in Somalia, South Sudan, Nigeria and Yemen. The new funding brings to over $ 1.8 billion aid promised by America for the fiscal year 2017 for the crises in the said four countries, where the United Nations has estimated more than 30 millions need urgent and food assistance. It may be noted here that the World Food Programme estimates 109 million people around the world will need food assistance this year, up from 80 million last year.

Further, G-20 leaders adopted a World Bank funding plan of upto $ 1 billion for women entrepreneur in developing nations, an initiative which was championed by U.S. President Donald Trump's daughter Ivanka. This initiation was launched in Hamburg by World Bank Chief, Jim Yong Kim in the presence of Ivanka and her father and other world leaders. According to G-20, women enterpreneurs play a critical role in economic development by creating jobs and boosting growth, but women face numerous challenges. These include access to capital, lack of networks and knowledge resources, as well as legal and policy obstacles to business ownership and development.

During the G-20 meeting, the question of North Korea was also discussed between American and Chinese Presidents. It may be noted that North Korea's successful test launch of an International Continental Ballistic Missile was a major milestone in its long term effort to build a nuclear that could carry a nuclear warhead to reach different parts of the United States of America. The meeting between the two Presidents took place after the American President publicly declared the "aspiring nuclear power" (i.e. North Korea) as he met with Asian allies on the sidelines of international summit to find consensus on next steps after North Korea's recent launch of an inter continental ballistic missile.

Donald Trump to Xi, the Chinese President that something has to be done about North Korea. Chinese President Xi stressed to Trump, Chinese's adherence to resolving the North Korean nuclear issue via talks. It may also be noted that the American President, Japanese President and the British Prime Minister held a meeting on the final day of the G-20 meeting. The three nations have been calling for "early adoption" of a new U.N. Security Council resolution and additional sanctions to demostrate sanctions to Pyongyang the consequences of its actions. Bringing China is a key part of the plan.

Last but not the least, Indian Prime Minister, raised the question of the menace of terrorism in the G-20 and Bricks meets and said that to solve this menace those countries who provide funds, safe haven and otherwise support terrorist ought to be targeted.

World Trade Organisation

N.B. : This has been discussed in greater detail in a separate Chapter i.e. Chapter 40 in Part IV of the book.

India and U.S. agree on Trade Pact framework.—On 26th October, 2009, India and the U.S. agreed on a framework to promote trade and investment and hoped to sign an agreement soon. The U.S. Trade Representative, Ron Kirk, pressed for further opening up of India's services sector, especially the financial market. The joint statement issued after the Sixth Ministerial Meeting of the Bilateral Trade Policy Forum (TPF).

After his meeting with Kirk, Commerce Minister, Anand Sharma, said he hoped the agreement would be signed soon. The two sides also agreed to work together to support greater involvement by small and medium enterprises in each others markets, and to pursue initiates in the future development of India's infrastructure and collaboration on clean energy and environmental services and other sectors.

Pitching for greater access to the Indian services sector, Kirk hoped India would further strengthen its IPR regime.

Officials of the two countries will meet twice a year to complete the remaining task of the TPF, formed in 2005 to discuss trade and investment issues. The two governments agreed on a framework for promoting real and meaningful cooperation in trade and investment.

CHAPTER 27

DEVELOPMENT AND ENVIRONMENT

Development

Environmental consequences of industrialization and economic development and the pollution of air, water and soil, on which our life depends, is the high or dear cost which man has to pay for economic progress.[1] While in developed countries environmental problems are as a result of industrialization and technological development, in poor countries these problems are due to less development. Since the developed countries are facing environment crisis, they argue that the developing countries will also have to face the same crisis if they make the same development. On the other hand, poor countries feel that the greatest source of pollution is poverty.[2] While speaking before U. N. Conference on Human Environment at Stockholm, late Prime Minister Mrs. Indira Gandhi had said that for the developed countries development might be the cause of destruction of environment, for a country like India it was the primary means for improving the standard of living, to make available food products, water, cleanliness, shelter, to bring about greenery in deserts and to make hills and mountains worth living.

Development and Environment are invariably related to each other. Even the developing countries cannot afford to ignore the environmental consequences of the process of development.[3] Hence an essential and grave problem is to maintain harmony between development and environment. The future of the developing countries greatly depends on better international understanding of the right of development because this right depends on several other human rights.[4] Article 55 of the U. N. Charter describes economic development and respect for human rights as the twin foundations of friendly and peaceful relations among nations. Economic development and human rights are thus intimately connected with each other. Development is linked with human rights through the clear acceptance of social and economic rights as well as established human rights. Thus human rights and economic development are clearly complementary to each other.[5]

There is great confusion over the right to development. This confusion is in respect of its origins, formulations, ambit, existence and nature. Although this controversy is mainly among international jurists, its implications run deep for the future of U. N. system as well as mankind.[6] It may, however be noted that right to development is crystallizing as a rule of international law. Reference may be made in this connection to the 'Declaration on the Right to Development" adopted by the General Assembly on 4th December, 1986.[7] The Declaration provides that the right to development is an inalienable human right by virtue of which every human person and all peoples are entitled to participate in, contribute to, and enjoy economic, social, cultural and political development, in which all human rights and fundamental freedoms can be fully realized.[8] States have the primary responsibility for the creation of national and international policies with a view to facilitating the full realization of the right to development.[9] States have the duty to take steps, individually and collectively, to formulate international development policies with a view to facilitating

---

1. See R. P. Anand." Development and Environment : the case of Developing Country", I.J.I.L. Vol. 20 (1980) p. 1.
2. Ibid at p. 9.
3. Ibid, at p. 13.
4. C. G. Weeramantry, "The Right to Development", I.J.I.L., Vol. 25.
5. See M.G. Kaladharan Nayar, "Human Rights and Economic Development : The Legal Foundations", Universal Human Rights, Vol. 2 (1980) p. 55.
6. Upendra Baxi, "The New International Economic Order, Basic Needs and Rights Notes Towards Development of the Right to Development", I.J.I.L., Vol. 23 (1983) p. 225 at p. 226.
7. See resolution 41/128 dated 4th December, 1986 of the General Assembly.
8. Article 1 of the Declaration.
9. Article 3.

the full realization of the right to development.[10] Finally, steps should be taken to ensure the full exercise and progressive enhancement of the right to development, including the formulation, adoption and implementation of policy, legislative and other measures at the national and international levels.[11]

There is close relationship between development and conservation of environment. This relationship was acknowledged in 1972 Stockholm Conference on Human Environment. In 1979, the General Assembly, with a view to formulate the right of development had stated in a resolution (G. A. Res. 34/46) that right to development is a human right that nations have the same right of equality of opportunity and as people have within the nation.

In August-September 1980 in the General Assembly in its International Development Strategy for the decade 1981-1990 had said that in the developing countries rapid development will enhance their capacity for improving the environment. Environmental implications of mutual relations of poverty and less development and populations and resources should be kept in mind. It is essential to ensure that the process of economic development be such that it must be environmentally sustainable for a long time. Efforts should be made to prevent deforestation, soil erosion, degration of land and spread of deserts.

As pointed out by Starke, "The international law of development has yet not reached the stage where it can be set down as a substantial body of binding rules, conferring specific rights upon developing states and imposing duties on developed countries. For the most, it is best described as institutional law, that is to say the law of various bodies and agencies through which development is promoted and development aid is channelled.[12] But this cannot be denied that the 'right to development' is constantly developing.

With a review to find the satisfactory solution of the problem, it is necessary to enlist the cooperation of all countries—Communist and Capitalist, rich and poor, satisfied and dissatisfied—otherwise the survival of the whole mankind will be in danger. As pointed out by Commission on International Development (Pearson Commission), which was established by the President of the World Bank Group, in its 1969 report : Who can now say where his country will be after a few decades without asking where the world will be. If we want a safe and prosperous world, we will have to take into account common problems of people. Pearson Commission listed ten objectives in its report which can be regarded to be the standards of development. The ten objectives are as follows :—

"1. The creation of a framework for free and equitable trade involving the abolition by developed countries of import duties and excessive taxes on those primary commodities which they themselves do not produce.
2. The promotion of private foreign investment with offsetting of special risks for investors.
3. Increases in aid, should be directed at helping the developing countries to reach a path of self-sustained growth.
4. The volume of aid should be increased to a target of 1% of the gross national product of the donor countries.
5. Debt relief should be a legitimate form of aid.
6. Procedural obstacles should be identified and removed.
7. The institutional basis of technical assistance should be strengthened.
8. Control of the growth of population.
9. Greater resources should be devoted to education and research.
10. Development aid should be increasingly multilateralised. Such multilateralisation would contribute to a uniform development of the principles governing the grant and receipt of aid." [13]

---

[10] Article 4.

[11] Article 10.

[12] J. G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (Butterworths. Singapore, 1989) p. 397.

[13] Ibid. pp. 398-399.

On 24 October, 1970, the General Assembly adopted policy document relating to international Development Strategy and included in it the above-mentioned ten objectives. The said policy document was adopted for the Second Development Decade (1971-1980). It was also stated that by 1972 the developed countries should give 1% of national production as aid to developing countries. It may be noted that this target could not be reached. In August- September 1980, the third Development Decade was announced. In March, 1988, the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) adopted Environmental Strategy for 1990-1995. It was decided that in future the United Nations will focus on helping countries to achieve sustainable development, reduce the impact of environmental degradation and pollute and rehabilitate ecosystems already degraded or polluted. It may be noted here that the trend was quite manifest that climatic change—the ominous "greenhouse effect—the Ozone layer," tropical deforestation and toxic wastes will continue to large on U.N.E.F.'s agenda. Further, the concept of sustainable development that does not hurt the environment—runs throughout the whole programme. It was the dominant theme of two ground—breaking documents : 'the Environmental Perspectives to the year 2000 and beyond, which reflected the Government's thinking adopted by the General Assembly in 1987, and our Common Future', the report of the high level, non-governmental world commission on Environment and Development, a major input to the Perspective.

Sustainable development is now the basis for the United Nations environmental philosophy and is already giving a sharper edge to global environmental action.[14]

It may be noted here that the present law relating to right to development is institutional. The institutions such as United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), United Nations Industrial Development Organisation (UNIDO), Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development Organisation (OECD), European Economic Community etc., are making significant contribution in this respect.

On 22nd December, 1990 the General Assembly of the United Nations announced the Fourth Development Decade (1991-2000) and suggested for vast national and international means for rapid development of developing countries (especially least developed countries). The General Assembly acknowledged that the Third Development Decade failed to achieve most of the objectives. The General Assembly asked the developed countries to invest the money released from disarmament in official aid. Laying stress on industrial development the General Assembly recommended that the rate of development of industrialisation be increased from 8 to 10%.

The advantages of development can be enjoyed in true sense only when it does not cause adverse impact on environment. Unfortunately in the very first year (i.e., 1991) Fourth Development Decade, Gulf War (1991) aggravated the gravity of the problems of environment. The States responsible for causing adverse impact on environment should be compelled to make reparation and the funds thus received should be invested for improving the environment. Last but not the least, the concept of sustainable development should be emphasized and should form the basis in all programmes of U. N. system and all agencies and institutions connected with development and environment.

Population explosion increased urbanisation and unprecedented expansion of science and technology may be said to be the basic causes responsible for the deterioration of the environment. Over much of the world, environmental problems are still those associated with proverty, such as poor housing, bad public health, malnutrition and inadequate employment. Such problems can only be solved through development which is environmentally wise and based upon through evaluation of the potential uses of the different regions of the earth.[15] International collaboration, on a scale not seen in the history of the world, is essential if mankind is to meet basic human needs while safeguarding the environment for future generations. The greatest challenge is to design development so that it satisfies basic needs beginning with the eradication of poverty. The world is not environmentally uniform. Nations differ in their environmental resources. No single solution will work every where. The environmental inequalities in the world are paralleled by economic ones which are major obstacles to satisfaction of basic human needs, especially in developing countries, and a barrier to the harmonious development of mankind.[16] The economic development now enjoyed by the developed countries was sometimes achieved without due regard to the preservation of human environment.[17]

---

[14] See "Action To save our Environment", U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXV, No. 2 (June, 1988) p. 43.

[15] U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIII, No. 3 (March 1976), p. 44; See also Mapzi Sinjela, "Developing Countries Perceptions of Environmental Protection and Economic Development", I.J.I.L., Vol. 24 (1984) p. 489 at pp. 499-502

Technological progress has brought enormous numbers of chemicals into everyday life. Five million substances have been identified; about 70,000 of these are marketed, about half of them in quantity. They have brought immense benefit to the society—increased food production, improved health care, eradicated deadly diseases, and bestowed longer life expectancy and a better standard of living. But they have also brought new dangers, largely through the wastes generated in their manufacture. Tens of million of tons of toxic and otherwise hazardous substances enter the environment every year as unwanted wastes. Managing and disposing of these hazardous wastes properly faces mankind with significant problem.[18] It may also be noted that food production can only be sustained if the environment is preserved; conservation is a precondition of long term food-security. But threats to the environment in developing countries are very serious and they are mounting. Genetic resources which should be preserved as sources of future diversity and improvement are shrinking because of pollution, deforestation, and the neglect of traditional species of crops and livestock.[19]

A new expert report has warned that current patterns of energy production and use will not lead to a "sustainable world." This expert report was considered by the Committee on the Development and Utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy at its sixth session held at Newyork from 3rd to 14th February, 1992. The report said that our current energy production and use accounts for "at least as many global or regional manmade environmental problems as all other human activities combined." According to the experts, the health of the planet demands a renewed search for energy alternatives. The flow of energy to the Earth's land surface is thousands of times greater than mankind's present rate of total energy use." Yet these sources at present contribute only 14 to 20 per cent of the total world energy supply.

The Committee on the Development and utilization of New and Renewable Sources of Energy has been renamed by the General Assembly as the Committee on New and Renewable Sources of Energy and on Energy and Development. In addition to its current responsibilities, the renamed Committee will assume the energy portion of the mandate of the Committee on Natural Resources.[20]

Corona Virus.—Presently, one of the greatest obstacle to development is the spread of deadly Corona Virus. Emanating from Wuhan of China, it soon spread all over the world. Within a few weeks it spread in large scale to European countries such as Italy, France, Britain, Germany and also to countries like Iran and America. It spread so rapidly that it took 137 days to reach the figure of one million of patients affected by Covid-19 corona virus. But it took only 13 days to double the figure.

India, on the other hand, took early steps to fight corona virus. As early as in January, 2020, India started screening, persons coming from China and a few Western countries. In India, corona virus came through these persons who came from abroad (citizens as well as foreigners). When the figure of 500 corona virus affected persons was reached, Indian Prime Minister announced on 24 March, 2020 a lock down of 14 days. After the figure crossed 1000, Prime Minister announced another lock down of 19 days till May 3, 2020.

---

16. U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIII, No. 3 (March 1976), p. 44; See also Mapzi Sinjela, "Developing Countries Perceptions of Environmental Protection and Economic Development", I.J.I.L., Vol. 24 (1984) p. 489 at pp. 499-502
17. Mapzi Sinjela, note 15 at p. 489.
18. U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XX, No. 5 of (1983) p. 33.
19. U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XX, No. 1 of (1983) p. 74.
20. U. N. Chronicle, Vol. XXIX, No. 2 (June 1992) p. 71.

The situation became explosive throughout the whole world, including many highly developed countries such as America, Italy, Spain and France. In some countries such as Italy, Spain and America the situation seems to have gone out of control. For example, on 16th April, 2020 total world cases of corona virus were 20,51,029 with 1,32,892 deaths. Out of this America had 6,22,923 cases with 27,586 deaths. Italy had 1,65,155 cases with 21,645 deaths. France had 1,47,863 cases with 17,167 deaths and Germany, had 1,33,209 cases with 3,592 deaths. As compared to this, on the same date i.e. 16 April, 2020, India had only 12,324 cases of corona virus with 415 deaths. Thus, as compared to other countries India was in much better position. However, the situation is explosive and India could not be complacent. That is why, a lockdown of 19 days i.e. till 3rd May, 2020 was announced. Even in India figure of corona virus affected person is increasing rapidly. On 9th April, 2020, figure of cases was 5,699. It swelled to 12,324 cases within a week.

In may be noted that before lockdown the increase per day in the number of infected persons was 291 but after lockdown the number of infected by corona virus increased to 1526 per day. Since then the number of infected persons has been rapidly increasing. Throughout the whole world corona virus has badly affected the people. The increase in the number of infected persons has been phenomenon. For example, on 15 June, 2020, total infected persons in the world were more than 77 lakhs and the number of deaths on account of Covid-19 were more than four lakhs. The worst affected nation was United States of America. The total number of affected persons in the U.S. is more than 21 lakhs and the number of deaths was more than one lakhs. As compared to this, total number of infected persons in India was more than three lakhs and number of deaths was more than 9 thousands. After five days i.e. on 19th June, 2020, the number of infected persons in the entire world was more than 84 lakhs and the number of deaths was nearly four and a half lakhs. As compared to this, in India the number of infected persons increased to more than three and a half lakhs and the number of deaths increased to nearly 12 thousands. Thus Covid-19 virus is affecting the whole world.

As noted, above, the worst affected person on account of Covid-19 virus is United States of America. By 21 June, 2020, there were more than 23 lakhs infected by Covid-19 virus and there were more than one lakh 21 thousand deaths in America. For such huge loss of life and property in America, America holds China and World Health Organization responsible for concealing and delaying the information about Covid-19 virus. America is so much annoyed and hurt that America has warned China again and again. President Trump of America first threatened World Health Organisation (WHO) to withhold its subscription to WHO and subsequently America broke all relations with WHO.

Relevance of General International Law to Environment.—As rightly remarked by an author,[21] "the general principles and prescriptions of International law are not without applicability to problems of transnational pollution or environment degradation. Thus a fundamental principle of international law limits action by one State which would cause injury in the territory of another State.[22]......"there has been general recognition of the rule that a State must not permit the use of its territory for purposes injurious to the interest of other States......"[23] The principle is in turn a reflection of the fundamental doctrine, Sic utere tuo ut olienum non leades—'one must use his own rights so as not do injury to another.' This concept underlines the range of State-to-State relations just as it does in personal relations." This principle has also been recognised by Arbitration Tribunals.[24] It is not suggested that general principles of international law provide the degree of specificity that will be required for a framework of international concern for global environmental conservation. These general principles of international law, however, do indicate the duty of State not to engage in or permit conduct within its territory which would result in environmental injury outside its territory.[25] Further, "It seems apparent from the facts of the environmental state among different countries and from the complex and sensitive economic political consideration involved that international co-operation and agreement will be necessary to initiate prompt measures to improve our global environment. The case-by-case development of international law to cope with a myriad of problems would not provide the urgent action needed even if authoritative tribunals were available to claimants." [26]

---

[21] Cecil, J. Olmstead, "Prospects for Regulation of Environmental Conservation under International Law" in The Present State of International Law and other Essay's, (1973), p. 245 at p. 246.

[22] Corfu Channel Case, (1949) I.C.J. Rep. 4; see statement at p. 22 to the effect that every State is obliged "not to allow knowingly its territory to be used for acts contrary to the rights of other States."

[23] Survey of International Law, 34 U. N. Doc. A/CN. 4/1 Rev. 1 (1949).

[24] See The Lake Lanoux Arbitration between France and Spain, 24 Int. L. Rep. : 101 (1957) and Trail Smelter Arbitration between the U. S. and Canada decided on March 11, 1941, 3 U. N. Rep. Int. Arb. Awards 1905 (1945), A.J.I.L., Vol. 35 (1941) p. 648.

Reference may be made here to Trail Smelter Arbitral Award.[27] This case related to the damage caused to the State of Washington by fumes of Sulphur Dioxide emitted from Trail Smelter on the Canadian territory. It was held by the Tribunal that Canada was responsible in international law for the conduct of Trail Smelter. It was further held by the Tribunal that, apart from the undertakings in the treaty between the two states, the Government of the Dominion of Canada was under duty to ensure that its conduct should be in conformity with the obligations under international law. The Tribunal held : "Under international law, no state has the right to use or permit the use of its territory in such a manner as to cause injury by fumes in or to the territory of another state or the properties or persons therein, when the case is of some serious consequence and the injury is established by clear and convincing evidence." [28]

International Co-operation for and Regulation of Environmental Conservation.—Until the 1972 United Nations Conference on the Human Environment held in Stockholm, the subject of environmental conservation had been dealt with by international Conventions in only a fragmentary manner. For example Article IX of the Treaty of 1967 of the Principles Governing the Activities of State in the Exploration and use of Outer Space including the Moon and Celestial Bodies provided, "State parties to the Treaty shall pursue studies of outer space including the moon and other celestial bodies, and conduct exploration of them so as to avoid their harmful contamination and also adverse change in the environment of the earth resulting from the introduction of extraterrestrial matter and where necessary shall adopt appropriate measures for this purpose."Article I of the Convention on the Prevention of Marine Pollution By Dumping of Wastes and other Matter, 1972 obliges the contracting parties individually and collectively to promote the effective control of all sources of pollution of the marine environment and to take all practicable steps to prevent the pollution of the sea by the dumping of waste and other matter that is liable to create hazards to human health, to harm living resources and marine life, to damage amenities or to interfere with other legitimate uses of the sea. Other Treaties and Conventions which deserve mention in this connection are : The Nuclear Weapons Tests Ban Treaty of 1963 ; the Treaty for the prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America ; Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons 1968; Treaty on the Prohibition of the Emplacement of Nuclear Weapons on the Seabed and Ocean Floor and Subsoil Thereof, 1971; the two Brussels Convention relating to Intervention on the High Seas in cases of Oil Pollution Casualties and on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage, 1969.[29] The Convention on Wetlands of International importance especially as waterfowl Habitat, 1971; The Convention Concerning the Protection of the World Cultural and Natural Heritage, 1972 etc. Reference may also be made to the General Assembly Declaration of December 17, 1970 of Principles Governing the Sea-bed and the Ocean Floor and the Subsoil thereof beyond the limits of National Jurisdiction. Principle eleventh of the said Declaration provides for the (a) Prevention of Pollution and contamination and other hazards to the marine environment including the coastal line and of interference with the

---

25. Olmstead, note 6, at p. 247.
26. Ibid, at p. 248.
27. U. S. v. Canada, Vol. 35 A.J.I.L. (1941), p. 684.
28. Ibid at p. 716.
29. Gen. Ass. Resolution 2749 (XXV).

ecological balance of marine environment, and (b) Protection and Conservation of the natural resources of the area and prevention of danger to the flora and fauna of the marine environment. It was a significant development because 'our oceans and sea-vital links in earth's life giving cycles may indeed soon see the day of their 'death'......If the oceans and seas die all humanity perishes with them."[30] Further, "Marine pollution is a global problem in several senses. It affects the health of the ocean in all parts of the world; it affects all countries, both developed and developing; and all countries contribute to some aspects of the problem." [31]

Stockholm Conference of 1972 on the Human Environment*.—The U.N. Conference on the Human Environment held at Stockholm from June 5 to June 16, 1972[32] may rightly be reckoned as the first major attempt to solve the global problems of Conservation and regulation of human environment by international agreement on a Universal level. It mobilized and concentrated the attention of the international co-operation for environmental conservation.[33] The main contributions of the Stockholm Conference of 1972 on the Human Environment comprise of : (i) The Declaration on the Human Environment; (ii) the Action Plan for the Human Environment; (iii) the Resolution on Institutional and Financial Arrangements; (iv) Resolution on Designation of a World Environment Day; (v) Resolution on Nuclear Weapons Tests; (vi) Resolution on the Convening of a second Conference; and (vii) Decision to refer to Governments recommendation for action at the national level. A brief discussion of each of these is being given below :

(i) The Declaration on the Human Environment.—Contained in Section1 of the Report of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment the Declaration on the Human Environment is one of the most significant achievements of the U. N. Conference on the Human Environment 1972. Starke has compared it with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948 and says that "it was essentially a manifesto, expressed in the form of an ethical Code intended to govern and influence future action and programmes, both at the national and international levels."[34] The Declaration is divided in two parts—first part proclaims seven truths about man in relation to his environment and part two enunciates 26 principles. The first part contains general observations such as that man is both creature and moulder of his environment which gives him physical sustenance and affords him the opportunity for intellectual moral, social and spiritual growth; the protection and improvement of the human environment is a major issue which affects the well-being of peoples and economic development throughout the world it is the urgent desire of the peoples of the whole world and the duty of all governments in the developing countries most of the environmental problems are caused by under-development; the natural growth of population continuously presents problems on the preservation of the environment and adequate policies and measures as appropriate, to face these problems ; and a point has been reached in history when we must shape our actions throughout the world with a more prudent case for their environmental consequences.

Part II of the Declaration contains principles. Principle 1 which is of general nature states that man has the fundamental right to freedom, equality and adequate conditions of life, in environment of a quality that permits a life of dignity and well being, and he bears a solemn responsibility to protect and improve the environment for present and future generations. Principle 2 states that the natural resources of the earth including the air, water, land, flora and fauna and especially representative samples of natural ecosystems must be safeguarded for the present and future generations through careful planning or management, as appropriate. According to Principle 7, States shall take all possible steps to prevent pollution of the seas by substances are liable to create hazards to human health, to harm living resources and marine life to damage amenities or to interfere with other legitimate uses of the sea. Principle 8 recognises that economic and social development is essential for ensuring a favourable living and working environment for man and for creating conditions on earth that are necessary for the improvement of the quality of life. Principles 21 and 22 are particularly important for they proclaim certain principles of international law respecting environmental preservation. Principle 21 provides : "States have, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law the sovereign right to exploit their own resources pursuant to their own environmental policies and the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or of areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction." According to Principle 22, "States shall co-operate to develop further the international law regarding liability and compensation for the victims of pollution and other environmental damage caused by activities within the jurisdiction or control of such States to areas beyond their jurisdiction." These two principles represent "the most significant consensus that has been reached in the field of international co-operation among States respecting environmental preservation"...[35] Further, "These principles reflecting the fundamental international responsibility of States regarding enviromental preservation and pollution control were accepted by the 27th General Assembly in a Resolution [G. A. Res. 2996 (XXVII)] which declared that no resolution adopted at that session could affect those principles." [36] Last but not the least, Principle 26 states that man and his environment must be spared of the effects of nuclear weapons and all other means of mass destruction. States must strive to reach prompt agreement in the relevant international organs, on the elimination and complete destruction of such weapons.

---

[30] "Act Now on Pollution Don't Just Talk", The Plain Truth (a monthly Magazine), February, 1970, p. 3 at p. 9.

[31] Oscar Schachter and Daniel Server, "Marine Pollution Problems and Remedies." 65 A.J.I.L. 84 (1971); see also "Marine Pollution Potential for Catastrophe", U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. VIII No. 3 (March 1971) p. 28.

* IAS (2005) Q. 7(b).

[32] See U. N. Doc. A/CONF./48/14 and Corr. 1.

[33] Olmstead, note 14, at p. 253.

[34] J. G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (1989) p. 406.

(ii) The Action Plan for the Human Environment.—The Action Plan for the Human Environment is divided into three parts—(A) Framework for environmental action; (B) Recommendations for action at the international level; and (C) The Action Plan. The broad types of action that make up the plan are—(a) the global environmental assessment programme (Earthwatch) ; (b) Environmental management activities; and (c) International measure to support the national and international actions of assessment and management. The functions of Environmental Assessment (Earthwatch) include evaluation and review—to provide the basis for identification of the knowledge needed and to determine the necessary steps to be taken; research—to create new knowledge of the kinds specifically needed to provide guidance in the making of decisions; monitoring—to gather certain data on specific environmental variables and evaluate such data in order to determine and predict important environmental conditions and trends; and Information exchange—to disseminate knowledge within the scientific and technological communities and to ensure that decision-makers at all levels shall have the benefit of the best knowledge that can be made available in the forms and at the times in which it can be useful. Environmental management covers functions designed to facilitate comprehensive planning that takes into account the side effects of man's activities and thereby to protect and enhance the human environment for present and future generations. Lastly, International measures to support the national and international actions of assessment and management relate to measures required for the activities in the other two categories (i.e., environmental assessment and environmental management) and include Education, training and public information, Organizational arrangements and Financial and other forms of assistance.

(iii) The Resolution on Institutional and Financial Arrangements.—The Resolution on Institutional and Financial Arrangements recommended the establishment of following institutions and financial arrangement :—

---

[35] Olmstead : note 21 at p. 252.

[36] Ibid., at p. 253.

(a) Governing Council For Environmental Programmes (UNEP).—The Resolution recommended that "the General Assembly establish the Governing Council for Environmental Programmes composed of 54 members, elected for three-year terms on the basis of equitable geographical distribution." Resolution 2997 (XXVII) adopted by the General Assembly on December 15, 1972 relating to institutional and Financial Arrangements for International Environmental Co-operation established a 58 members (instead of 54 as recommended by the Conferene) Governing Council for Environmental Programme and directed it to "keep" under review the world environmental situation in order to ensure that emerging environmental problems of wide international significance receive appropriate and adequate consideration by Governments". To assist the Council in the task, the Executive Director prepares each year a report on the state of the environment.

(b) Environment Secretariat.—The Resolution recommended the establishment of a small Secretariat in the United Nations to serve as a focal point for environmental action and co-ordination within the United Nations System in such a way as to ensure a high degree of effective management.

(c) The Environment Fund.—In order to provide for additional financing for environmental programmes, the resolution recommended that a voluntary fund be established in acordance with existing United Nations financial procedures.

(d) An Environmental Co-ordination Board.—In order to provide for the maximum efficient co-ordinations of United Nations environmental programmes, Resolution recommended the establishment of an Environmental Co-ordinating Board, chaired by the Executive Director under the auspices and within the framework of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination.

(iv) Resolution on Designation of World Environment Day.—The Resolution on World Environment Day recommended that June 5 be observed as World Environment Day. Subsequently this recommendation was adopted by the General Assembly through a resolution.

(v) Resolution on Nuclear Weapon Tests.—The Resolution on Nuclear Tests condemned nuclear tests, particularly those carried out in the atmosphere and called upon States to refrain from conducting such tests as could contaminate the environment. Principle 26 of the Declaration on the Human Environment, which has been referred earlier, also deserves mention in this connection.

(vi) Resolution on the convening of a Second Conference on Environment.—The Resolution recommended that the General Assembly should take initiative and decide to convene a second United Nations Conference on the Human Environment at the appropriate time.

(vii) Decision to refer to Governments recommendations for action at the national level.—The Stockholm Conference also decided to refer to State Governments recommendations for action at the national level.

In addition to the above-mentioned results of the Stockholm Conference, reference may also be made to the recommendation of the Conference that a Conference be convened in the end of 1972 by the United Kingdom for the adoption of the draft articles of a convention on Ocean Dumping.

Work of UNEP and other Developments in the field of Environment.—Some of the above-mentioned decisions and recommendations of the Stockholm Conference, 1972 were implemented by resolutions of General Assembly in its 27th Sessions in 1972. In this connection, resolution 2997 (xxvii), which has been briefly referred earlier, deserves a special mention. Through this resolution a 58-member Governing Council for the Environmental Programme (UNEP) was set up. The Governing Council held its first Session in Geneva in June 1973. As pointed out by Mr. Maurice Strong, Executive Director of the UNEP, in his address to the UNEP Governing Council which met in Nairobi (Kenya) from 17 April to 2 May, 1975 for its third Session, the concept of UNEP as leader, catalyst stimulator and co-ordinator in effect the hub of the environmental action centres had begun to become a reality.[37] He said that most of the activities which affect the environment are carried out for purposes and by organizations for which environment is not the principal concern. UNEP's task is thus to help assure that environmental factors are given adequate attention in taking decisions concerning such activities and to improve the quality of the decisions by which the environment is affected.[38] The Council reached broad agreement on and over all strategy in environmental policy to put the principles and recommendations endorsed by the Stockholm Conference on the Human Environment and General Assembly into action. It allocated $5 million to the budget of Habitat ; the United Nations Conference on Human Settlements; urged the Conference on the Law of the Sea to incorporate in draft treaties effective provisions for the protection of the marine; and provided $500,000 to support the programmes and preparations for the United Nations Conference on Desertification (1977).[39]

The year 1975 proved to be significant from the point of environment for as a result of ratifications by a number of States, seven important global conventions came into force in 1975. They are : (1) The Convention on International Trade in Endangered species of wild Fauna and Flora, 1973; (2) The Convention on Wetlands of International Importance especially as Waterfowl Habitat, 1971 (it has been signed and ratified by 168 countries); (3) The Convention concerning the protection of the Wold Cultural and Natural Heritage, 1972 (this convention has 191 countries as parties); (4) The International convention relating to Intervention on the High Seas in cases of Oil Pollution Casualities, 1969 (it has been signed and ratified by 88 countries); (5) The International convention on Civil Liability for Oil Pollution Damage, 1969 (as of 2013 it had 133 countries as parties); (6) The Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping from Ships and Aircrafts, 1973; and (7) The Convention for the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping of Wastes and other Matter, 1972 (as of 2013, it had 87 countries as parties).

In his report to the fourth session (from 30 March to 14 April, 1976) of the Governing Council of UNEP, the Executive Director, Mostafa K. Tolba pointed out that international collaboration, on a scale seen in the history of the world is essential if mankind is to meet basic human needs while safeguarding the environment for future generations. The ratification of above-noted important global conventions on matters relating to the environment is an encouraging sign in that respect.[40]

One of the greatest contribution of the Governing Council of U.N.E.P. was the holding of Habitat Conference in 1976. Its over-all theme was the formation and maintenance of human settlements. The Conference declared that "Nations must avoid the pollution of the biosphere and the oceans and should join in the effort to end irrational exploitation of all environment resources, wheher non-renewable or renewable in the long term."[41] In 1977, a series of meetings on environmental questions were held in the Caribbean, Tunis and Nairobi under the auspices of the UNEP. A great landmark in the field of environment was the United Nations Conference on Desertification held in Nairobi, Kenya from 29th August to 9th September, 1977. The Conference adopted a Plan of Action containing 26 recommendations for action at the national, regional and international levels. The Conference recommended that UNEP, with its Governing Council and the Environment Co-ordination Board, should be responsible for following up and co-ordinating implementation of the Plan and that the U. N. regional commissions would have responsibility for co-ordinating, catalysing and executing intra-regional programmes adopted by Member States.[42]

Habitat II

Preparations for the U. N. Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II) were launched at the organisational session of its Preparatory Committee held from 3rd to 5th March, 1993 at Newyork. The major objective of Habitat II is to address issues in the context of sustainable development. The Conference is expected to formulate a global plan of action to improve people's living environment for the first two decades of the next century, building on the legacy of the first Habitat Conference held in Vancouver, Canada, in 1976.[43]

---

[37] U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XII, No. 5 (May 1975), p. 34.

[38] Ibid, at p. 19.

[39] U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XII, No. 5 (June 1975), p. 27.

[40] U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIII, No. 3 (March 1976), p. 44.

[41] U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIII, No. 7 (July 1976), p. 52.

[42] U. N. Monthly Chronicle, Vol. XIV, No. 9 (October 1977), p. 36.

Nairobi Declaration (1982).—The tenth anniversary of the U.N. Conference on the Human Environment, held in Stockholm in 1972 was celebrated in Nairobi from 10th to 18th May, 1982 by the world community of States. A Declaration called Nairobi Declaration was adopted. It requested Governments and peoples to build on the progress so far achieved, but expressed serious concern about the present state of environment world-wide, and recognized the urgent necessity of intensifying the efforts at the global, regional and national levels to protect and improve it. According to the Declaration, the principles of the Stockholm Declaration are as valid today as they were in 1972. They provide a basic code of environmental conduct for the years to come. The world community of States solemnly reaffirmed its commitment of the Stockholm Declaration and Action Plan, as well as further strengthening and expansion of national efforts and international co-operation in the field of environmental protection. It urged all Governments and peoples of the world to discharge their historical responsibility collectively and individually, to ensure that our small planet is passed over to future generations in a condition which guarantees a life in human dignity for all.

At its Helsinke meeting (25th April to 6th May, 1983), the Commission on Human Settlements called for the immediate launching by all Governments of activities related to the International year of shelter for the Homeless (1987). It also called for increased efforts to ensure that adequate land is made available to the poor and disadvantaged in developing countries to enable them to build and improve their own shelter and neighbourhoods.

Environment and Charter of Economic Rights and Duties, 1974

N.B.—For this please see matter discussed under the heading 'Environment' in chapter on "......... New International Economic Order".

Environment and the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982.—Part XII of the U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 deals with the protection and preservation of marine environment. Part XII begins with the general obligation of States to protect and preserve the marine environment.[44] It deals with measures to prevent, reduce and control pollution of the marine environment[45] and recognises the duty not to transfer damage or hazards or transform one type of pollution into another.[46] It also deals with environmental problems such as pollution from land-based sources,[47] pollution from sea-bed activities,[48] pollution from activities in the International Sea-bed Area,[49] dumping[50] pollution from vessel[51] and pollution from or through the atmosphere.[52]

So far U.N. Convention on the Law of the Sea, 1982 has been ratified by 168 countries (167 U.N. Members plus European Union).

The System—Wide Medium Term Environmental Programme.—A brief reference may be made here to the System Wide Medium Term Environmental Programme (SWMTEP) which was evolved in 1982 and though developed by the Executive Director of the UNEP now represents the environment programme of the United Nations System. Following the pattern of UNEP its programme for the medium term 1984-89 is divided into fifteen items—Environment and Development; Environmental awareness; Atmosphere,

---

[43] U. N. Chronicle Vol. XXX, No. 2 (June 1993), p. 65.
[44] Ibid, Article 192.
[45] Ibid, Article 194.
[46] Ibid, Article 195.
[47] Ibid, Article 207.
[48] Ibid, Article 208.
[49] Ibid, Article 209.
[50] Ibid, Article 210.
[51] Ibid, Article 211.
[52] Ibid, Article 212.

Oceans; Waters; Lithosphere; Natural Disasters; Terrestrial Ecosystems; Living Resources; Health and Welfare; Working Environment, Human Settlements; Energy; Industry and Transportation; and Arms Race and Environment. Each of these 15 programmes divided into two or more sub-programmes brings the total to 38 programmes.

Environmental Perspective to the year 2000 and Beyond.—The General Assembly has established a special commission to propose long-term environmental strategies for achieving sustainable development to the year 2000 and beyond.

1994 World Conference on Natural Disaster Reduction[53]

Nuclear Safety and Environment.—Nuclear explosions, accidents etc. adversely affect the environment. It is unfortunate that before accident at Chernobyl Nuclear Plant on 26th April, 1986 sufficient attention was not given to this inadequacy of international law. As a result of the recommendations of the First Review Conference of Non-Proliferation Treaty, 1968, a Convention on the Physical Protection of Nuclear Material was adopted in 1979. Under this Convention, it is the obligation of Parties to the Convention to take action to check theft, sabotage etc. of nuclear material. But the Chernobyl accident proved that there is need to consider this matter seriously.

Accident at Chernobyl Nuclear Plant, 50 Km. away from Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, on 26th April, 1986 caused a wave of shock and fear throughout the world. Due to fire in the Chernobyl Nuclear Plant radio-active dust spread more than 1,600 Km. Several countries including Poland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Finland were adversely affected by the said spread of radio-active dust. Much greater area could have been adversely affected if the direction of the winds had not suddenly turned towards the Soviet Union. On 29th April, 1986, Soviet Union announced the happening of the accident at Chernobyl Nuclear Plant and asked several countries such as West Germany and Sweden to render help to extinguish the fire at the Nuclear Plant.

According to Russia, 7 persons were killed and 299 persons were admitted to hospitals for radio activity. But according to the Scientists of Western countries, the number of persons dying in the accident was in thousands. According to an American Defence Official, a study of the informations received from U.S. Spy Satellite, 2000 persons died as a result of the fire in Nuclear Plant at Chernobyl.

The accident at Chernobyl Nuclear Plant was due to human and technical errors. It has been admitted by the Soviet Union that the accident was caused due to "a whole series of gross violations of operating regulations by workers." Whatever be the causes of the accident its adverse effects have been grave and wide spread. India was also affected, though slightly, by the Chernobyl disaster. A radio-active plume originating from Chernobyl in Russia hit India on May 14, 1986 and its impact was recorded at the atomic power stations at Tarapur (near Bombay), Rawatlata (Rajasthan) and Kalpakkam (Madras) until May 26, 1986. According to a source at the Bhabha Atomic Research Centre in Bombay, Tarapur, recorded at the highest level of 7,700 and 7,160 milli beequeral per gramme on May 21 and 22, 1986. The permitted value is 3000 mbq. per gramme. However, it was pointed out that the impact of this radio active plume in India was very small and there was no need to worry about it.

According to Dr. John Gofman, a Professor emeritus of medical physics at the University of California at Berkeley, more than one million people throughout the world could develop cancer due to exposure to the radioactive fall out from the Soviet Union's Chernobyl Nuclear accident and half that number would die from it. On account of Chernobyl accident, 9,50,000 persons were removed from the affected areas. But 15 lakhs including 4,60,000 children remained in the affected areas. Even after five years of the accident, problems created by the accident have not been satisfactorily solved. This information was given by the Health Minister of Ukraine on 11th April, 1991. On 2nd April, 1992, the Ukrainian authorities have finally decided to shut down the Chernobyl Nuclear Power Plant.

---

[53] This has been discussed later on in this chapter after the discussion of "Earth Summit".

In his report to the 41st session of the U.N. General Assembly, Secretary-General, Mr. Javier Perez-de-Cuellar has suggested the setting up a "Nuclear Alert Centre" to reduce the risk of an accidental nuclear war and to lessen the 'chilling' possibility of isolated launchings by those who may clandestinely gain access to nuclear devices. It has been rightly pointed out, "The Chernobyl syndrome has rammed the lesson home that no country can remain safe if the nuclear genie manages to escape......... the moral. It is one world or none. The split atom and a sharply divided world cannot co-exist".[54]

It is well established rule of international law that a sovereign State may do anything within its territory provided that its adverse effects do not fall upon another sovereign State.[55] International Law does not permit any sovereign to conduct any activity or to do anything within its territory or elsewhere which may adversely affect other States. In this connection, Nuclear Test case[56] deserves a special mention. In this case, the International Court of Justice directed France not to conduct its planned nuclear tests as the radio-active dust eminating from them caused health hazards to the people of Australia and New Zealand. If, however, the activities conducted by a State within its territory do not adversely affect other States, it will not constitute any violation of international law.[57] For example, when India conducted nuclear test at Pokhran (Rajasthan), no neighbouring country was adversely affected for there was no increase in the level of radio-activity in any of the neighbouring States and as such India was not guilty of any violation of the rules of international law.[58] But the position will be different if what a State does within its territory adversely affects other States. It will constitute international tort and such a State will be liable to make reparation to the aggrieved States. The above discussion makes it clear that accident and fire at Nuclear Plant at Chernobyl adversely affected other States. The former Soviet Union was, therefore, clearly liable to make reparation to States which were adversely affected.

It may be noted here that the accident at Chernobyl Nuclear Plant brought into focus the inadequacies and deficiencies in respect of nuclear safety and environment. Consequently a special session of International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) was immediately called and on 26th September, 1986, it adopted two Conventions—(i) Convention on Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident or Radiological Emergency; and (ii) Convention on Assistance in the Event of Nuclear Accident or Radiological Emergency. The first Convention came into force on 27th October, 1986 and the second Convention entered into force on 26th February, 1987. Under the first Convention, it is the obligation of the State parties to the Convention to transmit information of nuclear accident to the States likely to be affected by it. This obligation is for military and non-military activities but will not apply to nuclear weapons. The five nuclear weapon States have indicated that they will transmit the said information. This Convention is a step in the right direction.

The Convention in Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident in Radiological Emergency was signed on 29th September, 1986. It became effective on 27th October, 1986. So far it has been ratified by 118 countries (116 + European Atomic Energy Community and the FAO).

The Convention on the Assistance in the event of a Nuclear Accident of Radiological Emergency was adopted in 1986. It became effective on 26 February, 1987. So far it has been ratified by 111 countries.

---

[54] See Editorial Entitled "The Chernobyl Syndrome", The Pioneer, 16 May 1986.

[55] See S.K. Kapoor, "The Legality of Nuclear Testing : the Pokhran Explosion", IJIL, Vol. 14 (1974) p. 452.

[56] See Nuclear Test case (Australia v. France) Judgment of 20 December, 1974, (1974) I.C.J. Rep. 253; Nuclear Test case (New Zealand v. France) Judgment of 20 December, 1974, (1974) I.C.J. Rep. 457.

[57] See G. Schwarzenberger, "The Legality of Nuclear War (1958) p. 49 : M.S. Mc Dougal, The Hydrogen Bomb Tests and International Law of the Sea, AJIL Vol. 49 (1955) p. 356 ; M.S. Mc Dougal and Nobert, A Schhin in Yale Law Journal, Vol. 14 (1955) p. 629.

[58] See S. K. Kapoor, note 55, at p. 485.

Under the above-mentioned Conventions, nuclear weapons have not been included. Endeavours should, therefore, be made to include nuclear weapons also in respect of transmission of nuclear accidents.

Reference may also be made here to the International Convention on Nuclear Safety which was opened for signature on 20th September, 1994 at the thirty eighth session (held from 13 to 23rd Sept, 1994) of the General Conference of International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). This is the first legal instrument, which addresses the issue of nuclear power plants safety world-wide. The convention applies to land-based civil nuclear plants, and obliges the parties to establish and maintain proper legislative and regulatory framework to govern safety. Through the convention, States commit themselves to fundamental safety principles for nuclear installations and agree to participate in periodic pre-review meetings on implementation of their obligations.

On 20th September, 1994, the convention was signed by 38 countries including Canada, France, India, Pakistan, Republic of Korea, Russian Federation, South Africa, United Kingdom and the United States.

It is clear from the foregoing that nuclear safety and environment are inter-related to each other. With a view to ensure pollution free environment, special attention should be given to nuclear safety. States making peaceful and other uses of nuclear energy have some obligations towards international community. The progress made so far in this connection is far from satisfactory.

It has been rightly pointed out, "The right of private individuals to be guaranteed a decent and safe environment is one of the newer rubrics of human rights law."[59] Further, "Proposals have been advanced to include the rights of individuals and non-governmental entities to a pure and decent environment within the ambit of present day human rights Conventions, i.e., United Nations Human Rights Covenants and the European Convention on Human Rights............Fortunately, the foundations are in place. When coupled with existing regional and international Conventions, such as those relating to Ocean pollution, it becomes clear that a massive corpus of law does in fact exist. It is becoming necessary to bring together this body of law in order to deal effectively with the growing destruction of environment. Secondly, additional treaty instruments are required, as an immediate solution."[60]

Terrorist activities have also posed a serious threat to nuclear establishments. Several conventions have been concluded to face this challenge. In this connection, International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, 1997, International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism 1999 and International Convention for the Suppression of Acts of Nuclear Terrorism, 2005 deserve special mention.

International Convention for Suppression of Terrorist Bombings, 1997 entered into force on 23 May, 2001. As of 5/10/2011, 164 countries had become parties to this convention. International Convention in Suppression for Financing of Terrorism, 1999, it entered into force on 10 April, 2002. As of June 2013, 182 countries had become parties to this convention.

Reference may be made here to the Convention on Early Notification of a Nuclear Accident of Radiological Emergency was adopted in 1986. It entered into force on 27 October, 1986. Moreover, Convention on Assistance in the Event of Nuclear Accident or Radiological Emergency was also adopted in 1986. It entered into force on 26 February, 1987. So far 86 countries have ratified this convention.

Legality of the use by a State of Nuclear Weapons in Armed Conflict and its effects on Health and Environment.—On 27th August, 1993, the World Health Organization (WHO) requested the International Court of Justice to give an advisory opinions on the following question :

---

[59] W. Paul Gormley, "The Right to a Safe and Decent Environment", I.J.I.L., Vol. 28 (1988) p. 1.

[60] Ibid, at pp. 31-32.

"In view of the health and environmental effects, would the use of nuclear weapons by a State in war or other armed conflict be a breach of its obligations under International law including the WHO Constitution?"

Before the World Court, it was contended by some states, specially America, that the Court should decline to give advisory opinion because the question before the Court is an essentially political one and is beyond the scope of the WHO's proper activities.

On 8th July 1996, the International Court of Justice held that the request for an advisory opinion submitted by WHO does not relate to a question which arises within the scope of activities of that organisation in accordance with Article 96, paragraph 2, of this Charter and as such an essential condition of founding its jurisdiction in the case is absent. The Court, therefore, refused to give the advisory opinion. The Court arrived at this decision by a majority of 11 votes to 3.

However, it may be noted here that earlier the General Assembly vide its resolution 49/75-K dated December 15, 1994 had requested the International Court of Justice to give its advisory opinion on the following question.

"Is the threat or use of nuclear weapons in any circumstance permitted under International Law ?"

The General Assembly had made this request in pursuance of Article 96, paragraph 1 of the Charter of the United Nations. Acceding to the request of the General Assembly, the World Court gave its advisory opinion on 8th July, 1996, i.e. the same day on which it refused to give advisory opinion at the request of WHO. The Court unanimously held that neither under customary nor conventional international law, there is specific authorisation for the threat or use of nuclear weapons. Moreover, a threat or use of nuclear weapons which is contrary to Article 2(4) of the U.N. Charter and which fails to meet the requirements of Article 51 is unlawful. The Court further held that a threat or use of nuclear weapons ought to be compatible with the requirements of international law applicable in armed conflict, especially, those of the principles and rules of internal humanitarian law, as well as with specific obligations under treaties and undertakings which expressly deal with nuclear weapons. Though the Court conceded that the use of nuclear weapons seems scarcely reconciliable with respect to the requirements of the principles and rules applicable in armed conflict, nevertheless the Court expressed the view that it does not have sufficient elements to enable it to conclude with certainty that the use of nuclear weapons would necessarily be at variance with the principles and rules of law applicable in armed conflict in any circumstance.

It was rather unfortunate that the World Court did not accept the request of the WHO to give advisory opinion. If the Court had accepted the request the matters relating to health and environment arising out of the use of nuclear weapons would have been clarified. Since the Court gave its advisory opinion on a similar question submitted by the General Assembly, it shows that the Court did not consider the question as political. As regards the opinion of the Court that the question is not within the scope of activities of WHO, serious doubts have been expressed. Since the use of nuclear weapons even in limited scale jeopardises health and affects adversely the environment which in its turn again causes adverse effects on health, it does not seem to be plausiable that the question referred by the WHO is beyond the scope of its activities.

Global Warming, Depletion of Ozone layer etc. : 'Global Warming : Global Warning'

Probably more dangerous than the danger of the use of nuclear weapons is the warming of the earth and depletion of ozone layer. According to the scientists, as a result of the warming up of the earth, water of the seas will rise 6 feet from its present level. If the glaciers of the Arctic and Antarctic melt, water of seas will rise more than 3 feet and as a result of this, major cities of the world and all the ports will submerge in water. In second half of December, 2002, the scientists reported that in past summer (before 2002), the melting of Greenland glaciers and Arctic Ocean Sea ice reached levels not seen in decades. It is feared that if the present trend of shrinking continues at current rates year round average sea ice coverage may drop by 20 per cent by 2050 and the Arctic may be almost ice free during summer months. By the year 2030, temperature of earth will increase by 4.5 Degree centigrade. The gravity of this situation is evident from the fact that during last 10,000 years temperature of the earth has varied not more than 2 Degree centigrade and in the Ice Age temperature of the earth was only five Degree centigrade less than the present temperature.

The main reason for the warming up of earth is the emission of carbondioxide from the burning of coal, oil fossil fuels and industrial gases. The earth is warming up as if it were a green-house. Since the industrial revolutions, the emission of carbondioxide has increased by 25% and in the next 50 years it is likely to increase by 50 per cent more. Nibous oxide, methan chlorifloro carbons (CFCs) and other green-house gases are warming up the earth. The only practical way to solve green-house problems is to reduce the production of energy. But the countries of the world are not prepared for this.

In the upper atmosphere, ozone layer protects earth from ultraviolet rays of the sun. Ultraviolet rays cause cancers, especially skin cancers, cataracts, destruction of aquatic life and vegetation and loss of immunity. The ozone layer shields the earth from deadly ultraviolet rays of the sun. One per cent depletion of the ozone layer may be responsible for reaching of 2 to 3 per cent more of ultraviolet rays on earth. In 1983 British Scientists witnessed for the first time a hole in ozone layer in South Pole. Two years after that i.e. in 1985, a Treaty was signed in Vienna on conservations of ozone layer. This was followed by signing of the Montreal Protocol on 16 September, 1987 by 56 countries stipulating a 50 per cent reduction of CFCs by 1998. This was followed by Helisinki meeting which stipulated total elimination of CFCs by the end of this century. It is based on the estimates that one per cent of the ozone layer has already been damaged. The hole in ozone layer is moving towards densely populated areas of America and its area is as big as the size of America. Montreal Protocol has come into force since January 1989 as more than one thirds of its signatories have ratified it. India has, however, yet not ratified it. India has claimed that for ending the CFCs causing deletion of ozone layer, she should be given the compensation of 2 billion dollars. Moreover, India does not see any rationale of ratifying the protocol because its release of CFCs is just 6,000 tons a year which is equal to one and a half day's of world total release. India's per capital consumption is. 03 Kg. as compared to developed countries per capita consumption of one Kg. The developed countries release 95% of CFC's. The developing countries share is only 5% yet the treaty stipulates each developing country will be allowed a maximum 300 gms. per capita per year consumption of CFCs until 1989. Then CFC consumption must be frozen at the level reached by 1989 if it is well below the maximum limit. On the other hand industrialized countries are allowed a per capita CFC consumption of 500 gms. per year until 1989. Thereafter it will be reduced to half that amount by 1993. The countries which do not sign the protocol will not be allowed to import certain CFCs and halons from the signatory countries. They will also not be able to import technology or obtain financial aid to produce such chemicals. So far, 17 countries have ratified the protocol. In the last week of February 1992, India indicated that she might sign the Montreal Protocol in March 1992. On 7th April 1992, the Minister of State for Parliamentary Affairs told that Government has decided to join the Montreal Protocol after the amendments to protocol adopted at London in June, 1990 come into force.

The Montreal Protocol came into force on 1st January, 1989 as more than one-third of signatory states have ratified it. The fourth meeting of the State Parties of Montreal Protocol concluded on 25th November, 1992 at Copenhagen.

It need not be overemphasized that the developed countries have capacity to discover alternative sources of energy. The developing countries are not in a position to give up or reduce consumption of coal, oil, fossil fuels and other CFCs. Therefore, India's claim for compensation is reasonable and justified. An Ozone Fund should be established so that countries such as India be compensated. The idea of financial assistance to developing countries to help them to change over to CFC free substitute was first mooted by the Executive Director of the U.N. Environment Programme (UNEP), Dr. Mostafa Tolba, at the Helisinki meeting. Since the problem is worldwide, its solution should also be found on a world scale keeping in view the interests of developing countries. Since developed nations release 95 per cent of CFCs, they have special and more obligations in this connection. On 11th March, 1989, 24 countries including Hungary, India, Italy, Norway, Japan, Netherlands, Spain, and France signed Hague Declaration. The Declaration adopted the principle, inter alia, that countries to which decisions taken to protect the atmosphere shall prove to be an abnormal or special burden, in view, inter alia, of the level of their development and actual responsibility for the deterioration of the atmosphere, shall receive fair and equitable assistance to compensate them, for bearing such burden. To this end mechanisms will have to be developed.

In view of the gravity of the situation U.N. Environment Programme (UNEP) chose "Global Warming: Global Warning" as a slogan for environment day of this year (i.e. 5th June, 1989). The problem is really very serious and soft options will not solve it. It requires strong measures, will and determination of states to implement it. Though the international community has awakened to the gravity of the problem, measures taken so far and progress achieved is far from satisfactory.

While inaugurating the ministerial meeting of the small states conference on sea level rise being held in the island resort of Kurumlia (Maldives), President Gayoom called on the affluent nations and the international community to help the fight of small island nations against the threat of being submerged by the rise of sea level. The conference was being held in the Maldives because according to predictions, it would be the first to go under water. As a first step, President Gyoom called for agreement by the world community for stabilising and subsequently restricting the green-house gases released into the atmosphere.

The seminar organised by the Malaysian forum of environmental journalists and the Asian Institute for Development Communication called for setting for establishing a research centre to prevent degradation of the earth's environment by finding substitutes for existing chemicals such as CFCs used in various industrial applications.

On 21st September, 1989, the Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister proposed that a U.N. Conference on the Environment in 1992 should be held at the summit level. He was speaking at a press conference at the United Nations Headquarters. As regards the preparations being made for an international conference on environmental problems, he said that in order to give a strong push to the practical deeds in the field of environment, the proposed international conference of 1992 should adopt some kind of a code of environmental behaviour. Though it is a good idea, the problem has assumed such serious magnitude that world community cannot afford to remain inactive and complacent till then. Continuous and determined efforts are required to check the degradation of the earth's environment.

It may be noted here that in September 1991, delegates from 116 countries attended the ten-day warming at Naircbi with a view to enter into an international pact to slow global warming by controlling man-made emissions of carbon dioxide which trap heat, and are believed to be the main cause for gradual warming of the earth's atmosphere while the experts of most of the countries supported the idea of stablising carbon-dioxide emission at 1990 levels by the year 2000, America, which is the world's biggest emitter of carbon dioxide, refused to set a specific target on reducing the emissions, saying scientific data on the issue is uncertain and the costs of implementing an emissions reductions policy are unpredictable. Thus the U.S. was accused of 'delaying' the pact. The U.S. is the world's worst polluter besides consuming the most resources and giving out 21 per cent of the Chloro Fluro Carbons (CFC's) in the atmosphere.

The problem of global warming and consequences thereof is becoming more and more serious day by day. Recently scientists have detected cases of sheep becoming blind and children suffering allergies and sunburns in southern Chile because of ozone depletion. The Scientists have also detected a new ozone hole in the earth's stratospheric layer. Being alarmed by this, the U.S. and British Governments have now decided to hasten the process of phasing out chloroflurocarbuns (CFCs), the main agents of ozone destruction they have revised the target to halt production of CFCs altogether by 1995 instead of earlier target of doing this by 2000.

The developed countries have succeeded in evolving appropriate ozone-friendly substitutes and are now in a position to hasten the phasing out CFCs earlier than the anticipated deadline. The Third-world countries cannot afford the costs of using such advanced technologies. It was on account of this reason India and China refused to sign Montreal Protocol. India therefore insisted on the "polluter must pay"[61] principle and succeeded in the creation of a special 240 million fund to be financed by the developed countries to help country like India to phase out chlorfluro carbons. Later on, it was agreed that the size of the Montreal Protocol Fund would be increased to U.S. $ 500 million for the three year period 1994-96. The developed countries have agreed on a minimum level of funding of $113 million annually during 1993-1994. Despite all these efforts the situation is still grim and complacency in respect may shell disaster.

It has been reported that condition of the Ozone layer over the Central Antarctic deteriorated at the beginning of October 1993 to a new all time low with 60 per cent of the earth's protective sheath there having been destroyed. The World Meterological Organisation (WMO) said at Geneva that at a height of between 14 and 19 km. the Ozone over the Antarctic, a continent bigger than Europe, almost disappeared.

In 1999, the ozone hole seen on Antarctic is reported to be the largest seen so far. It was greater than one crore square miles and lasted for 100 days. It became visible 15 days prior to the last year and its period also increased from two three weeks. According to a recent study, by the middle of next century short radio waves, which are essential for long distance communication, may be destroyed. According to the study of a scientific panel a world-wide rise in temperature at the Earth's surface is "undoubtedly real". The Panel has pointed out in January, 2000 that the increase in temperatures over the past century between 0.7 and 1.4 degrees Fahrenheit—a 30 per cent increase from earlier projections that reflects record shattering high temperatures in the late 1990s. The Panel warned that further warming could disrupt agriculture and cause sea levels to rise swamping coastal cities. The 11 member panel was organized by the Academy of Sciences National Research Council (NRC). In the first week of December, 1999, the U.N. said that planet's protective ozone layer would start to heal in the next few years but the non-government organisations disagreed with this and slammed the U.N. for not moving faster.

The conclusion of Kyoto Protocol on Global Warming (1997) is a great land-mark, for preventing global warming. The Protocol fixed the target for reducing greenhouse gase. According to the Protocol, European Union, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Latvia, Liechtenstein, Luchania, Monaco, Romania, Slovakia, Slovenia and Switzerland were to reduce 8%. America was required to reduce emissions by 7%. Iceland and Austraila were to reduce 10% and 8% respectively. The target covered emissions of six main greenhouse gases - carbon di oxide (CO_2), Methane (CH_4), Nitrous oxide (N_2O), Hydro-fluro carbons (HHCs), Perfluoro-carbons (PFCs) and sulphur-hexca fluoroide (SF_6).

America, however indicated its intention not to ratify and withdrew itself from the Treaty in March, 2001.

Forty-eight States Parties classified as least developed countries by the U.N. were given special consideration under the convention on account of their limited capacity to respond to climate changes and adopt to adverse effects.

Kyoto Protocol entered into force on 16 February, 2005 because on 18 November, 2004 Russia deposited its instruments of ratification with the U.N. thus marking the start of the ninety day count to the entry into force of the Protocol, an international legal finding agreement to reduce greenhouse gases emissions worldwide.

---

[61] It may be desirable to note here that total per capita use of the C.F.Cs (used in refrigeration, airconditioning etc.) is 1.22 kilogrammes highest in the U.S. Japan and Europe are not far behind. In the rest of the world, consumption rates are far lower.

The Kyoto Global Warming Treaty entered into force on 16 February, 2005. As of November, 2009, 187 countries had signed and ratified the treaty. but a boycott by the biggest polluter of the world, the U.S. has caused a great upset. America refused to ratify the treaty because according to it it would harm the economy and is flawed by the lack of restrictions by emerging economies. China, India and Australia, the other developed nations not to join the treaty stated that were on tract to cut emissions by 30%.

The U.N. Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) submitted a report forecasting that in coming years famine, hot winds, floods etc. will occur frequently and will gradually increase sea level. The Panel also clarified that more than 90% global warming is due to human activities. The said Panel comprises of 2,300 scientists of 130 countries. According to Panel the temperature increase would be more than what was forecasted in 2001. According to panel by 2100, the rise in temperature is likely to be between 1.1 to 6.4 degrees. As the forecast of 2001, the rise in temperature was expected to be between 2 to 4.5 degrees. As per report of the Panel (IPCC), by the end of this century the sea level is expected to rise from 18 to 59 cm. If the snow of the poles continues to melt at the current speed, there will be additional increase of 10 to 20 cms.

In May 2007, a U.N. report has said that Brazil, China and India have reduced emission of gases as was expect of developed countries. On 17 May, 2007 Clinton Foundation and Microsoft Corporation disclosed to have developed a technique (new software) which would watch global warming of prominent cities. On 17 May, 2007 in order to solve the problem of 16 cities including Mumbai a five billion dollar initiative was signed.

In the meantime a new warning has been made that climate change has weakened the capacity of Antartic sea to absorb the excessive carbon-di-oxide of the world. This has been reported in U.N. Report published in June, 2007. More than 150 crore people of Asia may be affected by it.

The facts of dangerous forecasts about global warming have ultimately influenced even countries like America, on June 7, 2008, the leaders of Group-8 undertook to reduce emissions upto 50%. Alongwith this voluntary act America asked India and China to reduce emission of greenhouse gases. In fact, America desires to present India and China as examples to other States.

On 27 September, 2007 under United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change summoned a meeting of prominent nations of the world to call a conference in December, 2007. These nations included America, India, China and Brazil. The conference was called on 14 December, 2007 at Bali (Indonesia) following of the main decisions of the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change Revised Draft Decision, 14 December, 2007, Bali, Indonesia—

(1) Decided to launch a comprehensive process to enable the full, effective and sustained implementation of the convention through long-term cooperative action, now, upto and beyond 2012 in order to reach an agreed outcome and adopt a decision at its fifteenth session.

(2) Decided that the process shall be conducted under a subsidiary body under the convention hereby establish and known as the Ad Hoc Working Grants on long-term Cooperative Action under the convention that shall complete its work in 2009 and present the outcome of the work to the conference of the parties for adoption at its fifteenth session.

(3) Decided that the first session of the group shall be held as soon as is feasible and not later than April, 2008.

Under the above convention (i.e., UNFCCC), it is also under consideration that in order to solve the problem of global warming, an additional tax be imposed on air tickets. This proposal was brought before the meeting of International Civil Aviation Organisation (ICAO) on September, 2007.

America has for the first time accepted that the developing countries have made endeavours to reduce the emission of gases.

It may be noted that India is the world's fourth greatest country to obtain energy from air (i.e., winds). America is the greatest producer of greenhouse gases. It produces 6.9 billion tons carbon-di-oxide every year. China emits 4.1 billion tons of greenhouse gases. Japan emits 1.9 billion tons of greenhouse gases every year. According to America, it has spent 37 billion dollars on activities relating to climate change. America also contended that it is developing hydrogen and clean coal.

According to scientists, Arctic summer snow is lessening slowly and gradually. A Mexican scientist has, however, raised a hope that by increasing growth of Plankton in seas. Plankton D.M.S. or Dimethyl Sulfide will produce clouds and this would help to reduce the global warming.

On the basis of global warming and its effects all over the world, it is now said that 2° rise temperature of planet earth is likely to take place sooner than estimated earlier.

Copenhagen Summit Conference on Climate Change (December, 2009).—Copenhagen Summit Conference, held in the third week of December, 2009, is generally regarded as a failed conference. Realizing that the Copenhagen was moving towards a failure, the leaders of U.S., India, Brazil and South Africa entered into an agreement to save Summit Conference of 194 countries. Thus after the negotiations of two weeks, a positive agreement came before the conference. Thus as per Chinese leader, the conference achieved a significant success. China warmly welcomed the move because with small concessions great benefit was obtained. Thus, according to Chinese leader, the conference achieved significant success.

A great success of the conference was the establishment of Green Fund. In order to help and save the poor countries from global warming, a Green Fund of 100 billion dollars was promised. For the years, 2010 to 2012, the U.S. of America promised 3.6 billion dollars, Japan 11 billion dollars, and 10.6 billion dollars. According to Secretary-General of the United Nations, Ben-Ki-Moon, this agreement lacks consensus and cannot be said to be ambitious. In order to protect themselves, people expected strict action and were greatly disappointed. However, as opined by the Secretary-General of the U.N. some achievements were indeed obtained. According to Rajendra Pachauri, Chairman of International Panel for Climate Change (IPCC), on the basis of the agreement, efforts ought to be made for entering into a binding agreement.

The Copenhagen Conference aimed to reduce global warming by two degrees but no target was fixed for reducing global emissions for the year 2020 or 2050. Probably this was the greatest failure. Rajendra Pachauri, the Chairman of IPCC, said that the increase in global warming and the dangers emanating thereof were becoming visible and in a near future, the situation was likely to become dangerous and grave. Therefore, if the planet earth is to be saved from global warming and climate changes the nations of the world will have to take hard decisions.

Durban Conference on Climate Change 28th November-11 December, 2011.—United Nations Climate Change Conference was held in Durban (South Africa) from 28th November, 2011 to establish a new treaty to limit carbon emissions. The conference agreed to a legally binding deal comprising all countries. The deal will be prepared by 2015 and will come into effect in 2020.

It may be noted that while the President of the Conference, Maita Nekoana Mashabane declared the Conference a success, scientists and environmental groups warned that the deal was not sufficient to avoid global warming beyond 2°C as more urgent act was needed. Similarly, International Panel on climate change warned in November, 2011 that extreme weather will strike as climate change will take hold. Moreover rainfall, droughts can cost billions of dollars and destroy lives. Estimates suggest that every dollar invested in adaptation to climate change could save $60 million damage.

After two weeks of negotiation a deal was reached only the last day i.e. Sunday, 11th December, 2011 after a 60 hour marathon negotiation. Negotiations agreed to be a part of a legally binding treaty to address global warning. The terms of the future treaty were to be defined by 2015 and to become effective in 2020.

The agreement referred as the "Durban Platform" is notable in that for the first time it included developing countries such as India and China as well as the U.S. which refused to sign the Kyoto Protocol.

It is important to note that the agreement entailed the continuation of the Kyoto Protocol, although only some countries including members of the European community were likely to commit.

The warning and predictions of the scientists and environmentalists were proving to be correct. The World Meteorological Organisation (WMO) said in Geneva on 06/04/11 that the record loss of the ozone, the atmosphere layer that shields life from the Sun's harmful rays had been observed over the Arctic in the last few months. The WMO said : "Depletion of the unprecedented level over the Arctic this spring because of presence of ozone depleting substances in the atmosphere and a very cold winter in the atmosphere".

Ultraviolet (UV) rays, which have been linked to skin cancer, cataracts and damage to human in immune system. Some crops and crops and forms of marine life can also suffer adverse effects. Indeed adverse effects have already been witnessed. Last but not the least, according to a leaked UN draft report in summer months in ice-free Arctic can licence a reality if global temperature rises by more than 2 degree celsius over current levels. The draft copy of the UN's Inter-governmental Panel on climate change report said there is a 90-100% chance that Arctic shrink through the 21st century with rising green house emissions. According to a study by US National Snow and Ice Data Centre, an irreversible climate "tipping point" could occur within next 20 years as a result of the release of huge quantities of organic carbon locked away as frozen plant matter in the vast permafrost region of the Arctic. The results of the study showed that as the Arctic warms up, frozen carbon will thaw out, releasing carbon in to the atmosphere.

Leaders of the world are discussing the U.S. President Obama's new promise under the clean Air Act to cut emissions by 30% (from 2005 levels by 2030) in power plants. In Bonn, in the first weak of June 2014 leaders were discussing under the UN Framework convention on climate change. In September, 2014, leaders discussed in Newyork city in the action on climate change in the meeting convened by U.N. Secretary-General to take the discussion forward. Meanwhile, in Mexico city at the Legislative place of San Lazaro, 250 legislators from over 80 countries participated in a three day 2nd world summit of Legislators in June 6 to 8 of 2014 organized by London based GLOBE International which has its office in India as well.

Lima Conference on Climate Change.—At the Lima Climate Meet on 14th December, 2014, a compromise draft on national pledges to cut global carbon emissions saved the U.N. Climate Change. After a marathon 13-day Conference of Parties (COP), negotiators on Sunday, i.e. 14th December, 2014, adopted the draft that addressed India's concerns also and set the road-map for a new binding deal. As pointed out by India's Environment Minister, Prakash Javadekar, all of India's concerns were addressed.

It may be noted here that while the outcome was not along expected lines, it some how managed to keep red lines for all countries-developed and developing. Thus the agreement—Lima call for Climate Action—paved the way for all nations, to submit their 'nationally determined' pledge for emission cuts and adaptation measures by October 2015—and not by June 2015 as was expected after last year's warsaw talks.

Though the Lima Agreement did not give an ambitious road-map for climate finance, it, to a great extent, addressed concerns of developing countries by keeping the 'adaptation' clause intact without diluting principles-CBDRs of the UN Framework convention on climate change and its Kyoto Protocol. It may be noted that the contentious issues will come up again during the Paris talks ahead of the final agreement. According to Indian Environment Minister, Prakash Javedkar, the delegates approved a blue print for talks leading up to a deal in 2015 that will come into effect after 2020.

At the Lima Meet, nations concluded that by elaborating the elements of the new agreement, scheduled to be stamped in Paris in late 2015, while also agreeing to the ground rules on how all countries can submit contributions to the new pact during the first quarter of 2015. These intended Nationally Determined contributions will form the foundation for climate action post-2050 when the new pact will be set for reducing emissions.

It is important to note here that the session of the United Nations Framework convention on climate change headquarters is the last formal discussion before the meeting of 196 countries in Paris to sign a pact to curb global warming. Negotiators from developing countries—who are concerned the draft aims to push the responsibility of fighting climate change to them-sought a fresh text for Paris discussions. Thus climate negotiations in Bonn got off to a rocky start on Monday i.e. 19th October, 2015 with India and other developing countries opposing the first draft for a landmark climate deal to be signed in Paris in December, 2015, terming the text an example of "climate apartheid".

It was felt that the draft fails to raise climate finance commitments from rich nations and there was concern about the year by when global emissions will peak which could have developmental implications for countries such as India. A climate negotiator from a developing country said, "We want a total overhaul of the lop-sided draft which does not meet the aspirations of the developing world and climate vulnerability". The negotiators from the developing world said, cannot turn the bedrock of convention upside down. Further, the differentiation of action between the rich and the developing world cannot be undone by the new deal".

Thus, it is hoped, that the first draft will change dramatically and the co-chairs will have to present a reworked draft by Tuesday, 20th October 2015.

1994 World Conference on Natural Disaster Reduction

The World Conference on Natural Disaster Reduction was held at Yakohama (Japan) from 23 to 27 May, 1994, at the mid-point of International Decade for Natural Disaster Reduction (1990-2000). It was attended by 1,000 delegates, including the representatives of 147 countries. It called for development of a global culture of prevention and improved risk assessment, broader monitoring and communication of warnings. The conference adopted the Yakohama strategy for a Safer World : Guidelines for Natural Disaster Prevention, Preparedness and Mitigation. The documents include : an assessment of disaster reduction since the beginning of the Decade a strategy for the year 2000 and beyond; a plan of action of activities at the community and national levels, at the regional and sub-regional levels, and at the international level, and recommendations for follow up action.

As pointed out by the U.N. Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs at the opening session of the conference on 23 May, 1974, "Earthquakes and cyclones will happen. There is nothing we can do about that, but we can be prepared for them when they do strike". Further, "Disaster reduction can take place at any point in the process which we call disaster. It can comprise prevention and preparedness, relief and development as well as measures to reduce the effects of such disasters".

Summarising the outcome of the conference, "Yakohama Message" affirms that the impact of natural disasters in terms of human and economic losses has risen and society has become more vulnerable to such disasters over the past two decades, earthquakes, volcanoes, landslides, tidal waves, droughts and other natural events had killed some 3 million people and inflicted injury, displacement and misery on countless more. The number of people affected had increased by 6 per cent per year, three times the global population growth rate.

It was pointed out that environmental protection as a component of sustainable development consistent with powerly alleviation is imperative in the prevention and mitigation of natural disasters.[62]

1994 Desertification Convention

The convention on desertification was called for at the 1992 Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro and mandated by the General Assembly in resolution 47/188 for completion by June, 1994. The Convention was concluded at Paris on 18th June, 1994. More than 100 Governments concluded negotiations on the said date. It is a concerted effort to help over 900 million people around the world fight life and death battle against the degradation of their fragile dry lands i.e. the process of desertification. The Convention was to enter into force 90 days after it has been ratified by 50 countries. By 18 December, 2010, 193 countries had become parties to the convention.

It may be noted that a previous U.N. Plan of Action to combat Desertification, adopted in 1977, fell short of expectations because of inadequate funding and a too narrow, technical focus. It failed to give enough recognition to the Socio-economic causes of the problem and did not involve local populations in the process.

Having learnt from the past experiences and with a view to improve the effectiveness of existing international finance, the convention has established a "Global Mechanism" to identify and coordinate available funding sources. The governments have been urged to pursue the possibility of financing anti-desertification action through the Global Environmental Facility (GEF), in cases where curbing desertification can be linked with the GEF's four mandated funding areas : preventing climate change, ensuring conservation of biological diversity; protecting international waterways; and reducing depletion of Ozone layer. The GEF is the interim financing channel for the legal agreements the convention on Biological Diversity and Framework Convention on Climate change signed at the Earth Summit.[63]

Earth Summit (1992)*

The Earth Summit or United Nations Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) began at Rio de Janeiro, Capital of Brazil, on 3rd June 1992. It was the largest international conference in the history of international relations and international law. It was attended by 178 nations and more than 20,000 participants attended the conference. The plenary session was attended by 130 heads of State and Government. UNCED Chief Maurice Strong described it "parliament of the planet." According to environmental experts, this was probably the last chance to save our dear planet Earth. The success of the conference depended on the reconciliation of the interests of North and South. As remarked by Maurice Strong, Secretary-General of UNCED, "If we fail at Rio, it will be one of the greatest breakdowns ever in international relations especially concerning North and South." Indeed "This is our last chance".

The Earth Summit is the culmination of a series of UN conferences beginning with the Stockholm conference on Human Environment in 1972. In 1983, the General Assembly of the United Nations set up a commission, headed by Norway's Prime Minister, Gro Harlem Brindtland, to examine the state of world environment and development, beyond 2000. The report of the commission entitled "Our Common Future", highlighted the risks of human future if we continue the current modes of unsustainable development. Consequently, General Assembly decided to hold a special conference on safeguarding environment against further degradation beyond repair, and sustainable development for the future of the mankind on earth. Even after the decision to hold the Earth Summit was taken it took more than two years to prepare for the Earth Summit held in Rio de Janeiro (Brazil). There was growing awareness and common concern in the world about the constantly increasing degradation of global environment. It need not be overemphasized that much of this degradation is due to patterns of production and consumption in industrialized countries. But from the point of environment the world, nay the entire planet Earth, is one and indivisible. Hence the consequences of degradation of global environment are also shared by nearly 80 per cent of the world population which resides in developing countries. The Rio conference therefore had before it topics such as global warming, ozone depletion, climatic changes, biological diversity and management of forests.

---

[62] See U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXXI No. 3 (September, 1994) pp. 70-71.

[63] See U.N. Chronicle, Vol. XXXI No. 3 (September, 1994) at p. 74.

* See also for (1995) C.S.E. Q. 5(c).

On 22 December 1989, 159 States Members of the U.N. General Assembly passed two resolutions (44/228 and 44/207) expressing their resolve to draft as soon as possible a convention to protect the earth's climate and to convene a world conference in Brazil in 1992 on ways to encourage environmentally sound development. The Preparatory Committee of UNCED held its first substantive session at Nairobi from 6 to 31 August, 1990 and recommended that UNCED scheduled to be held in Brazil in 1992 should be convened at highest political level that of Heads of States or Governments, Maurice Strong, Secretary-General of the UNCED proposed that the world meeting agree on an Earth Charter to be known as Agenda 21—a set of principles for the conduct of peoples and nations towards each other and the Earth.[64]

On 21 December 1990, the General Assembly created (vide resolution 45/212) the Inter-governmental Negotiating Committee to conduct "a single inter-governmental negotiating process" on a framework convention on climate change. Assembly also decided that the convention and related instruments should be open for signature at the UNCED in June 1992. The Inter-governmental Negotiating Committee held its first session at the Westfields International Conference Centre at Washington D.C.[65] on 4 Feb. 1991. It held its second session from June, 1991 at Geneva. It was attended by the representative of 127 states.[66] Proposals to achieve environmentally sound, sustainable economic development in all countries known collectively as "Agenda 21" were thoroughly discussed by the Preparatory Committee for the UNCED from 12th August to 4 September 1992. During the session, the Preparatory Committee agreed on a framework for "Agenda 21" which was to be adopted in Rio de Janeiro, as a comprehensive blue print for action into the twenty-first century. Agreement was also reached on a text, the "Earth Charter" or "Rio Declaration on Sustainable Development" that will form the basis for commitment by states to conference goals. While it will not establish any strict obligations, it will be morally binding on signatory States.[67]

Industrialized countries degrade the environment by insatiable consumption of resources and intense production of wastes, while high fertility, and rapid population growth in many developing countries put damaging pressure on the planet. Combined, such human demands are undermining the world's natural resource base-land, water and air upon which all development depends. These issues are, therefore, not only environmental but also economic. With a view to highlight these links, the U.N. conference on Environment and Development, which was originally scheduled to be held from 1 to 12 June, 1992, was held from 3rd June to 12 June 1992 at Rio de Janerio (Brazil). The conference was funded by the UN and voluntary contributions.[68]

Some of the main issues confronting the Earth Summit or UNCED were Finances (i.e. who will pay for the cleaning of the world) ; technology transfer ; institutional framework, climate change ; forests; biological diversity; and sustainable development. Six issues on which North and South expressed divergent views were : Greenhouse gas emissions; Forests ; Population; Technology transfer ; Finance; and Degradation. Thus on account of several reasons a great uncertainty was haunting.

---

[64] See U.N.C., Vol. XXVII, No. 4 (December, 1990), p. 63.

[65] See U.N.C., Vol. XXVIII, No. 2 (June, 1991), p. 56.

[66] U.N.C. Vol. XXVIII, No. 3 (September 1991), p. 66.

[67] U.N.C., Vol. XXVIII, No. 4 (December 1991), p. 65.

[68] U.N.C., Vol. XXIX, No. 1 (March 1992), p. 81.

Besides the main issue of funding environmental programmes outlined in Agenda 21, other major achievements of the UNCED include a convention on Bio-diversity, a convention on climate change, a convention on Forestry, and Earth Charter or Bio Declaration. As regards Bio-diversity convention, America took a very rigid stand from the beginning that it will not sign the convention. The aim of the Bio-diversity convention is to preserve the vast gene pool of flora and fauna and make developed countries pay for exploiting it. America took such a rigid stand that even countries like Britain, Germany, Japan and European Community distanced themselves from American stand with the result that America found itself isolated in this respect. On 7th June 1992, Japan indicated that it will join Britain and the 11 other members of the European Community in breaking with the U.S. to sign the Bio-diversity treaty. India also signed the treaty on bio-diversity. There was however controversy about the ambiguous clause relating to transfer of technology. According to first clause of Article 16 of the Convention, the contracting parties are to facilitate access to technologies that are relevant to the conservation and sustainable use of biological diversity or make use of genetic resources. The second clause further adds that the technologies are to be provided 'under fair and most favourable terms, including on concessional and preferential terms were mutually agreed'. The third and fourth clause of Article 16 add that irrespective of Intellectual Property Rights (IPR) and patent protection, developing countries which provide genetic resources should be given access to all technology making use of these resources and even private sector companies will 'facilitate transfer of technology for the benefit of both government institutions and private sector of developing countries. The fifth clause of Article 16, however, recognized that patents and other IPR may have an influence on the implementation of the convention, because it provided that contracting parties shall cooperate to ensure that such rights are supportive of and do not run counter to its objectives. The controversy revolved on a sentence in the second clause which says that "in the case of technology subject to patents and other IPR, such access or transfer shall be provided on terms consistent with adequate and effective protection of IPR". This was probably added to please the US who had refused to sign the convention. But as remarked by Muchkund Dubey, India's former foreign Secretary, "Despite the apparent contradiction in the clauses this is a significant improvement over the Dunkel Draft". Further, "In just two years the bio-diversity convention has achieved what could not be done in six years of GATT negotiations". Experts of developed countries, however, interpret it differently. Thus divergent interpretations are being given in respect of the said vague clause. The convention on Biological Diversity had been signed by as many as 167 countries. Mongolia was the thirtieth country to ratify the convention. The prescribed number of countries (i.e. 30) having ratified the convention, three months after Mongolia ratified the convention has come into force as part of international law on 29th December, 1993.

As of 20 June 2013, 193 countries had become parties to the U.N. Convention on Biological Diversity. However, Andorra Holy See, Sumalia and the United States of America have not ratified the Convention. The U.S.A. has signed the Convention but has not ratified it.

It may be noted here that in the Fifty-third year of the Republic Indian Parliament has enacted the Biological Diversity Act, 2002. As per preamble of the Act, this Act has been enacted to provide for conservation of Biological Diversity, sustainable use of its components and fair and equitable sharing of the benefits arising out of the use of biological resources, knowledge and for matters connected therewith or incidental thereto.

As regards convention on climate change or Green-house Gas Emission, there was a wide gulf between the views of the North and South. While the North wanted a 20 per cent cut in green-house gas emissions like carbon dioxide and methane by 2005 and a major shift from the use of coal and wood for energy, the South blamed developed countries for excessive emissions over last 50 years and wanted them to reduce it considerably. The South was opposed to any cut in its own emission as it hindered development. As pointed out by Deng Nan, China's Deputy Minister for Science and Technology "Developed Countries are the biggest polluters. They have to take moral responsibility for it and make financial commitments for cleaning up the mess." But due to pressures from the US and OPEC countries the convention on climate change was watered down. Originally, the convention aimed to reduce carbon dioxide (Co) emissions to their 1990 levels by the year 2000 but the treaty now simply requires signatories to formulate plans "with the aim" of returning emission to 1990 levels. The developed countries have agreed to provide financial help and technology to third world nations to help them deal with global warming. They have, however, not accepted any specific obligations in this respect. When the Treaty on climate change was opened for signature, Mr. Fernando Collor, Brazil's President, was the first to sign it. Subsequently 150 countries signed U. N. Convention on Climate change. After having been ratified by 50 countries (i.e. prescribed number of countries), climate change convention came into force on 21st March, 1994. The conference of the State Parties of the convention met in March, 1995.

As noted above, the convention commits developed countries to take measures aimed at returning their emissions of carbon di-oxide and other green-house gases to 1990 levels by the year 2000. The convention has now come into force on 21st March, 1994. By 24th May, 2004, the convention had been ratified by 189 States. So far 195 countries have become parties to the convention. These 195 parties include all U. N. Members except South Sudan. In addition to the U. N. Members (193), Nine and European Union have also become parties to the convention.

The convention on Forests also generated a lot of controversy from the very beginning. While the rich nations wanted to control massive deforestation through a convention, the developing countries regarded it as infringement on their sovereignty. Developing countries including India had serious reservations on forest principles contained in the draft. These countries led by India succeeded in getting the said provisions changed. Thus consensus was reached on provisions relating to sustained development of forests. It was recognized that forests are essential to economic development and the maintenance of all forms of life. In committing themselves to the prompt implementation of the principles agreed, countries decided to keep them under assessment for their adequacy with regard to their further international cooperation on forest issues. Thus the provisions agreed are persuasive and weak.

In addition to the above conventions, one of the major achievements of the Earth Summit i.e. UNCED is the adoption of Earth Charter or Rio Declaration. America had reservations about some of the provisions of the Declaration yet it ultimately decided to sign it. According to Indian Prime Minister, Mr. Narasimha Rao, Rio Declaration is 'balanced'. Rio Declaration contains 27 principles or points concerning almost all countries of the global community, and enlisting general rights and obligations on environmental protection. The more important of the principles of Rio Declaration are as follows :—

Principle 1 : Human beings are at the centre of concerns for sustainable development. They are entitled to healthy and productive life in harmony with nature.

2. States have, in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations and the principles of international law, the sovereign right to exploit their own resources pursuant to their own environmental policies, and the responsibility to ensure that activities within their jurisdiction or control do not cause damage to the environment of other States or areas beyond the limits of national jurisdiction.

3. The right to development must be fulfilled so as to equitably meet developmental and environmental needs of present and future generations.

4. In order to achieve sustainable development, environmental protection shall constitute an integral part of the development process and cannot be considered in isolation from it.

5. All States and all people shall cooperate in the essential task of eradicating poverty as an indispensable requirement for sustainable development.

6. The special situation and needs of developing countries, particularly the least development and those most environmentally vulnerable, shall be given special priority. International actions in the field of environment and development should also address the interests and needs of all countries.

7. States shall cooperate in a spirit of global partnership to conserve, protect and restore the health and integrity of the earth's ecosystems. In view of the different contributions to global environment degradation, States have common but differentiated responsibilities. The developed countries acknowledge the responsibility that they bear in the international pursuit of sustainable development in view of the pressures their societies place on the global environment and of the technologies and financial resources they command.

8. To achieve sustainable development and a higher quality of life for all people, States should reduce and eliminate unsustainable patterns of production and consumption and promote appropriate demographic policies.

9. States should cooperate to strengthen indigenous capacity—building for sustainable development by improving scientific understanding through exchanges of scientific and technological knowledge, and by enhancing the development, adaptation, diffusion and transfer of technologies, including new and innovative technologies.

10. Environmental issues are best handled with the participation of all concerned citizens, at the relevant level. At the national level, each individual shall have appropriate access to information concerning the environment that is held by public authorities, including information on hazardous materials and activities in their communities, and the opportunity to participate in decision-making processes. States shall facilitate and encourage public awareness and participation by making information widely available. Effective access to judicial and administrative proceedings, including redress and remedy, shall be provided.

11. States shall enact effective environmental legislation, environmental standards, management objectives and priorities should reflect the environmental and developmental context to which they apply. Standards applied by some countries may be inappropriate and of unwarranted economic and social cost to other countries, in particular developing countries.

12. States should cooperate to promote a supportive and open international economic system that would lead to economic growth and sustainable development in all countries, to better address the problems of environmental degradation. Trade policy measures for environmental purposes should not constitute a means of arbitrary or unjustifiable discrimination or a disguised restriction on international trade. Unilateral actions to deal with environmental challenges outside the jurisdiction of the importing country should be avoided. Environmental measures addressing transboundary or global environmental problems should, as far as possible, be based on an international consensus.

13. States shall develop national law regarding liability and compensation for the victims of pollution and other environmental damages. States shall also cooperate in an expeditious and more determined manner to develop further international law regarding liability and compensation for adverse effects of environmental damage caused by activities within their jurisdiction or control to areas beyond their jurisdiction.

14. State should effectively cooperate to discourage or prevent the relocation and transfer to other States of any activities and substances that cause several environmental degradation or are found to be harmful to human health.

15. In order to protect the environment, the precautionary approach shall be widely applied by States according to their capabilities. Where there are threats of serious or irreversible damage, lack of full scientific certainty shall not be used as a reason for postponing cost-effective measures to prevent environmental degradation.

16. National authorities should endeavour to promote the internalisation of environmental costs and the use of economic instruments, taking into account the approach that the polluter should, in principle, bear the cost of pollution, with due regard to the public interest and without distorting international trade and investment.

17. Environmental impact assessment, as a national instrument, shall be undertaken for proposed activities that are likely to have a significant adverse impact on the environment and are subject to a decision of a competent national authority.

18. States shall immediately notify other States of any natural disasters or other emergencies that are likely to produce sudden harmful effects on the environment of those States. Every effort shall be made by the international community to help States so afflicted.

19. States shall provide prior and timely notification and relevant information to potentially affected States on activities that may have a significant adverse transboundary environmental effect.

Yet another accomplishment of the Earth Summit was the agreement to create a new U.N. body to monitor compliance with environmental treaties and review progress towards the goals of the Earth Summit. Further, to salvage some of the prestige lost due to adoption of rigid attitude in respect of Bio-diversity treaty and consequent U.S. isolation in the Summit President George Bush proposed on 31 June 1992 a follow up conference to the Earth Summit. Probably taking cue from this proposal, Mr. Maurice Strong, Secretary-General of UNCED, announced a follow-up Summit in two to four years to make nations accountable for decisions taken at the Earth Summit.

As regards the final outcome of the Earth Summit, divergent views have been expressed. Even before the summit had begun, chances of the complete success were dampened because of rigid attitude of the U.S. over Bio-diversity treaty and other issues. As regards the crucial issue of funding environmental programmes all hopes of developing countries were belied. While developing countries wanted a special fund of $ 250 billion, developed countries insisted that existing Global Environment Facility (GEF) will serve the purpose. Finally in a closed door meeting the G-77 had no option but to drop its demand for a separate Green Fund and agreed to accept a "restructured" GEF as one of the financial mechanisms. The restructured GEF implies greater 'transparency' in the decision-making process and also a more universal membership of the GEF. According to some critics, the Earth Summit has been anything but a success. While the hopes of the people of industrialized countries that it would take first steps towards making the world safe for future generations have been belied the net outcome of the Summit was hardly satisfying in any concrete measure to the developing countries, including India. But to say that the Earth Summit has failed or not achieved anything would not be correct. Despite the opposition of the U.S., many nations signed the Bio-diversity treaty. Climate change convention to date has been ratified by 195 countries (i.e. all the member of the U.N. + Nine and European Union). Is it not a matter of great satisfaction that even the rigid, almost intransigent, attitude of the U.S. could not thwart the Summit's outcome ? Is it not a remarkable achievement in the present unipolar world ? Further, the U.S. was almost isolated because of its intransigent attitude and a number of developed countries including Britain, Japan, Germany, and European Community distanced themselves from the U.S. stand and shifted their position on crucial issues and participated in evolving consensus which finally took shape as Earth charter or Rio Declaration. As pointed out by Indian Prime Minister, Mr. P.V. Narasimha Rao, the net outcome of the Summit was "satisfactory" and "a step in the right direction". According to Maurice Strong, Secretary-General of the UNCED or Earth Summit, the Summit was a success but regretted that developed countries had made no generous financial commitment to the environment protection programmes. He added that though not all the problems discussed found solutions, the conference served as a starting point and that the road from Rio was a fast track to a better future for the world. Thus the road from Rio is pointing in the direction of hope, it is for the nations—both the developed and the developing—to bring it to fruition so as to ensure the world, rather the planet Earth, safe for the present and future generations.

Commission on Sustainable Development*.—On 22nd December, 1992, the General Assembly of the U.N. approved the creation of a new high-level Commission on Sustainable Development to oversee the implementation of "Agenda 21". The Commission consists of 53 members. On 12th February, 1993, the Economic and Social Council Commission formally established the 53-member Commission on Sustainable Development to monitor progress in implementing "Agenda 21", the comprehensive action programme adopted by the U.N. Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED) in June, 1992 in Rio de Janeiro. The Commission, a functional body of the Economic and Social Council, will also oversee activities related to the integration of environmental and developmental goals throughout the United Nations system. The Commission began its work in May, 1993 to consider holding high level ministerial meetings to provide 'political impetus' to the commitments and decisions of the Earth Summit.

Johannesburg Declaration on Sustainable Development.—The world Summit on Sustainable Development was held in Johannesburg (Sough Africa) from 2 to 4 September 2002. The representatives of the peoples of the world reaffirmed their commitment to Sustainable Development. They recognized that the global environment continues to suffer, loss of biodiversity continues, fish stocks continue to be depleted, desertification claims more and more fertile lands, the adverse effects of climatic change are already evident, natural disasters are more frequent and more devastating and developing countries more vulnerable, and air, water and marine pollution continues to rob millions of a decent life.

They expressed their determination to ensure that their rich diversity which is their collective strength will be used for constructive partnership for change and for the achievement of common goal of sustainable development.

They recognized that sustainable development requires a long term perspective and broad based participation in policy formulation, decision making and implementation at all levels. As social partners, they will continue to work for stable partnerships with all major groups, respecting the independent, important roles of each of them.

The world Summit also prepared a plan of implementation of the World Summit on Sustainable Development. It dealt with such matters as poverty eradication, changing unsustainable patterns of consumption and production, protecting and managing the natural base of economic and social development, sustainable development in a globalizing world, health and sustainable development, sustainable development for Africa, means of implementation and institutional frame work for sustainable development.

Even though not much can be expected from such world Summits yet they serve a significant object of highlighting the gravity and urgency of the problems. Due to great differences in attitudes and their way of fulfilling their commitments, the results of the Summit cannot at all be said to be encouraging.[69] The developed countries are not serious about fulfilling their obligations. On the other hand developing countries do not have enough funds to give up their conventional modes of energy and adopt those which may ensure sustainable development.

First Ministerial Conference of the Forestry Forum for Developing Countries (FFDC).—The three day first Ministerial Conference of the Forestry Forum for Developing Countries concluded at New Delhi on 3rd September, 1993 after adopting the Delhi Declaration on Forests. 'It was attended by the representatives of 40 countries apart from observers from nine advanced countries and seven international organisations such as World Bank and Asian Development Bank. The Conference is a direct follow up to the U.N. Conference on Environment and Development (UNCED). The Delhi Declaration has called upon the Commission on Sustainable Development to identify at its next session "an appropriate mechanism within the U.N. system".

---

* IAS (2003) Q. 7(a)

[69] See also Mohammed Hussain K.S., "World Summit on Sustainable Development, Johannesburg. An Appraisal", I JIL Vol. 2 No. 3 (2002), p. 348.

The Delhi Declaration has asserted that forests are inalienable national resource and has called for a U.N. mechanism on forests. The Delhi Declaration has reiterated the right of the sovereign countries to choose between the various multiple "uses of their forest resources in accordance with their national policies, promises and strategies. According to the Declaration, the right of the Development must be fulfilled so as to equitably meet developmental and environmental needs of the present and future generations." The Declaration also calls upon the international community to seek and adopt options for sustainable alternative forms of employment opportunities to people dependent on forests. Further the Declaration has asked the international community "to work for determining methodologies for the economic valuation of goods and services provided by forests including inter alia traditional knowledge and technologies, biological diversities, sequestration of carbon and other ecological processes and the forgone opportunity costs." The Declaration has also called for "increasing financial assistance provided by the developed countries and international organisations including a restructured Global Environmental Facility (GEF) to sustain investment in the Forestry sector in developing countries within a given time frame through transparent mechanisms to assist and meet the incremental costs incurred to implement sustainable development" and for "facilitating open and free international trade in forest products through the removal of unilateral and discriminatory measures that impede market access, while ensuring that the sustainability criteria on forest management is equitably applied to all types of timber."

Landmark International Agreement on Forests.—On 17 December, 2007, the General Assembly adopted a landmark agreement on international forest policy and cooperation. It sets a new standard in forest management. After two weeks of intense negotiations among delegates to the United Nations Forum on Forests, the agreement was reached in April 2007. Though the new agreement is "non-legally Binding instrument in all types of forests", it calls for greater international cooperation and national action to reduce deforestation, reverse the loss of forest cover, present forest degradation, promote sustainable livelihood and reduce poverty for all forest dependent peoples.

Conference to review the implementation of the decisions taken at Rio Earth Summit (1992).—A U.N. conference to review the implementation of the decision taken was held in June 1997. Nearly 160 member states participated in the Conference. The Conference renewed its commitments and set goals for future. It was generally agreed that major and crucial part of the recommendations of the Rio Summit remained unimplemented. One of the main causes for this was that the differences between developing and developed nations over several matters still persisted. Yet another reason for the same was the reluctance of the developed nations to bear the cost of providing finances or technology at affordable rates to the developing nations to meet the environment standards fixed for them.

Kyoto Environmental Summit on Global Warming (December 1997)—

N.B. : For this please see Appendix II

Conclusion.—As remarked by Maurice F-Strong, Secretary-General of the United Nations Conference on the Human Environment, "The concept of respecting and protecting the human environment has its objective the fulfilment of the legitimate, immediate ambitions of individuals and nations as well as the interests of future generations. The rectification of past errors, wherever possible, has as its object the provision of better opportunities for development and progress".[70] "Environmental and Ecological Constraints have symbolized our thinking towards new goals, or goals which have been neglected under the influence of a culture of mass production and consumption." [71] In this sense, the Stockholm Conference on the Human Environment was neither a beginning nor an end but an unprecedented opportunity to break new ground in the management of a world in which all of us live.[72] It cannot be denied that the Stockholm Conference has been successful in breaking the new ground. The Conference "has served to identify those areas in which rules of international environmental law, acceptable to the international community as a whole, can be laid down, and as well as those areas in which the formation of environmental rules must encounter insurmountable obstacles. To that extent it has provided foundations for the development of international environmental law.[73] Stockholm Conference, Habitat Conference and Conference on Desertification and several other conventions relating to environment which have been referred earlier not only provide foundation for the development of international environmental law but make it clear that a real beginning has been made in the management of the world in which all of us live in the right directions. The Stockholm Conference on Human Environment is also remarkable for creating institutions (as discussed above) for the protection and preservation of human environment but it must be noted that "their vitality will obviously depend on the behaviour of governments. Will the members of the U.N. devote the necessary resources to national and international environmental efforts? Will they accept limitations on their traditional freedom of action in the interest of preserving the common biosphere ? Many leaders now use the rhetoric of 'spaceship earth' but are they really prepared to accept the political and economic costs of self-denial that this rhetoric implies."[74] It is clear from above discussion that protection and preservation of environment are necessarily related to development. A major topic that of inter-relationship between environment and development is now-supported by both developed and developing countries. In the end it may be noted that for economic development use of energy is indispensable. But increasing use of energy adversely affects nature's balance. It has, therefore, been rightly suggested that we should take a global view of the energy problem based on ecological considerations.[75] [70] "The United Nations and the Environment", Int. Orgn., Vol. 26 (1972), p. 169 at p. 172.

---

---

71. B.D. Nag Chaudhary and S. Bhatt, "Energy, Environment and World Order, India Quarterly, Vol. XXXVI, Nos. 3 and 4 (July-Dec. 1980), p. 336 at p. 344.
72. See note 54.
73. J.G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (1989) p. 409.
74. Richard N. Gardner, "The Role of the U.N. in Environmental Problems", Int. Orign Vol. 26 (1972), p. 237 at 254.
75. See note 55.

Part III

INTERNATIONAL TRANSACTIONS

CHAPTER 28

DIPLOMATIC AGENTS*

Introduction.—The allegation of Oppenheim and other Western Jurists that international law originated in Europe and its credit is to Western civilisation is not correct. The study of the original text books of Ramayana and Mahabharata falsifies the contention of Western Jurists.[1] In his view, during the Ramayana and Mahabharata period some aspects of International law were in their developed stage. Examples of International law relating to diplomatic agents may be cited in this connection.[2] "Consequent on a development over some hundreds of years the Institution of Diplomatic Representatives has come to be the principal machinery by which the intercourse between States is conducted".[3] The permanent appointment of diplomatic envoys began from the seventeenth century. The rights, duties, immunities and privileges etc., of the diplomatic agents in eighteenth and nineteenth centuries were mostly in the form of customary rules of International law. The first great land mark, therefore, was the Congress of Vienna, 1815 wherein the customary law regarding diplomatic agents was clarified and codified. After 1815 also, the law relating to diplomatic agents continued to develop and finally a convention was adopted in 1961. This Convention is called Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. However, the Preamble of the Vienna Convention makes it clear that those matters for which there is no express provision in the Vienna Convention will still be governed by the customary rules of International law. Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961 was adopted on 18 April, 1961. It entered into force on 24 April, 1964. Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations was concluded on 18 April, 1961 and came into force on 24 April, 1964. As of October 2018, 192 countries had become parties to the convention. Its articles are considered a cornerstone of modern international relations. Alongwith it an Optional Protocol concerning the compulsory settlement of disputes was also concluded on 18 April, 1961. Article-I of the Additional Protocol provided that disputes arising out of the interpretation and applications of the convention shall lie within the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court and may accordingly be brought before the court by an application made by any party to the dispute being a party to the present Protocol.

Further, Article-II provides that the parties may agree, within a period of two months after one party has notified its opinion to the other that a dispute exists to resort not to the International Court of Justice but to an arbitral Tribunal after the expiry of the said period, either party may bring the dispute before the court by an application. Article III further provides that within the same period of two months, the parties may agree to adopt a conciliation procedure before resorting to International Court of Justice. The Conciliation Commission shall make its recommendation within five months after its appointment. If its recommendations are not accepted by the parties to the dispute then within two months after they have been delivered, either party may bring the dispute before the Court by an application. It may be noted here that the Indian Parliament passed the Diplomatic Relations (Vienna Convention) Act, 1972, to give effect to the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961, and to provide for matters connected therewith.[4] Other States have also passed similar Acts. "The law relating to the diplomatic and consular affairs remains the strongest section of international law".[5]

---

* See also for I.A.S. (1958), Q. No. 6.

[1] S. S. Dhawan, "The Ramayana—International Law, in the Age of the Ramayana", National Herald Magazine, Sunday, January 28, 1973, p. 1.

[2] See also Dr. Nagendra Singh, India and International Law (1969), p. 12.

[3] J. G. Starke, Introduction to International Law, Tenth Edition (Butterworths, Singapore, 1989) p. 421.

[4] For text of the Act see I.J.I.L., Vol. 12 (1972), pp. 637-46.

Classification of Diplomatic Agents*.—The diplomatic agents have been classified according to their status and functions. The first classification of diplomatic agent was made in the Congress of Vienna, 1815. The Congress of Vienna, 1815, classified the diplomatic agents under following categories : (1) Ambassadors and Legates ; (2) Ministers Pleni-potentiary and Envoys extraordinary; and (3) Charge-d' affaires. Some changes brought about in the above classification by Congress of Aix-la-Chappele, 1818. In the Congress fourth category of diplomatic agents namely Ministers Resident was added and was kept on the third place in order of priority. But it was again dropped by 1961 Convention on Deplomatic Relations. Thus, at present, the classification of diplomatic envoys is as follows—

(1) Ambassadors and Legates.—Ambassadors and Legates are the diplomatic agents of first category. They are the representatives of the completely Sovereign States. They are either appointed as Ambassadors or Permanent Representatives of their respective countries in the United Nations. The representatives appointed by Pope are called Legates.

(2) Ministers Pleni-potentiary and Envoys Extraordinary.—Minister Pleni-potentiary and Envoys Extraordinary are the diplomatic agents of second category and as compared to the diplomatic agents of the first category, they enjoy less privilege and immunities.

(3) *Charge-d'Affaires.—Charge-d' Affaires are the diplomatic agents of the last category. The main reason for this is that they are not appointed by the head of the State. They are appointed by the Foreign Ministers of States. In rights and status they are considered below the Minister Resident.

It was made clear in Article 14 (2) of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relation that apart from precedence and etiquette, there is hardly any difference between the diplomatic agents of above-mentioned categories. Obviously, there is no difference so far as their privilege and immunities are concerned.

Functions of Diplomatic Agents

According to Article 3 of Vienna Convention, the functions of a diplomatic mission consist inter alia in : (a) representing the sending State in the receiving State; (b) protecting in the receiving State the interests of the sending State and of its nationals, within the limits permitted by international law; (c) negotiating with the government of the receiving State; (d) ascertainment by all lawful means conditions and developments in the receiving State; and reporting thereon to the government of the sending State ; (e) promoting friendly relations between the sending State and the receiving State, and developing their economic cultural and scientific relations. In addition to these functions diplomatic agents have also to perform any special functions which are allotted to them from time to time. Diplomatic agents which are appointed only for specific functions, perform only those functions.

The Basis of Immunities and Privileges of Diplomatic Agents.—Before discussing the immunities and privileges of the diplomatic agents it will be necessary and desirable to know as to what is the basis of these immunities and privileges. To put it more precisely, why diplomatic agents are given certain immunities and privileges ? There are two theories prevalent in this connection (i) Theory of Extra-territoriality; and (ii) Functional Theory.

Theory of Extra-territoriality.—According to this theory, the diplomatic agents enjoy immunities and privileges because they are deemed to be outside the jurisdiction of the State in which they are appointed.

---

[5] Rahamatullah Khan, "International Law—Old and New", I.J.I.L., 5 (1975) p. 371 at p. 373.

* See also for P.C.S. (1991) Q. 9(a).

 See also for C.S.E. (1994) Q. 8(d).

 See also for P.C.S. (1975), Q. No. 6 ; P.C.S. (1970), Q. No. 7.

Criticism.—The theory of extra-territoriality was very much prevalent up to the past and a number of jurists supported it. But this theory has now been discarded. A number of jurists have severely criticized it. In the view of Prof. Oppenheim the theory of extra-territoriality is not the correct basis of the immunities and privileges which the diplomatic agents enjoy. In his view, it is wrong to contend that they enjoy these privileges and immunities because they are deemed to be outside the territorial jurisdiction of the receiving State.[6] Fenwick has also criticized the theory of extra-territoriality and has expressed the view that this theory cannot be the basis of immunity and privileges enjoyed by the diplomatic agents. It has finally been abandoned in the Vienna Convention which offers no theoretical basis for the privileges and immunities it grants.[7] In Bergman v. De Sieyes,[8] the District Court of New York held "......that a Foreign Minister is immune from the jurisdiction, both criminal and civil of the courts in the country to which he is accredited, on the grounds that he is the representative, the alter ego, of his sovereign who is, of course, entitled to such immunity, and that subjection to the jurisdiction of the courts, would interfere with the performance of the duties as such minister......"

Reference may also be made here to Ex party Petroff (1971) wherein the Supreme Court of Australia criticized and discarded the theory of extra-territoriality and expressed the view in unambiguous terms that this cannot be regarded the true basis of the immunities and privileges enjoyed by the diplomatic agents in the present period. In this case two citizens of Australia had thrown some explosive substances on the Soviet Chancery situated in Canberra. The proceedings were started against these two accused, according to the criminal law of Australia. These two persons argued that on the basis of the theory of extra-territoriality, the Chancery of Soviet Union is outside the territorial jurisdicion of Australia and therefore they cannot be prosecuted under the law of Australia. The Court had, therefore, to decide whether or not the Chancery will be deemed to be out of the territorial jurisdiction of Australia. The Supreme Court of Australia reveiwed the earlier law on the point and ruled that it is wrong to say that Chancery is not within the territorial jurisdictions of Australia and that the accused cannot be punished under the local laws. Thus the Supreme Court of Australia condemned and discarded theory of extra-territoriality and upheld the conviction of the said two accused persons.

Functional Theory.—In fact, the true basis of the immunities and privileges enjoyed by the diplomatic agents is not the theory of extra-territoriality but the special functions which these agents perform. That is to say, diplomatic agents are given certain immunities and privileges because of the special functions which they perform. It is thought necessary and expedient to grant these immunities and privileges to them otherwise they would be greatly handicapped in the performance of their functions. Thus Diplomatic Missions are accorded privileges and immunities for functional reasons as is clearly brought out in the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations.[9]

